The work of Tim O'Brien, while highly praised, has not been exempt from the criticism of feminist scholars. Lorrie Smith argues that the short fiction that eventually came together to make up The Things They Carried silences women and re-enforces traditional masculine views of war and gender. Smith writes that O'Brien's "text offers no challenge to a discourse of war in which apparently innocent American men are tragically wounded and women are objectified, excluded, and silenced" ("Things" 17). While Smith points out that her intent "is not to devalue O'Brien's technical skill or emotional depth," she does want to "account for [her] own discomfort as a female reader and to position The Things They Carried within a larger cultural project to rewrite the Vietnam War from a masculinist and strictly American perspective" (17). She argues that, even though O'Brien's narrator says that only those who were there can fully understand the events which occurred, he still permits a bond to form between male readers and the characters on the basis that women are completely unable to understand "the things men do." Male readers become less marked as outsiders than women as the stories progress since "the shared language of patriarchy" eases the general incommunicability of the war trauma for men (19).

Smith supports her argument with a close reading of both the longer stories that first appeared in Esquire magazine and the shorter vignettes that O'Brien added when he collected the material as a book. She argues that the opening, title story of the collection "establishes a pattern . . . for the rest of the book" in that it teaches readers that survival in war depends on "suppressing femininity" (24). Readers learn, as does Lieutenant Jimmy Cross, that the renunciation of the feminine, is "a sad but necessary cost of war" (24). Martha in the opening story, along with [the book's other female characters,] all represent another world: those back home who will never understand the war. Even more, this inability to understand is at least partly willful: they do not understand because they do not listen. [. . .]

While I find Smith's article thoughtful and intriguing, and while I agree with much feminist criticism of Vietnam War literature, this essay proposes that the work of Tim O'Brien, particularly The Things They Carried, stands apart from the genre as a whole. O'Brien is much more self-consciously aware of gender issues and critical of traditional gender dichotomies than are the bulk of U.S. writers about the Vietnam War. Though it is often tempting to forget it, readers must always bear in mind the distinction between O'Brien-the-narrator and O'Brien-the-author. This difference is crucial to understanding the book's central questions: What is truth and how can truth best be communicated? How can we truly understand the experiences of another human being? I would suggest that O'Brien posits two very different responses to these questions and that his responses are directly related to some of the concerns about gender raised by feminist critics. The male characters in the book do indeed subscribe to patriarchal and condescending attitudes about gender; they believe that knowledge is attained experientially and thus they exclude women from understanding the war experience. Yet, always running counter to this view is its corrective: that trauma is communicable, that understanding may be attained through the imaginative acts of storytelling and reading, and that the male characters do not necessarily understand war and gender as well as they think they do.

I. "The Things They Carried" [. . .]

The book's opening story, "The Things They Carried," offers two competing narratives: the ultra-realistic, precise details of what the men carry (down to brand names and weights of objects listed in ounces) versus the more personal, more traumatic story of the death of Ted Lavender. Such a form underscores one of the novel's main concerns, the relation between fact and fiction. [. . .] The concrete specificity of the lists in the opening story [. . .] set[s] readers up to expect a hard-nosed, factual account of the war. Thus, we might mistakenly read Jimmy Cross's story as fact as well—an omniscient, third-person account of the reality of war experience. Such a reading would be a mistake, though. We must remember that the story of Ted Lavender's death is filtered through the subjective experience of Lieutenant Jimmy Cross. It is a narrative that increasingly interrupts and subsumes the more objective story of the items the men carry with them in the field. Yet, it is not a story about men at war having to renounce the feminine. Rather, it is about the inevitable guilt associated with war deaths and what soldiers do with that guilt.

While Jimmy Cross certainly views Martha as inhabiting another world, separate from the war, and thus as representing home, purity, an innocence he no longer retains, I'd argue that readers are not supposed to make the same easy gender classifications that Cross does. This point is driven home by Cross's reaction to Lavender's death. Cross is not only a romantic who fantasizes a love affair that's not really there with Martha, he greatly exaggerates his responsibility for Lavender's death. The very randomness of Lavender's death—he is "zapped while zipping," shot after separating from the men briefly to urinate—belies Jimmy Cross's responsibility for the death. Cross blames himself for the death because, as the narrator tells us in a later story, "In the Field," "When a man died, there had to be blame" (177). The soldiers wish to find a reason for the deaths they witness in order to make them less frightening, less random and meaningless. Blame can provide the illusion that war deaths such as those of Lavender and Kiowa are preventable, if only someone behaves differently, more responsibly, in the future. So, Cross determines that his love for Martha, his fantasies about her, are the cause of Lavender's death and that, to prevent such deaths in the future, he will strictly follow standard operating procedures and "dispense with love," focusing instead on duty. Ironically, Lavender dies after the platoon has just finished searching Viet Cong tunnels, a tactic that was standard operating procedure, but an extremely dangerous undertaking. While Lee Strunk emerges intact from such a risky assignment, Ted Lavender dies a few moments later completely unexpectedly, while conducting the ordinary business of living.

Again, readers are supposed to see the irrationality of both Cross's burden of guilt as well as his resolve to be a better officer. In fact, it is his very refusal to question orders, to deviate from standard operating procedure, that leads him to camp in the "shitfield" later in the book and inadvertently brings about the death of Kiowa, another accident, and one which many different characters claim blame for. Readers, then, are not supposed to see Cross's burning of Martha's picture and renunciation of the imagination as "sad but necessary" consequences of war, but rather as the attempts of a romantic and guilt-ridden young man to gain control over a situation in which he actually has very little power (Smith, "Things" 24). Because the burning of Martha's picture is linked to the burning of the Vietnamese village, readers see even more fully how mistaken and irrational Cross is in his reaction to Lavender's death.

V. "The Lives of the Dead"

"The Lives of the Dead" is as much a love story as it is a war story. The book, in fact, could be said to be framed by two love stories—the opening story which tells of Jimmy Cross's love for Martha and the final story which tells of the narrator's love as a nine-year-old for Linda, the little girl who dies of a brain tumor. [. . .] In "The Lives of the Dead," O'Brien deliberately juxtaposes traumatic war deaths with the traumatic death of Linda in order to undermine the old cliché of Vietnam War fiction: "if you weren't there, you can't possibly understand." "The Lives of the Dead" argues for the power of fiction, of imaginative creation. In stories, the dead can come to life; experiences can be communicated imaginatively.

The powerful status of fiction is perhaps nowhere so well illustrated as in the plot of the movie that nine-year-old Timmy attends on his date with Linda: The Man Who Never Was. In the film, the Allies plant false documents on the body of a dead British soldier to mislead the Germans about the site of the upcoming landings in Europe. "The Germans find the documents," O'Brien writes, and "the deception wins the war" (232). The dead soldier's fictional identity is more influential than his actual, biographical identity, which we never discover. In many ways, narrator O'Brien in the book is "the man who never was." He is a created persona whose stories teach us about the difficulty of getting to the truth of individual identity. The narrator looks at a photograph of himself from 1956, realizing that, "in the important ways" he has not changed at all: "the essence remains the same . . . the human life is all one thing, like a blade tracing loops on ice” (236). What shapes a person, then, is difficult to unravel. An individual seems to be the product of biological predisposition as well as a jumble of experiences: wartime experience as well as larger life experience. In any case, human essence and selfhood remain mysterious.

Because O’Brien works so diligently to connect war experience to human experience in general, I do not read his work as excluding or silencing women. One of O’Brien’s most moving pieces is a personal essay he published in the New York Times Magazine in 1994, called “The Vietnam in Me.” In this essay, O’Brien tells two stories simultaneously—the tale of his return to Vietnam over twenty years after having been a soldier there and the story of the disintegration of a serious love relationship. Nearly suicidal over the break-up, O’Brien has difficulty sleeping and writes that he is on “war time, which is the time we’re all on at one point or another: when fathers die, when husbands ask for divorce, when women you love are fast asleep beside men you wish were you” (55). Just as in “The Lives of the Dead” O’Brien links the physical corpse of the old Vietnamese man to those of Ted Lavender, Curt Lemon, and Kiowa, and finally to Linda’s, O’Brien links wartime experience and life experience in this article. “If there’s a lesson in this,” he writes, “which there is not, it’s very simple. You don’t have to be in Nam to be in Nam” (55). While much Vietnam War literature expresses the “incommunicability” of war trauma, which is eased for men because of a shared patriarchal language, O’Brien’s work expresses the exact opposite: that through imaginative acts of storytelling and reading, the atrocity of war can begin to be understood and thus can begin to heal.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Though THE THINGS THEY CARRIED may be more obviously a “war story” than any other in this anthology, several others also deal with war or its aftereffects on combatants or civilians. These include William Faulkner’s BARN BURNING, Amy Tan’s A PAIR OF TICKETS, and A. S. Byatt’s THE THING IN THE FOREST. Additionally, this anthology contains both a play featuring an Iraq War veteran (WATER BY THE SPOONFUL) and an array of war-related poems including THE CALL, THE DEATH OF THE BALL TURRET GUNNER, DISABLED, DULCE ET DECORUM EST, JUNDEE AMERIKA, PILGRIMAGE, and Vietnam veteran Yusef Komunyakaa’s TU DO STREET and FACING IT. Write an essay comparing the treatment of war in at least two of these works. What's similar and what's unique about what each work shows us about war and its effects?

2. THE THINGS THEY CARRIED is written in the third person, oscillating between sections that (like the title) refer to the entire platoon, as if seen from a distance, and sections that instead home in on a single focal character or consciousness. Usually, that consciousness is Jimmy Cross's. But not always. Write an essay exploring how point of view and/or other aspects of narration shape the story's effects and meaning. Why and how might it matter, for example, that in one section we "overhear" a conversation—between Bowker and Kiowa—that Jimmy isn't privy to, and even spend one paragraph inside Kiowa's consciousness?
3. Like almost every literary critic who writes about The Things They Carried, those whose work appears in this chapter all seem to agree that the stories in this collection are metafictional—that is, they in various ways draw attention to the fact that they are stories and thus also become about stories and about the relationship between fiction and reality, stories and truth. THE THINGS THEY CARRIED, however, may well be the least metafictional story in the sequence. Write a response paper or essay in which you analyze what, if anything, seems metafictional in and about the story and why and how exactly that might matter. Do the story's metafictional aspects make it seem less or more "true" or emotionally engaging, and in what ways?
4. One topic of debate among scholars who write about THE THINGS THEY CARRIED is the extent to which it does and/or doesn't reproduce traditional and potentially damaging notions of masculinity and femininity. Drawing upon both THE THINGS THEY CARRIED and the critical excerpts in this chapter, write an essay laying out your own case. Do you agree with one or another of the critics, or might both sides have missed something? Why and how so?
5. At one point in her essay, Lorrie N. Smith suggests, in passing, that THE THINGS THEY CARRIED is "fundamentally an initiation narrative" not unlike those featured in this anthology's "Initiation Stories" album. Write an essay exploring how O'Brien's story works in these terms, perhaps by comparing this story to at least one other. Who is initiated? into what? In making your case, be sure to consider the different arguments the critical excerpts in this chapter make, especially about how the story as a whole encourages us to understand and feel about Jimmy Cross's thoughts and actions at the story's end.
6. The Things They Carried opens with the story of the same name, and it ends with THE LIVES OF THE DEAD. Write an essay interrelating or comparing the two stories, perhaps by considering some or all of the following questions: How and why exactly might THE THINGS THEY CARRIED work and mean differently when read alongside THE LIVES OF THE DEAD or vice versa? Why and how might THE THINGS THEY CARRIED work well as a sort of introduction to a fictional meditation on Vietnam and THE LIVES OF THE DEAD as a conclusion to that meditation? In these or any terms, what might be the significance and effect of the two stories' very different styles of narration? of the way they each (differently) move back and forth in time and between different episodes or narrative modes?
7. In this chapter you have seen how a single work of literature can generate a broad range of critical responses. Taken together, these texts represent a kind of ongoing conversation between a "primary text" and "secondary texts" and among the "secondary texts." Using secondary texts available to you at a library and on the Internet, write an essay in which you join in the critical "conversation" about any of the stories you have read in another chapter or album in this book.

Love Medicine

Born in Minnesota of German American and French Chippewa descent, Louise Erdrich grew up in Wahpeton, North Dakota, as a member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa. She attended Dartmouth College and received an MFA in creative writing from Johns Hopkins University. Her first book, Love Medicine (1984), a collection of linked stories, won the National Book Critics Circle Award. In her subsequent publications—The Beet Queen (1986), Tracks (1988), The Bingo Palace (1993), and Tales of Burning Love (1996)—she pursued her focus on the lives of Native Americans in contemporary North Dakota. In 1991 she jointly authored the best-selling novel The Crown of Columbus with her husband, Michael Dorris. Her recent works include the novels The Last Report on the Miracles at Little No Horse (2001), The Plague of Doves (2008), The Round House (2012), and LaRose (2016), as well as Books and Islands in Ojibwa County: Traveling through the Land of My Ancestors (2014). The owner of Birchbark Books and Native Arts, Erdrich lives in Minnesota with her family and dogs.

I never really done much with my life, I suppose. I never had a television. Grandma Kashpaw had one inside her apartment at the Senior Citizens, so I used to go there and watch my favorite shows. For a while she used to call me the biggest waste on the reservation and hark back to how she saved me from my own mother, who wanted to tie me in a potato sack and throw me in a slough. Sure, I was grateful to Grandma Kashpaw for saving me like that, for raising me, but gratitude gets old. After a while, stale. I had to stop thanking her. One day I told her I had paid her back in full by staying at her beck and call. I'd do anything for Grandma. She knew that. Besides, I took care of Grandpa like nobody else could, on account of what a handful he'd gotten to be.

But that was nothing. I know the tricks of mind and body inside out without ever having trained for it, because I got the touch. It's a thing you got to be born with. I got secrets in my hands that nobody ever knew to ask. Take Grandma Kashpaw with her tired veins all knotted up in her legs like clumps of blue snails. I take my fingers and I snap them on the knots. The medicine flows out of me.

The touch. I run my fingers up the maps of those rivers of veins or I knock very gentle above their hearts or I make a circling motion on their stomachs, and it helps them. They feel much better. Some women pay me five dollars.

I couldn't do the touch for Grandpa, though. He was a hard nut. You know, some people fall right through the hole in their lives. It's invisible, but they come to it after time, never knowing where. There is this woman here, Lulu Lamartine, who always had a thing for Grandpa. She loved him since she was a girl and always said he was a genius. Now she says that his mind got so full it exploded.

How can I doubt that? I know the feeling when your mental power builds up too far. I always used to say that's why the Indians got drunk. Even statistically we're the smartest people on the earth. Anyhow with Grandpa I couldn't hardly believe it, because all my youth he stood out as a hero to me. When he started getting toward second childhood he went through different moods. He would stand in the woods and cry at the top of his shirt. It scared me, scared everyone, Grandma worst of all.

5 Yet he was so smart—do you believe it?—that he knew he was getting foolish.

He said so. He told me that December I failed school and come back on the train to Hoopdance. I didn't have nowhere else to go. He picked me up there and he said it straight out: "I'm getting into my second childhood." And then he said something else I still remember: "I been chosen for it. I couldn't say no." So I figure that a man so smart all his life—tribal chairman and the star of movies and even pictured in the statehouse and on cans of snuff—would know what he's doing by saying yes. I think he was called to second childhood like anybody else gets a call for the priesthood or the army or whatever. So I really did not listen too hard when the doctor said this was some kind of disease old people got eating too much sugar. You just can't tell me that a man who went to Washington and gave them bureaucrats what for could lose his mind from eating too much Milky Way. No, he put second childhood on himself.

Behind those songs he sings out in the middle of Mass, and back of those stories that everybody knows by heart, Grandpa is thinking hard about life. I know the feeling. Sometimes I'll throw up a smokescreen to think behind. I'll hitch up to Winnipeg and play the Space Invaders¹ for six hours, but all the time there and back I will be thinking some fairly deep thoughts that surprise even me, and I'm used to it. As for him, if it was just the thoughts there wouldn't be no problem. Smokescreen is what irritates the social structure, see, and Grandpa has done things that just distract people to the point they want to throw him in the cookie jar where they keep the mentally insane. He's far from that, I know for sure, but even Grandma had trouble keeping her patience once he started sneaking off to Lamartine's place. He's not supposed to have his candy, and Lulu feeds it to him. That's one of the reasons why he goes.

Grandma tried to get me to put the touch on Grandpa soon after he began stepping out. I didn't want to, but before Grandma started telling me again what a bad state my bare behind was in when she first took me home, I thought I should at least pretend.

1. Popular 1980s arcade video game.

I put my hands on either side of Grandpa's head. You wouldn't look at him and say he was crazy. He's a fine figure of a man, as Lamartine would say, with all his hair and half his teeth, a beak like a hawk, and cheeks like the blades of a hatchet. They put his picture on all the tourist guides to North Dakota and even copied his face for artistic paintings. I guess you could call him a monument all of himself. He started grinning when I put my hands on his temples,² and I knew right then he knew how come I touched him. I knew the smokescreen was going to fall.

"Let's pitch whoopee," he said across my shoulder to Grandma.

They don't use that expression much around here anymore, but for damn sure it must have meant something. It got her goat right quick.

She threw my hands off his head herself and stood in front of him, over-matching him pound for pound, and taller too, for she had a growth spurt in middle age while he had shrunk, so now the length and breadth of her surpassed him. She glared and spoke her piece into his face about how he was off at all hours tomcatting and chasing Lamartine again and making a damn old fool of himself.

"And you got no more whoopee to pitch anymore anyhow!" she yelled at last, surprising me so my jaw just dropped, for us kids all had pretended for so long that those rustling sounds we heard from their side of the room at night never happened. She sure had pretended it, up till now, anyway. I saw that tears were in her eyes. And that's when I saw how much grief and love she felt for him. And it gave me a real shock to the system. You see I thought love got easier over the years so it didn't hurt so bad when it hurt, or feel so good when it felt good. I thought it smoothed out and old people hardly noticed it. I thought it curled up and died, I guess. Now I saw it rear up like a whip and lash.

She loved him. She was jealous. She mourned him like the dead.

And he just smiled into the air, trapped in the seams of his mind.

So I didn't know what to do. I was in a laundry then. They was like parents to me, the way they had took me home and reared me. I could see her point for wanting to get him back the way he was so at least she could argue with him, sleep with him, not be shamed out by Lamartine. She'd always love him. That hit me like a ton of bricks. For one whole day I felt this odd feeling that cramped my hands. When you have the touch, that's where longing gets you. I never loved like that. It made me feel all inspired to see them fight, and I wanted to go out and find a woman who I would love until one of us died or went crazy. But I'm not like that really. From time to time I heal a person all up good inside, however when it comes to the long shot I doubt that I got staying power.

And you need that, staying power, going out to love somebody. I knew this quality was not going to jump on me with no effort. So I turned my thoughts back to Grandma and Grandpa. I felt her side of it with my hands and my tangled guts, and I felt his side of it within the stretch of my mentality. He had gone out to lunch one day and never came back. He was fishing in the middle of Matchimanito. And there was big thoughts on his line, and he kept throwing them back for even bigger ones that would explain to him, say, the meaning of how we got here and why we have to leave so soon. All in all, I could not see myself treating Grandpa with the touch, bringing him back, when the real part of him had chose to be off thinking somewhere. It was only the rest of him that stayed around causing trouble, after all, and we could handle most of it without any problem.

Besides, it was hard to argue with his reasons for doing some things. Take Holy Mass. I used to go there just every so often, when I got frustrated mostly, because even though I know the Higher Power dwells everywhere, there's something very calming about the cool greenish inside of our mission. Or so I thought, anyway. Grandpa was the one who stripped off my delusions in this matter, for it was he who busted right through what Father calls the sacred serenity of the place.

20 We filed in that time. Me and Grandpa. We sat down in our pews. Then the rosary got started up pre-Mass and that's when Grandpa filled up his chest and opened his mouth and belted out them words.

HAIL MARIE FULL OF GRACE.

He had a powerful set of lungs.

And he kept on like that. He did not let up. He hollered and he yelled them prayers, and I guess people was used to him by now, because they only muttered theirs and did not quit and gawk like I did. I was getting red-faced, I admit. I give him the elbow once or twice, but that wasn't nothing to him. He kept on. He shrieked to heaven and he pleaded like a movie actor and he pounded his chest like Tarzan in the Lord I Am Not Worthies. I thought he might hurt himself. Then after a while I guess I got used to it, and that's when I wondered: how come?

So afterwards I out and asked him. "How come? How come you yelled?"

25 "God don't hear me otherwise," said Grandpa Kashpaw.

I sweat. I broke right into a little cold sweat at my hairline because I knew this was perfectly right and for years not one damn other person had noticed it. God's been going deaf. Since the Old Testament, God's been deafening up on us. I read, see. Besides the dictionary, which I'm constantly in use of, I had this Bible once. I read it. I found there was discrepancies between then and now. It struck me. Here God used to raineth bread from clouds, smite the Phillipines,³ sling fire down on red-light districts where people got stabbed. He even appeared in person every once in a while. God used to pay attention, is what I'm saying.

Now there's your God in the Old Testament and there is Chippewa Gods as well. Indian Gods, good and bad, like tricky Nanabozho or the water monster, Missespeshu, who lives over in Matchimanito. That water monster was the last God I ever heard to appear. It had a weakness for young girls and grabbed one of the Pillagers off her rowboat. She got to shore all right, but only after this monster had its way with her. She's an old lady now. Old Lady Pillager. She still doesn't like to see her family fish that lake.

Our Gods aren't perfect, is what I'm saying, but at least they come around. They'll do a favor if you ask them right. You don't have to yell. But you do have to know, like I said, how to ask in the right way. That makes problems, because to ask proper was an art that was lost to the Chippewas once the Catholics gained ground. Even now, I have to wonder if Higher Power turned it back, if we got to yell, or if we just don't speak its language.

3. Blunder for "Philistines."

I looked around me. How else could I explain what all I had seen in my short life—King smashing his fist in things, Gordie drinking himself down to the Bismarck hospitals, or Aunt June left by a white man to wander off in the snow. How else to explain the times my touch don't work, and farther back, to the old-time Indians who was swept away in the outright germ warfare and dirty-dog killing of the whites. In those times, us Indians was so much kindlier than now.

We took them in.

Oh yes, I'm bitter as an old cutworm just thinking of how they done to us and doing still.

So Grandpa Kashpaw just opened my eyes a little there. Was there any sense relying on a God whose ears was stopped? Just like the government? I says then, right off, maybe we got nothing but ourselves. And that's not much, just personally speaking. I know I don't got the cold hard potatoes it takes to understand everything. Still, there's things I'd like to do. For instance, I'd like to help some people like my Grandpa and Grandma Kashpaw get back some happiness within the tail ends of their lives.

I told you once before I couldn't see my way clear to putting the direct touch on Grandpa's mind, and I kept my moral there, but something soon happened to make me think a little bit of mental adjustment wouldn't do him and the rest of us no harm.

It was after we saw him one afternoon in the sunshine courtyard of the Senior Citizens with Lulu Lamartine. Grandpa used to like to dig there. He had his little dandelion fork out, and he was prying up them dandelions right and left while Lamartine watched him.

"He's scratching up the dirt, all right," said Grandma, watching Lamartine watch Grandpa out the window. 35

Now Lamartine was about half the considerable size of Grandma, but you would never think of sizes anyway. They were different in an even more noticeable way. It was the difference between a house fixed up with paint and picky fence, and a house left to weather away into the soft earth, is what I'm saying. Lamartine was jacked up, latticed, shuttered, and vinyl sided, while Grandma sagged and bulged on her slipped foundations and let her hair go the silver gray of rain-dried lumber. Right now, she eyed the Lamartine's pert flowery dress with such a look it despaired me. I knew what this could lead to with Grandma. Alternating tongue storms and rock-hard silences was hard on a man, even one who didn't notice, like Grandpa. So I went fetching him.

But he was gone when I popped through the little screen door that led out on the courtyard. There was nobody out there either, to point which way they went. Just the dandelion fork quibbling upright in the ground. That gave me an idea. I snookered over to the Lamartine's door and I listened in first, then knocked. But nobody. So I went walking through the lounges and around the card tables. Still nobody. Finally it was my touch that led me to the laundry room. I cracked the door. I went in. There they were. And he was really loving her up good, boy, and she was going hell for leather. Sheets was flapping on the lines above, and washcloths, pillowcases, shirts was also flying through the air, for they was trying to clear out a place for themselves in a high-heaped but shallow laundry cart. The washers and dryers was all on, chock-full of quarters, shaking and moaning. I couldn't hear what Grandpa and the Lamartine was billing and cooing, and they couldn't hear me.

I didn't know what to do, so I went inside and shut the door.

The Lamartine wore a big curly light-brown wig. Looked like one of them squeaky little white-people dogs. Poodles they call them. Anyway, that wig is what saved us from the worse. For I could hardly shout and tell them I was in there, no more could I try and grab him. I was trapped where I was. There was nothing I could really do but hold the door shut. I was scared of somebody else upsetting in and really getting an eyeful. Turned out though, in the heat of the clinch, as I was trying to avert my eyes you see, the Lamartine's curly wig jumped off her head. And if you ever been in the midst of something and had a big change like that occur in the someone, you can't help know how it devastates your basic urges. Not only that, but her wig was almost with a life of its own. Grandpa's eyes were bugging at the change already, and swear to God if the thing didn't rear up and pop him in the face like it was going to start something. He scrambled up, Grandpa did, and the Lamartine jumped up after him all addled looking. They just stared at each other, huffing and puffing, with quizzical expression. The surprise seemed to drive all sense completely out of Grandpa's mind.

40 "The letter was what started the fire," he said. "I never would have done it."

"What letter?" said the Lamartine. She was stiff-necked now, and elegant, even bald, like some alien queen. I gave her back the wig. The Lamartine replaced it on her head, and whenever I saw her after that, I couldn't help thinking of her bald, with special powers, as if from another planet.

"That was a close call," I said to Grandpa after she had left.

But I think he had already forgot the incident. He just stood there all quiet and thoughtful. You really wouldn't think he was crazy. He looked like he was just about to say something important, explaining himself. He said something, all right, but it didn't have nothing to do with anything that made sense.

He wondered where the heck he put his dandelion fork. That's when I decided about the mental adjustment.

45 Now what was mostly our problem was not so much that he was not all there, but that what was there of him often hankered after Lamartine. If we could put a stop to that, I thought, we might be getting someplace. But here, see, my touch was of no use. For what could I snap my fingers at to make him faithful to Grandma? Like the quality of staying power, this faithfulness was invisible. I know it's something that you got to acquire, but I never known where from. Maybe there's no rhyme or reason to it, like my getting the touch, and then again maybe it's a kind of magic.

It was Grandma Kashpaw who thought of it in the end. She knows things. Although she will not admit she has a scrap of Indian blood in her, there's no doubt in my mind she's got some Chippewa. How else would you explain the way she'll be sitting there, in front of her TV story, rocking in her armchair and suddenly she turns on me, her brown eyes hard as lake-bed flint.

"Lipsha Morrissey," she'll say, "you went out last night and got drunk."

How did she know that? I'll hardly remember it myself. Then she'll say she just had a feeling or ache in the scar of her hand or a creak in her shoulder. She is constantly being told things by little aggravations in her joints or by her household appliances. One time she told Gordie never to ride with a crazy Lamar-tine boy. She had seen something in the polished-up tin of her bread toaster. So he didn't. Sure enough, the time came we heard how Lyman and Henry went out of control in their car, ending up in the river. Lyman swam to the top, but Henry never made it.

Thanks to Grandma's toaster, Gordie was probably spared.

Someplace in the blood Grandma Kashpaw knows things. She also remem- 50
bers things, I found. She keeps things filed away. She's got a memory like them video games that don't forget your score. One reason she remembers so many details about the trouble I gave her in early life is so she can flash back her total when she needs to.

Like now. Take the love medicine. I don't know where she remembered that from. It came tumbling from her mind like an asteroid off the corner of the screen.⁴

Of course she starts out by mentioning the time I had this accident in church and did she leave me there with wet overalls? No she didn't. And ain't I glad? Yes I am. Now what you want now, Grandma?

But when she mentions them love medicines, I feel my back prickle at the danger. These love medicines is something of an old Chippewa specialty. No other tribe has got them down so well. But love medicines is not for the layman to handle. You don't just go out and get one without paying for it. Before you get one, even, you should go through one hell of a lot of mental condensation. You got to think it over. Choose the right one. You could really mess up your life grinding up the wrong little thing.

So anyhow, I said to Grandma I'd give this love medicine some thought. I knew the best thing was to go ask a specialist like Old Lady Pillager, who lives up in a tangle of bush and never shows herself. But the truth is I was afraid of her, like everyone else. She was known for putting the twisted mouth on people, seizing up their hearts. Old Lady Pillager was serious business, and I have always thought it best to steer clear of that whenever I could. That's why I took the powers in my own hands. That's why I did what I could.

I put my whole mentality to it, nothing held back. After a while I started to 55 remember things I'd heard gossiped over.

I heard of this person once who carried a charm of seeds that looked like baby pearls. They was attracted to a metal knife, which made them powerful. But I didn't know where them seeds grew. Another love charm I heard about I couldn't go along with, because how was I suppose to catch frogs in the act, which it required. Them little creatures is slippery and fast. And then the power-fullest of all, the most extreme, involved nail clips and such. I wasn't any-where near asking Grandma to provide me all the little body bits that this last love recipe called for. I went walking around for days just trying to think up something that would work.

Well I got it. If it hadn't been the early fall of the year, I never would have got it. But I was sitting underneath a tree one day down near the school just watch-ing people's feet go by when something tells me, look up! Look up! So I look up, and I see two honkers, Canada geese, the kind with little masks on their faces, a bird what mates for life. I see them flying right over my head naturally preparing to land in some slough on the reservation, which they certainly won't get off of alive.

It hits me, anyway. Them geese, they mate for life. And I think to myself, just what if I went out and got a pair? And just what if I fed some part—say the goose heart—of the female to Grandma and Grandpa ate the other heart? Wouldn't that work? Maybe it's all invisible, and then maybe again it's magic. Love is a stony road. We know that for sure. If it's true that the higher feelings of devotion get lodged in the heart like people say, then we'd be home free. If not, eating goose heart couldn't harm nobody anyway. I thought it was worth my effort, and Grandma Kashpaw thought so, too. She had always known a good idea when she heard one. She borrowed me Grandpa's gun.

So I went out to this particular slough, maybe the exact same slough I never got thrown in by my mother, thanks to Grandma Kashpaw, and I hunched down in a good comfortable pile of rushes. I got my gun loaded up. I ate a few of these soft baloney sandwiches Grandma made me for lunch. And then I waited. The cattails blown back and forth above my head. Them stringy blue herons was spearing up their prey. The thing I know how to do best in this world, the thing I been training for all my life, is to wait. Sitting there and sitting there was no hardship on me. I got to thinking about some funny things that happened. There was this one time that Lulu Lamartine's little blue tweety bird, a paraclete, I guess you'd call it, flown up inside her dress and got lost within there. I recalled her running out into the hallway trying to yell something, shaking. She was doing a right good jig there, cutting the rug for sure, and the thing is it never flown out. To this day people speculate where it went. They fear she might perhaps of crushed it in her corsets. It sure hasn't ever yet been seen alive. I thought of funny things for a while, but then I used them up, and strange things that happened started weaseling their way into my mind.

60 I got to thinking quite naturally of the Lamartine's cousin named Wristwatch. I never knew what his real name was. They called him Wristwatch because he got his father's broken wristwatch as a young boy when his father passed on. Never in his whole life did Wristwatch take his father's watch off. He didn't care if it worked, although after a while he got sensitive when people asked what time it was, teasing him. He often put it to his ear like he was listening to the tick. But it was broken for good and forever, people said so, at least that's what they thought.

Well I saw Wristwatch smoking in his pickup one afternoon and by nine that evening he was dead.

He died sitting at the Lamartine's table, too. As she told it, Wristwatch had just eaten himself a good-size dinner and she said would he take seconds on the hot dish when he fell over to the floor. They turnt him over. He was gone. But here's the strange thing: when the Senior Citizen's orderly took the pulse he noticed that the wristwatch Wristwatch wore was now working. The moment he died the wristwatch started keeping perfect time. They buried him with the watch still ticking on his arm.

I got to thinking. What if some gravediggers dug up Wristwatch's casket in two hundred years and that watch was still going? I thought what question they would ask and it was this: Whose hand wound it?

I started shaking like a piece of grass at just the thought.

Not to get off the subject or nothing. I was still hunkered in the slough. It was passing late into the afternoon and still no honkers had touched down. Now I don't need to tell you that the waiting did not get to me, it was the chill. The rushes was very soft, but damp. I was getting cold and debating to leave, when they landed. Two geese swimming here and there as big as life, looking deep into each other's little pinhole eyes. Just the ones I was looking for. So I lifted Grandpa's gun to my shoulder and I aimed perfectly, and blam! Blam! I delivered two accurate shots. But the thing is, them shots missed. I couldn't hardly believe it. Whether it was that the stock had warped or the barrel got bent someways, I don't quite know, but anyway them geese flown off into the dim sky, and Lipsha Morrissey was left there in the rushes with evening fallen and his two cold hands empty. He had before him just the prospect of another day of bone-cracking chill in them rushes, and the thought of it got him depressed.

Now it isn't my style, in no way, to get depressed.

So I said to myself, Lipsha Morrissey, you're a happy S.O.B. who could be covered up with weeds by now down at the bottom of this slough, but instead you're alive to tell the tale. You might have problems in life, but you still got the touch. You got the power, Lipsha Morrissey. Can't argue that. So put your mind to it and figure out how not to be depressed.

I took my advice. I put my mind to it. But I never saw at the time how my thoughts led me astray toward a tragic outcome none could have known. I ignored all the danger, all the limits, for I was tired of sitting in the slough and my feet were numb. My face was aching. I was chilled, so I played with fire. I told myself love medicine was simple. I told myself the old superstitions was just that—strange beliefs. I told myself to take the ten dollars Mary MacDonald had paid me for putting the touch on her arthritis joint, and the other five I hadn't spent yet from winning bingo last Thursday. I told myself to go down to the Red Owl store.

And here is what I did that made the medicine backfire. I took an evil shortcut. I looked at birds that was dead and froze.

All right. So now I guess you will say, "Slap a malpractice suit on Lipsha Morrissey."

I heard of those suits. I used to think it was a color clothing quack doctors had to wear so you could tell them from the good ones. Now I know better that it's law.

As I walked back from the Red Owl with the rock-hard, heavy turkeys, I argued to myself about malpractice. I thought of faith. I thought to myself that faith could be called belief against the odds and whether or not there's any proof. How does that sound? I thought how we might have to yell to be heard by Higher Power, but that's not saying it's not there. And that is faith for you. It's belief even when the goods don't deliver. Higher Power makes promises we all know they can't back up, but anybody ever go and slap an old malpractice suit on God? Or the U.S. government? No they don't. Faith might be stupid, but it gets us through. So what I'm heading at is this. I finally convinced myself that the real actual power to the love medicine was not the goose heart itself but the faith in the cure.

I didn't believe it, I knew it was wrong, but by then I had waded so far into my lie I was stuck there. And then I went one step further.

The next day, I cleaned the hearts away from the paper packages of gizzards inside the turkeys. Then I wrapped them hearts with a clean hankie and brung them both to get blessed up at the mission. I wanted to get official blessings from the priest, but when Father answered the door to the rectory, wiping his hands on a little towel, I could tell he was a busy man.

75 “Booshoo,⁵ Father,” I said. “I got a slight request to make of you this afternoon.”

“What is it?” he said.

“Would you bless this package?” I held out the hankie with the hearts tied inside it.

He looked at the package, questioning it.

80 A look of annoyance crossed his face.

“Why don’t you bring this matter over to Sister Martin,” he said. “I have duties.”

And so, although the blessing wouldn’t be as powerful, I went over to the Sisters with the package.

I rung the bell, and they brought Sister Martin to the door. I had her as a music teacher, but I was always so shy then. I never talked out loud. Now, I had grown taller than Sister Martin. Looking down, I saw that she was not feeling up to snuff. Brown circles hung under her eyes.

“What’s the matter?” she said, not noticing who I was.

85 “Remember me, Sister?”

She squinted up at me.

“Oh yes,” she said after a moment. “I’m sorry, you’re the youngest of the Kashpaws. Gordie’s brother.”

Her face warmed up.

“Lipsha,” I said, “that’s my name.”

90 “Well, Lipsha,” she said, smiling broad at me now, “what can I do for you?”

They always said she was the kindest-hearted of the Sisters up the hill, and she was. She brought me back into their own kitchen and made me take a big yellow wedge of cake and a glass of milk.

“Now tell me,” she said, nodding at my package. “What have you got wrapped up so carefully in those handkerchiefs?”

Like before, I answered honestly.

“Ah,” said Sister Martin. “Turkey hearts.” She waited.

95 “I hoped you could bless them.”

She waited some more, smiling with her eyes. Kindhearted though she was, I began to sweat. A person could not pull the wool down over Sister Martin. I stumbled through my mind for an explanation, quick, that wouldn’t scare her off.

“They’re a present,” I said, “for Saint Kateri’s⁶ statue.”

“She’s not a saint yet.”

5. Or boozhoo: “hello,” “greetings” (Ojibwe or Chippewa).

6. Kateri Kekakwitha (1656–80), “Lily of the Mohawk,” born in what is now upstate New York to a Mohawk father and an Algonquin mother who was a devout Christian. Following the deaths of her parents, Kateri moved to a Jesuit mission near Montreal to spend the rest of her short life in prayer and chastity. Credited with miracles after her death, she was beatified in 1980 and canonized in 1991.

"I know," I stuttered on. "In the hopes they will crown her."

"Lipsha," she said, "I never heard of such a thing."

So I told her. "Well the truth is," I said, "it's a kind of medicine."

"For what?"

"Love."

"Oh Lipsha," she said after a moment, "you don't need any medicine. I'm sure any girl would like you exactly the way you are."

I just sat there. I felt miserable, caught in my pack of lies.

"Tell you what," she said, seeing how bad I felt, "my blessing won't make any difference anyway. But there is something you can do."

I looked up at her, hopeless.

"Just be yourself."

I looked down at my plate. I knew I wasn't much to brag about right then, and I shortly became even less. For as I walked out the door I stuck my fingers in the cup of holy water that was sacred from their touches. I put my fingers in and blessed the hearts, quick, with my own hand.

I went back to Grandma and sat down in her little kitchen at the Senior Citizens. I unwrapped them hearts on the table, and her hard agate eyes went soft. She said she wasn't even going to cook those hearts up but eat them raw so their power would go down strong as possible.

I couldn't hardly watch when she munched hers. Now that's true love. I was worried about how she would get Grandpa to eat his, but she told me she'd think of something and don't worry. So I did not. I was supposed to hide off in her bedroom while she put dinner on a plate for Grandpa and fixed up the heart so he'd eat it. I caught a glint of the plate she was making for him. She put that heart smack on a piece of lettuce like in a restaurant and then attached to it a little heap of boiled peas.

He sat down. I was listening in the next room.

She said, "Why don't you have some mash potato?" So he had some mash potato. Then she gave him a little piece of boiled meat. He ate that. Then she said, "Why you didn't never touch your salad yet. See that heart? I'm feeding you it because the doctor said your blood needs building up."

I couldn't help it, at that point I peeked through a crack in the door.

I saw Grandpa picking at that heart on his plate with a certain look. He didn't look appetized at all, is what I'm saying. I doubted our plan was going to work. Grandma was getting worried, too. She told him one more time, loudly, that he had to eat that heart.

"Swallow it down," she said. "You'll hardly notice it."

He just looked at her straight on. The way he looked at her made me think I was going to see the smokescreen drop a second time, and sure enough it happened.

"What you want me to eat this for so bad?" he asked her uncannily.

Now Grandma knew the jig was up. She knew that he knew she was working medicine. He put his fork down. He rolled the heart around his saucer plate.

"I don't want to eat this," he said to Grandma. "It don't look good."

"Why it's fresh grade-A," she told him. "One hundred percent."

He didn't ask percent what, but his eyes took on an even more warier look.

"Just go on and try it," she said, taking the salt shaker up in her hand. She was getting annoyed. "Not tasty enough? You want me to salt it for you?" She waved the shaker over his plate.

"All right, skinny white girl!" She had got Grandpa mad. Oopsy-daisy, he popped the heart into his mouth. I was about to yawn loudly and come out of the bedroom. I was about ready for this crash of wills to be over, when I saw he was still up to his old tricks. First he rolled it into one side of his cheek. "Mmmmm," he said. Then he rolled it into the other side of his cheek. "Mmmmmmm," again. Then he stuck his tongue out with the heart on it and put it back, and there was no time to react. He had pulled Grandma's leg once too far. Her goat was got. She was so mad she hopped up quick as a wink and slugged him between the shoulderblades to make him swallow.

125 Only thing is, he choked.

He choked real bad. A person can choke to death. You ever sit down at a restaurant table and up above you there is a list of instructions what to do if something slides down the wrong pipe? It sure makes you chew slow, that's for damn sure. When Grandpa fell off his chair better believe me that little graphic illustrated poster fled into my mind. I jumped out the bedroom. I done everything within my power that I could do to unlodge what was choking him. I squeezed underneath his rib cage. I socked him in the back. I was desperate. But here's the factor of decision: he wasn't choking on the heart alone. There was more to it than that. It was other things that choked him as well. It didn't seem like he wanted to struggle or fight. Death came and tapped his chest, so he went just like that. I'm sorry all through my body at what I done to him with that heart, and there's those who will say Lipsha Morrissey is just excusing himself off the hook by giving song and dance about how Grandpa gave up.

Maybe I can't admit what I did. My touch had gone worthless, that is true. But here is what I seen while he lay in my arms.

You hear a person's life will flash before their eyes when they're in danger. It was him in danger, not me, but it was his life come over me. I saw him dying, and it was like someone pulled the shade down in a room. His eyes clouded over and squeezed shut, but just before that I looked in. He was still fishing in the middle of Matchimanito. Big thoughts was on his line and he had half a case of beer in the boat. He waved at me, grinned, and then the bobber went under.

Grandma had gone out of the room crying for help. I bunched my force up in my hands and I held him. I was so wound up I couldn't even breathe. All the moments he had spent with me, all the times he had hoisted me on his shoulders or pointed into the leaves was concentrated in that moment. Time was flashing back and forth like a pinball machine. Lights blinked and balls hopped and rubber bands chirped, until suddenly I realized the last ball had gone down the drain and there was nothing. I felt his force leaving him, flowing out of Grandpa never to return. I felt his mind weakening. The bobber going under in the lake. And I felt the touch retreat back into the darkness inside my body, from where it came.

130 One time, long ago, both of us were fishing together. We caught a big old snapper what started towing us around like it was a motor. "This here fishline is pretty damn good," Grandpa said. "Let's keep this turtle on and see where he takes us." So we rode along behind that turtle, watching as from time to time it surfaced. The thing was just about the size of a washtub. It took us all around the lake twice, and as it was traveling, Grandpa said something as a joke. "Lipsha," he said, "we are glad your mother didn't want you because we was always looking for a boy like you who would tow us around the lake."

"I ain't no snapper. Snappers is so stupid they stay alive when their head's chopped off," I said.

"That ain't stupidity," said Grandpa. "Their brain's just in their heart, like yours is."

When I looked up, I knew the fuse had blown between my heart and my mind and that a terrible understanding was to be given.

Grandma got back into the room and I saw her stumble. And then she went down too. It was like a house you can't hardly believe has stood so long, through years of record weather, suddenly goes down in the worst yet. It makes sense, is what I'm saying, but you still can't hardly believe it. You think a person you know has got through death and illness and being broke and living on commodity rice will get through anything. Then they fold and you see how fragile were the stones that underpinned them. You see how instantly the ground can shift you thought was solid. You see the stop signs and the yellow dividing markers of roads you traveled and all the instructions you had played according to vanish. You see how all the everyday things you counted on was just a dream you had been having by which you run your whole life. She had been over me, like a sheer overhang of rock dividing Lipsha Morrissey from outer space. And now she went underneath. It was as though the banks gave way on the shores of Matchimanito, and where Grandpa's passing was just the bobber swallowed under by his biggest thought, her fall was the house and the rock under it sliding after, sending half the lake splashing up to the clouds.

Where there was nothing.

You play them games never knowing what you see. When I fell into the dream alongside of both of them I saw that the dominions I had defended myself from anciently was but delusions of the screen. Blips of light. And I was scot-free now, whistling through space.

I don't know how I come back. I don't know from where. They was slapping my face when I arrived back at Senior Citizens and they was oxygenating her. I saw her chest move, almost unwilling. She sighed the way she would when somebody bothered her in the middle of a row of beads she was counting. I think it irritated her to no end that they brought her back. I knew from the way she looked after they took the mask off, she was not going to forgive them disturbing her restful peace. Nor was she forgiving Lipsha Morrissey. She had been stepping out onto the road of death, she told the children later at the funeral. I asked was there any stop signs or dividing markers on that road, but she clamped her lips in a vise the way she always done when she was mad.

Which didn't bother me. I knew when things had cleared out she wouldn't have no choice. I was not going to speculate where the blame was put for Grandpa's death. We was in it together. She had slugged him between the shoulders. My touch had failed him, never to return.

All the blood children and the took-ins, like me, came home from Minneapolis and Chicago, where they had relocated years ago. They stayed with friends on the reservation or with Aurelia or slept on Grandma's floor. They were struck down with grief and bereavement to be sure, every one of them. At the funeral I sat down in the back of the church with Albertine. She had gotten all skinny and ragged haired from cramming all her years of study into two or three. She had decided that to be a nurse was not enough for her so she was going to be a doctor. But the way she was straining her mind didn't look too hopeful. Her eyes were bloodshot from driving and crying. She took my hand. From the back we watched all the children and the mourners as they hunched over their prayers, their hands stuffed full of Kleenex. It was someplace in that long sad service that my vision shifted. I began to see things different, more clear. The family kneeling down turned to rocks in a field. It struck me how strong and reliable grief was, and death. Until the end of time, death would be our rock.

140 So I had perspective on it all, for death gives you that. All the Kashpaw children had done various things to me in their lives—shared their folks with me, loaned me cash, beat me up in secret—and I decided, because of death, then and there I'd call it quits. If I ever saw King again, I'd shake his hand. Forgiving somebody else made the whole thing easier to bear.

Everybody saw Grandpa off into the next world. And then the Kashpaws had to get back to their jobs, which was numerous and impressive. I had a few beers with them and I went back to Grandma, who had sort of got lost in the shuffle of everybody being sad about Grandpa and glad to see one another.

Zelda had sat beside her the whole time and was sitting with her now. I wanted to talk to Grandma, say how sorry I was, that it wasn't her fault, but only mine. I would have, but Zelda gave me one of her looks of strict warning as if to say, "I'll take care of Grandma. Don't horn in on the women."

If only Zelda knew, I thought, the sad realities would change her. But of course I couldn't tell the dark truth.

It was evening, late. Grandma's light was on underneath a crack in the door. About a week had passed since we buried Grandpa. I knocked first but there wasn't no answer, so I went right in. The door was unlocked. She was there but she didn't notice me at first. Her hands were tied up in her rosary, and her gaze was fully absorbed in the easy chair opposite her, the one that had always been Grandpa's favorite. I stood there, staring with her, at the little green nubs in the cloth and plastic armrest covers and the sad little hair-tonic stain he had made on the white doily where he laid his head. For the life of me I couldn't figure what she was staring at. Thin space. Then she turned.

145 "He ain't gone yet," she said.

Remember that chill I luckily didn't get from waiting in the slough? I got it now. I felt it start from the very center of me, where fear hides, waiting to attack. It spiraled outward so that in minutes my fingers and teeth were shaking and clattering. I knew she told the truth. She seen Grandpa. Whether or not he had been there is not the point. She had seen him, and that meant anybody else could see him, too. Not only that but, as is usually the case with these here ghosts, he had a certain uneasy reason to come back. And of course Grandma Kashpaw had scanned it out.

I sat down. We sat together on the couch watching his chair out of the corner of our eyes. She had found him sitting in his chair when she walked in the door.

"It's the love medicine, my Lipsha," she said. "It was stronger than we thought. He came back even after death to claim me to his side."

I was afraid. "We shouldn't have tampered with it," I said. She agreed. For a while we sat still. I don't know what she thought, but my head felt screwed on backward. I couldn't accurately consider the situation, so I told Grandma to go to bed. I would sleep on the couch keeping my eye on Grandpa's chair. Maybe he would come back and maybe he wouldn't. I guess I feared the one as much as the other, but I got to thinking, see, as I lay there in darkness, that perhaps even through my terrible mistakes some good might come. If Grandpa did come back, I thought he'd return in his right mind. I could talk with him. I could tell him it was all my fault for playing with power I did not understand. Maybe he'd forgive me and rest in peace. I hoped this. I calmed myself and waited for him all night.

He fooled me though. He knew what I was waiting for, and it wasn't what he was looking to hear. Come dawn I heard a blood-splitting cry from the bedroom and I rushed in there. Grandma turned the lights on. She was sitting on the edge of the bed and her face looked harsh, pinched-up, gray. 150

"He was here," she said. "He came and laid down next to me in bed. And he touched me."

Her heart broke down. She cried. His touch was so cold. She laid back in bed after a while, as it was morning, and I went to the couch. As I lay there, falling asleep, I suddenly felt Grandpa's presence and the barrier between us like a swollen river. I felt how I had wronged him. How awful was the place where I had sent him. Behind the wall of death, he'd watched the living eat and cry and get drunk. He was lonesome, but I understood he meant no harm.

"Go back," I said to the dark, afraid and yet full of pity. "You got to be with your own kind now," I said. I felt him retreating, like a sigh, growing less. I felt his spirit as it shrunk back through the walls, the blinds, the brick courtyard of Senior Citizens. "Look up Aunt June," I whispered as he left.

I slept late the next morning, a good hard sleep allowing the sun to rise and warm the earth. It was past noon when I awoke. There is nothing, to my mind, like a long sleep to make those hard decisions that you neglect under stress of wakefulness. Soon as I woke up that morning, I saw exactly what I'd say to Grandma. I had gotten humble in the past week, not just losing the touch but getting jolted into the understanding that would prey on me from here on out. Your life feels different on you, once you greet death and understand your heart's position. You wear your life like a garment from the mission bundle sale ever after—lightly because you realize you never paid nothing for it, cherishing because you know you won't ever come by such a bargain again. Also you have the feeling someone wore it before you and someone will after. I can't explain that, not yet, but I'm putting my mind to it.

"Grandma," I said, "I got to be honest about the love medicine." 155

She listened. I knew from then on she would be listening to me the way I had listened to her before. I told her about the turkey hearts and how I had them blessed. I told her what I used as love medicine was purely a fake, and then I said to her what my understanding brought me.

"Love medicine ain't what brings him back to you, Grandma. No, it's something else. He loved you over time and distance, but he went off so quick he never got the chance to tell you how he loves you, how he doesn't blame you, how he understands. It's true feeling, not no magic. No supermarket heart could have brung him back."

She looked at me. She was seeing the years and days I had no way of knowing, and she didn't believe me. I could tell this. Yet a look came on her face. It was like the look of mothers drinking sweetness from their children's eyes. It was tenderness.

"Lipsha," she said, "you was always my favorite."

160 She took the beads off the bedpost, where she kept them to say at night, and she told me to put out my hand. When I did this, she shut the beads inside of my fist and held them there a long minute, tight, so my hand hurt. I almost cried when she did this. I don't really know why. Tears shot up behind my eyelids, and yet it was nothing. I didn't understand, except her hand was so strong, squeezing mine.

The earth was full of life and there were dandelions growing out the window, thick as thieves, already seeded, fat as big yellow plungers. She let my hand go. I got up. "I'll go out and dig a few dandelions," I told her.

Outside, the sun was hot and heavy as a hand on my back. I felt it flow down my arms, out my fingers, arrowing through the ends of the fork into the earth. With every root I prized up there was return, as if I was kin to its secret lesson. The touch got stronger as I worked through the grassy afternoon. Uncurling from me like a seed out of the blackness where I was lost, the touch spread. The spiked leaves full of bitter mother's milk. A buried root. A nuisance people dig up and throw in the sun to wither. A globe of frail seeds that's indestructible.

WILLIAM FAULKNER

A Rose for Emily

(See Faulkner biography on p. 217.)

I

When Miss Emily Grierson died, our whole town went to her funeral: the men through a sort of respectful affection for a fallen monument, the women mostly out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old manservant—a combined gardener and cook—had seen in at least ten years.

It was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies,¹ set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood; only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar-bemused cemetery among the ranked and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell at the battle of Jefferson.

Alive, Miss Emily had been a tradition, a duty, and a care; a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town, dating from that day in 1894 when Colonel Sartoris, the mayor—he who fathered the edict that no Negro woman should appear on the streets without an apron—remitted her taxes, the dispensation dating from the death of her father on into perpetuity. Not that Miss Emily would have accepted charity. Colonel Sartoris invented an involved tale to the effect that Miss Emily's father had loaned money to the town, which the town, as a matter of business, preferred this way of repaying. Only a man of Colonel Sartoris' generation and thought could have invented it, and only a woman could have believed it.

When the next generation, with its more modern ideas, became mayors and aldermen, this arrangement created some little dissatisfaction. On the first of the year they mailed her a tax notice. February came, and there was no reply. They wrote her a formal letter, asking her to call at the sheriff's office at her convenience. A week later the mayor wrote her himself, offering to call or to send his car for her, and received in reply a note on paper of an archaic shape, in a thin, flowing calligraphy in faded ink, to the effect that she no longer went out at all. The tax notice was also enclosed, without comment.

They called a special meeting of the Board of Aldermen. A deputation waited 5 upon her, knocked at the door through which no visitor had passed since she ceased giving china-painting lessons eight or ten years earlier. They were admitted by the old Negro into a dim hall from which a stairway mounted into still more shadow. It smelled of dust and disuse—a close, dank smell. The Negro led them into the parlor. It was furnished in heavy, leather-covered furniture. When the Negro opened the blinds of one window, a faint dust rose sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes in the single sun-ray. On a tarnished gilt easel before the fireplace stood a crayon portrait of Miss Emily's father.

They rose when she entered—a small, fat woman in black, with a thin gold chain descending to her waist and vanishing into her belt, leaning on an ebony cane with a tarnished gold head. Her skeleton was small and spare; perhaps that was why what would have been merely plumpness in another was obesity in her. She looked bloated, like a body long submerged in motionless water, and of that pallid hue. Her eyes, lost in the fatty ridges of her face, looked like two small pieces of coal pressed into a lump of dough as they moved from one face to another while the visitors stated their errand.

She did not ask them to sit. She just stood in the door and listened quietly until the spokesman came to a stumbling halt. Then they could hear the invisible watch ticking at the end of the gold chain.

Her voice was dry and cold. "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Colonel Sartoris explained it to me. Perhaps one of you can gain access to the city records and satisfy yourselves."

"But we have. We are the city authorities, Miss Emily. Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"

"I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said. "Perhaps he considers himself the 10 sheriff. . . . I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see. We must go by the—"

"See Colonel Sartoris. I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But, Miss Emily—"

"See Colonel Sartoris." (Colonel Sartoris had been dead almost ten years.) "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Tobe!" The Negro appeared. "Show these gentlemen out."

II

- 15 So she vanquished them, horse and foot, just as she had vanquished their fathers thirty years before about the smell. That was two years after her father's death and a short time after her sweetheart—the one we believed would marry her—had deserted her. After her father's death she went out very little; after her sweetheart went away, people hardly saw her at all. A few of the ladies had the temerity to call, but were not received, and the only sign of life about the place was the Negro man—a young man then—going in and out with a market basket.

"Just as if a man—any man—could keep a kitchen properly," the ladies said; so they were not surprised when the smell developed. It was another link between the gross, teeming world and the high and mighty Griersons.

A neighbor, a woman, complained to the mayor, Judge Stevens, eighty years old.

"But what will you have me do about it, madam?" he said.

"Why, send her word to stop it," the woman said. "Isn't there a law?"

- 20 "I'm sure that won't be necessary," Judge Stevens said. "It's probably just a snake or a rat that nigger of hers killed in the yard. I'll speak to him about it."

The next day he received two more complaints, one from a man who came in diffident deprecation. "We really must do something about it, Judge. I'd be the last one in the world to bother Miss Emily, but we've got to do something." That night the Board of Aldermen met—three gray-beards and one younger man, a member of the rising generation.

"It's simple enough," he said. "Send her word to have her place cleaned up. Give her a certain time to do it in, and if she don't . . ."

"Dammit, sir," Judge Stevens said, "will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?"

So the next night, after midnight, four men crossed Miss Emily's lawn and slunk about the house like burglars, sniffing along the base of the brickwork and at the cellar openings while one of them performed a regular sowing motion with his hand out of a sack slung from his shoulder. They broke open the cellar door and sprinkled lime there, and in all the outbuildings. As they recrossed the lawn, a window that had been dark was lighted and Miss Emily sat in it, the light behind her, and her upright torso motionless as that of an idol. They crept quietly across the lawn and into the shadow of the locusts that lined the street. After a week or two the smell went away.

- 25 That was when people had begun to feel really sorry for her. People in our town, remembering how old lady Wyatt, her great-aunt, had gone completely crazy at last, believed that the Griersons held themselves a little too high for what they really were. None of the young men were quite good enough for Miss Emily and such. We had long thought of them as a tableau; Miss Emily a slender figure in white in the background, her father a spraddled silhouette in the foreground, his back to her and clutching a horsewhip, the two of them framed by the back-flung front door. So when she got to be thirty and was still single, we were not pleased exactly, but vindicated; even with insanity in the family she wouldn't have turned down all of her chances if they had really materialized.

When her father died, it got about that the house was all that was left to her; and in a way, people were glad. At last they could pity Miss Emily. Being left alone, and a pauper, she had become humanized. Now she too would know the old thrill and the old despair of a penny more or less.

The day after his death all the ladies prepared to call at the house and offer condolence and aid, as is our custom. Miss Emily met them at the door, dressed as usual and with no trace of grief on her face. She told them that her father was not dead. She did that for three days, with the ministers calling on her, and the doctors, trying to persuade her to let them dispose of the body. Just as they were about to resort to law and force, she broke down, and they buried her father quickly.

We did not say she was crazy then. We believed she had to do that. We remembered all the young men her father had driven away, and we knew that with nothing left, she would have to cling to that which had robbed her, as people will.

III

She was sick for a long time. When we saw her again, her hair was cut short, making her look like a girl, with a vague resemblance to those angels in colored church windows—sort of tragic and serene.

The town had just let the contracts for paving the sidewalks, and in the summer after her father's death they began to work. The construction company came with niggers and mules and machinery, and a foreman named Homer Barron, a Yankee—a big, dark, ready man, with a big voice and eyes lighter than his face. The little boys would follow in groups to hear him cuss the niggers, and the niggers singing in time to the rise and fall of picks. Pretty soon he knew everybody in town. Whenever you heard a lot of laughing anywhere about the square, Homer Barron would be in the center of the group. Presently we began to see him and Miss Emily on Sunday afternoons driving in the yellow-wheeled buggy and the matched team of bays from the livery stable.

At first we were glad that Miss Emily would have an interest, because the ladies all said, "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer." But there were still others, older people, who said that even grief could not cause a real lady to forget noblesse oblige—without calling it noblesse oblige.² They just said, "Poor Emily. Her kinsfolk should come to her." She had some kin in Alabama; but years ago her father had fallen out with them over the estate of old lady Wyatt, the crazy woman, and there was no communication between the two families. They had not even been represented at the funeral.

And as soon as the old people said, "Poor Emily," the whispering began. "Do you suppose it's really so?" they said to one another. "Of course it is. What else could . . ." This behind their hands; rustling of craned silk and satin behind *jalousies*³ closed upon the sun of Sunday afternoon as the thin, swift clop-clop-clop of the matched team passed: "Poor Emily."

2. Obligation, coming with noble or upper-class birth, to behave with honor and generosity toward those less privileged.

3. Window blinds made of adjustable horizontal slats.

She carried her head high enough—even when we believed that she was fallen. It was as if she demanded more than ever the recognition of her dignity as the last Grierson; as if it had wanted that touch of earthiness to reaffirm her imperviousness. Like when she bought the rat poison, the arsenic. That was over a year after they had begun to say “Poor Emily,” and while the two female cousins were visiting her.

“I want some poison,” she said to the druggist. She was over thirty then, still a slight woman, though thinner than usual, with cold, haughty black eyes in a face the flesh of which was strained across the temples and about the eyesockets as you imagine a lighthouse-keeper’s face ought to look. “I want some poison,” she said.

35 “Yes, Miss Emily. What kind? For rats and such? I’d recom—”

“I want the best you have. I don’t care what kind.”

The druggist named several. “They’ll kill anything up to an elephant. But what you want is—”

“Arsenic,” Miss Emily said. “Is that a good one?”

“Is . . . arsenic? Yes ma’am. But what you want—”

40 “I want arsenic.”

The druggist looked down at her. She looked back at him, erect, her face like a strained flag. “Why, of course,” the druggist said. “If that’s what you want. But the law requires you to tell what you are going to use it for.”

Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye for eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up. The Negro delivery boy brought her the package; the druggist didn’t come back. When she opened the package at home there was written on the box, under the skull and bones: “For rats.”

IV

So the next day we all said, “She will kill herself”; and we said it would be the best thing. When she had first begun to be seen with Homer Barron, we had said, “She will marry him.” Then we said, “She will persuade him yet,” because Homer himself had remarked—he liked men, and it was known that he drank with the younger men in the Elk’s Club—that he was not a marrying man. Later we said, “Poor Emily,” behind the jalousies as they passed on Sunday afternoon in the glittering buggy, Miss Emily with her head high and Homer Barron with his hat cocked and a cigar in his teeth, reins and whip in a yellow glove.

Then some of the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere, but at last the ladies forced the Baptist minister—Miss Emily’s people were Episcopal—to call upon her. He would never divulge what happened during that interview, but he refused to go back again. The next Sunday they again drove about the streets, and the following day the minister’s wife wrote to Miss Emily’s relations in Alabama.

45 So she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments. At first nothing happened. Then we were sure that they were to be married. We learned that Miss Emily had been to the jeweler’s and ordered a man’s toilet set in silver, with the letters H. B. on each piece. Two days later we learned that she had bought a complete outfit of men’s clothing, including a night-shirt, and we said, "They are married." We were really glad. We were glad because the two female cousins were even more Grierson than Miss Emily had ever been.

So we were not surprised when Homer Barron—the streets had been finished some time since—was gone. We were a little disappointed that there was not a public blowing-off, but we believed that he had gone on to prepare for Miss Emily's coming, or to give her a chance to get rid of the cousins. (By that time it was a cabal, and we were all Miss Emily's allies to help circumvent the cousins.) Sure enough, after another week they departed. And, as we had expected all along, within three days Homer Barron was back in town. A neighbor saw the Negro man admit him at the kitchen door at dusk one evening.

And that was the last we saw of Homer Barron. And of Miss Emily for some time. The Negro man went in and out with the market basket, but the front door remained closed. Now and then we would see her at a window for a moment, as the men did that night when they sprinkled the lime, but for almost six months she did not appear on the streets. Then we knew that this was to be expected too; as if that quality of her father which had thwarted her woman's life so many times had been too virulent and too furious to die.

When we next saw Miss Emily, she had grown fat and her hair was turning gray. During the next few years it grew grayer and grayer until it attained an even pepper-and-salt iron-gray, when it ceased turning. Up to the day of her death at seventy-four it was still that vigorous iron-gray, like the hair of an active man.

From that time on her front door remained closed, save for a period of six or seven years, when she was about forty, during which she gave lessons in china-painting. She fitted up a studio in one of the downstairs rooms, where the daughters and grand-daughters of Colonel Sartoris' contemporaries were sent to her with the same regularity and in the same spirit that they were sent on Sundays with a twenty-five cent piece for the collection plate. Meanwhile her taxes had been remitted.

Then the newer generation became the backbone and the spirit of the town, 50 and the painting pupils grew up and fell away and did not send their children to her with boxes of color and tedious brushes and pictures cut from the ladies' magazines. The front door closed upon the last one and remained closed for good. When the town got free postal delivery Miss Emily alone refused to let them fasten the metal numbers above her door and attach a mailbox to it. She would not listen to them.

Daily, monthly, yearly we watched the Negro grow grayer and more stooped, going in and out with the market basket. Each December we sent her a tax notice, which would be returned by the post office a week later, unclaimed. Now and then we would see her in one of the downstairs windows—she had evidently shut up the top floor of the house—like the carved torso of an idol in a niche, looking or not looking at us, we could never tell which. Thus she passed from generation to generation—dear, inescapable, impervious, tranquil, and perverse.

And so she died. Fell ill in the house filled with dust and shadows, with only a doddering Negro man to wait on her. We did not even know she was sick; we had long since given up trying to get any information from the Negro. He talked to no one, probably not even to her, for his voice had grown harsh and rusty, as if from disuse.

She died in one of the downstairs rooms, in a heavy walnut bed with a curtain, her gray head propped on a pillow yellow and moldy with age and lack of sunlight.

The Negro met the first of the ladies at the front door and let them in, with their hushed, sibilant voices and their quick, curious glances, and then he disappeared. He walked right through the house and out the back and was not seen again.

55 The two female cousins came at once. They held the funeral on the second day, with the town coming to look at Miss Emily beneath a mass of bought flowers, with the crayon face of her father musing profoundly above the bier and the ladies sibilant and macabre; and the very old men—some in their brushed Confederate uniforms—on the porch and the lawn, talking of Miss Emily as if she had been a contemporary of theirs, believing that they had danced with her and courted her perhaps, confusing time with its mathematical progression, as the old do, to whom all the past is not a diminishing road, but, instead, a huge meadow which no winter ever quite touches, divided from them now by the narrow bottleneck of the most recent decade of years.

Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Miss Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.

The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin, acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as for a bridal: upon the valance curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay a collar and tie, as if they had just been removed, which, lifted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded; beneath it the two mute shoes and the discarded socks.

The man himself lay in the bed.

For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin. The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left of him, rotted beneath what was left of the night-shirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay; and upon him and upon the pillow beside him lay that even coating of the patient and biding dust.

60 Then we noticed that in the second pillow was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY

(1899–1961)

Hills Like White Elephants

Among the most distinctively American of writers, even if he rarely wrote about America, Ernest Hemingway grew up in an upscale Chicago suburb, but spent his summers on Lake Walloon in northern Michigan. Here, his physician father nurtured his love of hunting and fishing. Hemingway graduated from high school just two months after the United States entered World War I. Forbidden to enlist by his parents and uninterested in college, he worked as a reporter for the Kansas City Star before volunteering as a Red Cross ambulance driver. Badly wounded on the Italian front, he returned to the States and to journalism. Then, in 1921, he moved to Paris, France, entering the famed expatriate circle that included Ezra Pound, Gertrude Stein, and F. Scott Fitzgerald. Two volumes of stories, In Our Time (1925) and Men without Women (1927), and two major novels, The Sun Also Rises (1926) and A Farewell to Arms (1929), established Hemingway's international reputation as both a masterful literary craftsman and a chief spokesman for the "Lost Generation," while later, less critically acclaimed books on topics such as bullfighting (Death in the Afternoon, 1932) and big-game hunting (Green Hills of Africa, 1935) helped confirm his status as an almost mythic figure, patron saint of what the New York Times called a "cult" of daring and danger. Hemingway supported the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War—the subject of his novel For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940); served as a war correspondent during World War II; and survived two plane crashes and four marriages. Severely depressed and suffering an array of physical ailments, he took his own life shortly before his sixty-second birthday, only a few years after earning both a Pulitzer—for The Old Man and the Sea (1952)—and a Nobel (1954).

The hills across the valley of the Ebro¹ were long and white. On this side there was no shade and no trees and the station was between two lines of rails in the sun. Close against the side of the station there was the warm shadow of the building and a curtain, made of strings of bamboo beads, hung across the open door into the bar, to keep out flies. The American and the girl with him sat at a table in the shade, outside the building. It was very hot and the express from Barcelona would come in forty minutes. It stopped at this junction for two minutes and went on to Madrid.

"What should we drink?" the girl asked. She had taken off her hat and put it on the table.

"It's pretty hot," the man said.

"Let's drink beer."

"Dos cervezas," the man said into the curtain.

"Big ones?" a woman asked from the doorway.

"Yes. Two big ones."

1. River in northern Spain.

The woman brought two glasses of beer and two felt pads. She put the felt pads and the beer glasses on the table and looked at the man and the girl. The girl was looking off at the line of hills. They were white in the sun and the country was brown and dry.

"They look like white elephants," she said.

10 "I've never seen one," the man drank his beer.

"No, you wouldn't have."

"I might have," the man said. "Just because you say I wouldn't have doesn't prove anything."

The girl looked at the bead curtain. "They've painted something on it," she said. "What does it say?"

"Anis del Toro. It's a drink."

15 "Could we try it?"

The man called "Listen" through the curtain. The woman came out from the bar.

"Four reales."²

"We want two Anis del Toro."

"With water?"

20 "Do you want it with water?"

"I don't know," the girl said. "Is it good with water?"

"It's all right."

"You want them with water?" asked the woman.

"Yes, with water."

25 "It tastes like licorice," the girl said and put the glass down.

"That's the way with everything."

"Yes," said the girl. "Everything tastes of licorice. Especially all the things you've waited so long for, like absinthe."

"Oh, cut it out."

"You started it," the girl said. "I was being amused. I was having a fine time."

30 "Well, let's try and have a fine time."

"All right. I was trying. I said the mountains looked like white elephants. Wasn't that bright?"

"That was bright."

"I wanted to try this new drink. That's all we do, isn't it—look at things and try new drinks?"

"I guess so."

35 The girl looked across at the hills.

"They're lovely hills," she said. "They don't really look like white elephants. I just meant the coloring of their skin through the trees."

"Should we have another drink?"

"All right."

The warm wind blew the bead curtain against the table.

40 "The beer's nice and cool," the man said.

"It's lovely," the girl said.

"It's really an awfully simple operation, Jig," the man said. "It's not really an operation at all."

2. Spanish coins.

The girl looked at the ground the table legs rested on.

"I know you wouldn't mind it, Jig. It's really not anything. It's just to let the air in."

The girl did not say anything.

45

"I'll go with you and I'll stay with you all the time. They just let the air in and then it's all perfectly natural."

"Then what will we do afterward?"

"We'll be fine afterward. Just like we were before."

"What makes you think so?"

"That's the only thing that bothers us. It's the only thing that's made us unhappy."

The girl looked at the bead curtain, put her hand out and took hold of two of the strings of beads.

"And you think then we'll be all right and be happy."

"I know we will. You don't have to be afraid. I've known lots of people that have done it."

"So have I," said the girl. "And afterward they were all so happy."

"Well," the man said, "if you don't want to you don't have to. I wouldn't have you do it if you didn't want to. But I know it's perfectly simple."

"And you really want to?"

"I think it's the best thing to do. But I don't want you to do it if you don't really want to."

"And if I do it you'll be happy and things will be like they were and you'll love me?"

"I love you now. You know I love you."

"I know. But if I do it, then it will be nice again if I say things are like white elephants, and you'll like it?"

60

"I'll love it. I love it now but I just can't think about it. You know how I get when I worry."

"If I do it you won't ever worry?"

"I won't worry about that because it's perfectly simple."

"Then I'll do it. Because I don't care about me."

"What do you mean?"

65

"I don't care about me."

"Well, I care about you."

"Oh, yes. But I don't care about me. And I'll do it and then everything will be fine."

"I don't want you to do it if you feel that way."

The girl stood up and walked to the end of the station. Across, on the other side, were fields of grain and trees along the banks of the Ebro. Far away, beyond the river, were mountains. The shadow of a cloud moved across the field of grain and she saw the river through the trees.

"And we could have all this," she said. "And we could have everything and every day we make it more impossible."

"What did you say?"

"I said we could have everything."

"We can have everything."

"No, we can't."

75

"We can have the whole world."

"No, we can't."

"We can go everywhere."

"No, we can't. It isn't ours anymore."

80 "It's ours."

"No, it isn't. And once they take it away, you never get it back."

"But they haven't taken it away."

"We'll wait and see."

"Come on back in the shade," he said. "You mustn't feel that way."

85 "I don't feel any way," the girl said. "I just know things."

"I don't want you to do anything that you don't want to do—"

"Nor that isn't good for me," she said. "I know. Could we have another beer?"

"All right. But you've got to realize—"

"I realize," the girl said. "Can't we maybe stop talking?"

90 They sat down at the table and the girl looked across at the hills on the dry side of the valley and the man looked at her and at the table.

"You've got to realize," he said, "that I don't want you to do it if you don't want to. I'm perfectly willing to go through with it if it means anything to you."

"Doesn't it mean anything to you? We could get along."

"Of course it does. But I don't want anybody but you. I don't want any one else. And I know it's perfectly simple."

"Yes, you know it's perfectly simple."

95 "It's all right for you to say that, but I do know it."

"Would you do something for me now?"

"I'd do anything for you."

"Would you please please please please please please stop talking?"

He did not say anything but looked at the bags against the wall of the station. There were labels on them from all the hotels where they had spent nights.

100 "But I don't want you to," he said, "I don't care anything about it."

"I'll scream," the girl said.

The woman came out through the curtains with two glasses of beer and put them down on the damp felt pads. "The train comes in five minutes," she said.

"What did she say?" asked the girl.

"That the train is coming in five minutes."

105 The girl smiled brightly at the woman, to thank her.

"I'd better take the bags over to the other side of the station," the man said. She smiled at him.

"All right. Then come back and we'll finish the beer."

He picked up the two heavy bags and carried them around the station to the other tracks. He looked up the tracks but could not see the train. Coming back, he walked through the barroom, where people waiting for the train were drinking. He drank an Anis at the bar and looked at the people. They were all waiting reasonably for the train. He went out through the bead curtain. She was sitting at the table and smiled at him.

"Do you feel better?" he asked.

110 "I feel fine," she said. "There's nothing wrong with me. I feel fine."

FRANZ KAFKA

(1883–1924)

A Hunger Artist¹

Born into a middle-class Jewish family in Prague, Franz Kafka earned a doctorate in law from the German University in that city and held an inconspicuous position in the civil service for many years. Emotionally and physically ill for the last seven or eight years of his short life, he died of tuberculosis in Vienna, never having married (though he was twice engaged to the same woman and lived with an actress in Berlin for some time before he died) and not having published his three major novels, The Trial (1925), The Castle (1926), and Amerika (1927). Indeed, he ordered his friend Max Brod to destroy them and other works he had left in manuscript. Fortunately, Brod did not; and not long after Kafka's death, his sometimes-dreamlike, sometimes-nightmarish work became known and admired all over the world. His stories in English translation are collected in The Great Wall of China (1933), The Penal Colony (1948), and The Complete Stories (1976).

During these last decades the interest in professional fasting has markedly diminished. It used to pay very well to stage such great performances under one's own management, but today that is quite impossible. We live in a different world now. At one time the whole town took a lively interest in the hunger artist; from day to day of his fast the excitement mounted; everybody wanted to see him at least once a day; there were people who bought season tickets for the last few days and sat from morning till night in front of his small barred cage; even in the nighttime there were visiting hours, when the whole effect was heightened by torch flares; on fine days the cage was set out in the open air, and then it was the children's special treat to see the hunger artist; for their elders he was often just a joke that happened to be in fashion, but the children stood open-mouthed, holding each other's hands for greater security, marveling at him as he sat there pallid in black tights, with his ribs sticking out so prominently, not even on a seat but down among straw on the ground, sometimes giving a courteous nod, answering questions with a constrained smile, or perhaps stretching an arm through the bars so that one might feel how thin it was, and then again withdrawing deep into himself, paying no attention to anyone or anything, not even to the all-important striking of the clock that was the only piece of furniture in his cage, but merely staring into vacancy with half-shut eyes, now and then taking a sip from a tiny glass of water to moisten his lips.

Besides casual onlookers there were also relays of permanent watchers selected by the public, usually butchers, strangely enough, and it was their task to watch the hunger artist day and night, three of them at a time, in case he should have some secret recourse to nourishment. This was nothing but a formality, instituted to reassure the masses, for the initiates knew well enough that during his fast the artist would never in any circumstances, not even under forcible compulsion, swallow the smallest morsel of food: the honor of his profession forbade it. Not every watcher, of course, was capable of understanding this, there were often groups of night watchers who were very lax in carrying out their duties and deliberately huddled together in a retired corner to play cards with great absorption, obviously intending to give the hunger artist the chance of a little refreshment, which they supposed he could draw from some private hoard. Nothing annoyed the artist more than such watchers; they made him miserable; they made his fast seem unendurable; sometimes he mastered his feebleness sufficiently to sing during their watch for as long as he could keep going, to show them how unjust their suspicions were. But that was of little use; they only wondered at his cleverness in being able to fill his mouth even while singing. Much more to his taste were the watchers who sat close up to the bars, who were not content with the dim night lighting of the hall but focused him in the full glare of the electric pocket torch² given them by the impresario. The harsh light did not trouble him at all, in any case he could never sleep properly, and he could always drowse a little, whatever the light, at any hour, even when the hall was thronged with noisy onlookers. He was quite happy at the prospect of spending a sleepless night with such watchers; he was ready to exchange jokes with them, to tell them stories out of his nomadic life, anything at all to keep them awake and demonstrate to them again that he had no eatables in his cage and that he was fasting as not one of them could fast. But his happiest moment was when the morning came and an enormous breakfast was brought them, at his expense, on which they flung themselves with the keen appetite of healthy men after a weary night of wakefulness. Of course there were people who argued that this breakfast was an unfair attempt to bribe the watchers, but that was going rather too far, and when they were invited to take on a night's vigil without a breakfast, merely for the sake of the cause, they made themselves scarce, although they stuck stubbornly to their suspicions.

Such suspicions, anyhow, were a necessary accompaniment to the profession of fasting. No one could possibly watch the hunger artist continuously, day and night, and so no one could produce first-hand evidence that the fast had really been rigorous and continuous; only the artist himself could know that, he was therefore bound to be the sole completely satisfied spectator of his own fast. Yet for other reasons he was never satisfied; it was not perhaps mere fasting that had brought him to such skeleton thinness that many people had regretfully to keep away from his exhibitions, because the sight of him was too much for them, perhaps it was dissatisfaction with himself that had worn him down. For he alone knew, what no other initiate knew, how easy it was to fast. It was the easiest thing in the world. He made no secret of this, yet people did not believe him, at the best they set him down as modest; most of them, however, thought he was out for publicity or else was some kind of cheat who found it easy to fast because he had discovered a way of making it easy, and then had the impudence to admit the fact, more or less. He had to put up with all that, and in the course of time had got used to it, but his inner dissatisfaction always rankled, and never yet, after any term of fasting—this must be granted to his credit—had he left the cage of his own free will. The longest period of fasting was fixed by his impresario at forty days,³ beyond that term he was not allowed to go, not even in great cities, and there was good reason for it, too. Experience had proved that for about forty days the interest of the public could be stimulated by a steadily increasing pressure of advertisement, but after that the town began to lose interest, sympathetic support began notably to fall off; there were of course local variations as between one town and another or one country and another, but as a general rule forty days marked the limit. So on the fortieth day the flower-bedecked cage was opened, enthusiastic spectators filled the hall, a military band played, two doctors entered the cage to measure the results of the fast, which were announced through a megaphone, and finally two young ladies appeared, blissful at having been selected for the honor, to help the hunger artist down the few steps leading to a small table on which was spread a carefully chosen invalid repast. And at this very moment the artist always turned stubborn. True, he would entrust his bony arms to the outstretched helping hands of the ladies bending over him, but stand up he would not. Why stop fasting at this particular moment, after forty days of it? He had held out for a long time, an illimitably long time; why stop now, when he was in his best fasting form, or rather, not yet quite in his best fasting form? Why should he be cheated of the fame he would get for fasting longer, for being not only the record hunger artist of all time, which presumably he was already, but for beating his own record by a performance beyond human imagination, since he felt that there were no limits to his capacity for fasting? His public pretended to admire him so much, why should it have so little patience with him; if he could endure fasting longer, why shouldn't the public endure it? Besides, he was tired, he was comfortable sitting in the straw, and now he was supposed to lift himself to his full height and go down to a meal the very thought of which gave him a nausea that only the presence of the ladies kept him from betraying, and even that with an effort. And he looked up into the eyes of the ladies who were apparently so friendly and in reality so cruel, and shook his head, which felt too heavy on its strengthless neck. But then there happened yet again what always happened. The impresario came forward, without a word—for the band made speech impossible—lifted his arms in the air above the artist, as if inviting Heaven to look down upon its creature here in the straw, this suffering martyr, which indeed he was, although in quite another sense; grasped him round the emaciated waist, with exaggerated caution, so that the frail condition he was in might be appreciated; and committed him to the care of the blenching ladies, not without secretly giving him a shaking so that his legs and body tottered and swayed. The artist now submitted completely; his head lolled on his breast as if it had landed there by chance; his body was hollowed out; his legs in a spasm of self-preservation clung close to each other at the knees, yet scraped on the ground as if it were not really solid ground, as if they were only trying to find solid ground; and the whole weight of his body, a feather-weight after all, relapsed onto one of the ladies, who, looking round for help and panting a little—this post of honor was not at all what she had expected it to be—first stretched her neck as far as she could to keep her face at least free from contact with the artist, when finding this impossible, and her more fortunate companion not coming to her aid but merely holding extended on her own trembling hand the little bunch of knucklebones that was the artist's, to the great delight of the spectators burst into tears and had to be replaced by an attendant who had long been stationed in readiness. Then came the food, a little of which the impresario managed to get between the artist's lips, while he sat in a kind of half-fainting trance, to the accompaniment of cheerful patter designed to distract the public's attention from the artist's condition; after that, a toast was drunk to the public, supposedly prompted by a whisper from the artist in the impresario's ear; the band confirmed it with a mighty flourish, the spectators melted away, and no one had any cause to be dissatisfied with the proceedings, no one except the hunger artist himself, he only, as always.

So he lived for many years, with small regular intervals of recuperation, in visible glory, honored by the world, yet in spite of that troubled in spirit, and all the more troubled because no one would take his trouble seriously. What comfort could he possibly need? What more could he possibly wish for? And if some good-natured person, feeling sorry for him, tried to console him by pointing out that his melancholy was probably caused by fasting, it could happen, especially when he had been fasting for some time, that he reacted with an outburst of fury and to the general alarm began to shake the bars of his cage like a wild animal. Yet the impresario had a way of punishing these outbreaks which he rather enjoyed putting into operation. He would apologize publicly for the artist's behavior, which was only to be excused, he admitted, because of the irritability caused by fasting, a condition hardly to be understood by well-fed people; then by natural transition he went on to mention the artist's equally incomprehensible boast that he could fast for much longer than he was doing; he praised the high ambition, the good will, the great self-denial undoubtedly implicit in such a statement; and then quite simply countered it by bringing out photographs, which were also on sale to the public, showing the artist on the fortieth day of a fast lying in bed almost dead from exhaustion. This perversion of the truth, familiar to the artist though it was, always unnerved him afresh and proved too much for him. What was a consequence of the premature ending of his fast was here presented as the cause of it! To fight against this lack of understanding, against a whole world of non-understanding, was impossible. Time and again in good faith he stood by the bars listening to the impresario, but as soon as the photographs appeared he always let go and sank with a groan back on to his straw, and the reassured public could once more come close and gaze at him.

- 5 A few years later when the witnesses of such scenes called them to mind, they often failed to understand themselves at all. For meanwhile the aforementioned change in public interest had set in; it seemed to happen almost overnight; there may have been profound causes for it, but who was going to bother about that; at any rate the pampered hunger artist suddenly found himself deserted one fine day by the amusement seekers, who went streaming past him to other more favored attractions. For the last time the impresario hurried him over half Europe to discover whether the old interest might still survive here and there; all in vain; everywhere, as if by secret agreement, a positive revulsion from professional fasting was in evidence. Of course it could not really have sprung up so suddenly as all that, and many premonitory symptoms which had not been sufficiently remarked or suppressed during the rush and glitter of success now came retrospectively to mind, but it was now too late to take any countermeasures. Fasting would surely come into fashion again at some future date, yet that was no comfort for those living in the present. What, then, was the hunger artist to do? He had been applauded by thousands in his time and could hardly come down to showing himself in a street booth at village fairs, and as for adopting another profession, he was not only too old for that but too fanatically devoted to fasting. So he took leave of the impresario, his partner in an unparalleled career, and hired himself to a large circus; in order to spare his own feelings he avoided reading the conditions of his contract.

A large circus with its enormous traffic in replacing and recruiting men, animals and apparatus can always find a use for people at any time, even for a hunger artist, provided of course that he does not ask too much, and in this particular case anyhow it was not only the artist who was taken on but his famous and long-known name as well, indeed considering the peculiar nature of his performance, which was not impaired by advancing age, it could not be objected that here was an artist past his prime, no longer at the height of his professional skill, seeking a refuge in some quiet corner of a circus; on the contrary, the hunger artist averred that he could fast as well as ever, which was entirely credible, he even alleged that if he were allowed to fast as he liked, and this was at once promised him without more ado, he could astound the world by establishing a record never yet achieved, a statement which certainly provoked a smile among the other professionals, since it left out of account the change in public opinion, which the hunger artist in his zeal conveniently forgot.

He had not, however, actually lost his sense of the real situation and took it as a matter of course that he and his cage should be stationed, not in the middle of the ring as a main attraction, but outside, near the animal cages, on a site that was after all easily accessible. Large and gaily painted placards made a frame for the cage and announced what was to be seen inside it. When the public came thronging out in the intervals to see the animals, they could hardly avoid passing the hunger artist's cage and stopping there for a moment, perhaps they might even have stayed longer had not those pressing behind them in the narrow gangway, who did not understand why they should be held up on their way toward the excitements of the menagerie, made it impossible for anyone to stand gazing quietly for any length of time. And that was the reason why the hunger artist, who had of course been looking forward to these visiting hours as the main achievement of his life, began instead to shrink from them. At first he could hardly wait for the intervals; it was exhilarating to watch the crowds come streaming his way, until only too soon—not even the most obstinate self-deception, clung to almost consciously, could hold out against the fact—the conviction was borne in upon him that these people, most of them, to judge from their actions, again and again, without exception, were all on their way to the menagerie. And the first sight of them from the distance remained the best. For when they reached his cage he was at once deafened by the storm of shouting and abuse that arose from the two contending factions, which renewed themselves continuously, of those who wanted to stop and stare at him—he soon began to dislike them more than the others—not out of real interest but only out of obstinate self-assertiveness, and those who wanted to go straight on to the animals. When the first great rush was past, the stragglers came along, and these, whom nothing could have prevented from stopping to look at him as long as they had breath, raced past with long strides, hardly even glancing at him, in their haste to get to the menagerie in time. And all too rarely did it happen that he had a stroke of luck, when some father of a family fetched up before him with his children, pointed a finger at the hunger artist and explained at length what the phenomenon meant, telling stories of earlier years when he himself had watched similar but much more thrilling performances, and the children, still rather uncomprehending, since neither inside nor outside school had they been sufficiently prepared for this lesson—what did they care about fasting?—yet showed by the brightness of their intent eyes that new and better times might be coming. Perhaps, said the hunger artist to himself many a time, things would be a little better if his cage were set not quite so near the menagerie. That made it too easy for people to make their choice, to say nothing of what he suffered from the stench of the menagerie, the animals' restlessness by night, the carrying past of raw lumps of flesh for the beasts of prey, the roaring at feeding times, which depressed him continually. But he did not dare to lodge a complaint with the management; after all, he had the animals to thank for the troops of people who passed his cage, among whom there might always be one here and there to take an interest in him, and who could tell where they might seclude him if he called attention to his existence and thereby to the fact that, strictly speaking, he was only an impediment on the way to the menagerie.

A small impediment, to be sure, one that grew steadily less. People grew familiar with the strange idea that they could be expected, in times like these, to take an interest in a hunger artist, and with this familiarity the verdict went out against him. He might fast as much as he could, and he did so; but nothing could save him now, people passed him by. Just try to explain to anyone the art of fasting! Anyone who has no feeling for it cannot be made to understand it. The fine placards grew dirty and illegible, they were torn down; the little notice board telling the number of fast days achieved, which at first was changed carefully every day, had long stayed at the same figure, for after the first few weeks even this small task seemed pointless to the staff; and so the artist simply fasted on and on, as he had once dreamed of doing, and it was no trouble to him, just as he had always foretold, but no one counted the days, no one, not even the artist himself, knew what records he was already breaking, and his heart grew heavy. And when once in a time some leisurely passer-by stopped, made merry over the old figure on the board and spoke of swindling, that was in its way the stupidest lie ever invented by indifference and inborn malice, since it was not the hunger artist who was cheating; he was working honestly, but the world was cheating him of his reward.

Many more days went by, however, and that too came to an end. An overseer's eye fell on the cage one day and he asked the attendants why this perfectly good cage should be left standing there unused with dirty straw inside it; nobody knew, until one man, helped out by the notice board, remembered about the hunger artist. They poked into the straw with sticks and found him in it. "Are you still fasting?" asked the overseer. "When on earth do you mean to stop?" "Forgive me, everybody," whispered the hunger artist; only the overseer, who had his ear to the bars, understood him. "Of course," said the overseer, and tapped his forehead with a finger to let the attendants know what state the man was in, "we forgive you." "I always wanted you to admire my fasting," said the hunger artist. "We do admire it," said the overseer, affably. "But you shouldn't admire it," said the hunger artist. "Well, then we don't admire it," said the overseer, "but why shouldn't we admire it?" "Because I have to fast, I can't help it," said the hunger artist. "What a fellow you are," said the overseer, "and why can't you help it?" "Because," said the hunger artist, lifting his head a little and speaking, with his lips pursed, as if for a kiss, right into the overseer's ear, so that no syllable might be lost, "because I couldn't find the food I liked. If I had found it, believe me, I should have made no fuss and stuffed myself like you or anyone else." These were his last words, but in his dimming eyes remained the firm though no longer proud persuasion that he was still continuing to fast.

"Well, clear this out now!" said the overseer, and they buried the hunger artist, straw and all. Into the cage they put a young panther. Even the most insensitive felt it refreshing to see this wild creature leaping around the cage that had so long been dreary. The panther was all right. The food he liked was brought him without hesitation by the attendants; he seemed not even to miss his freedom; his noble body, furnished almost to the bursting point with all that it needed, seemed to carry freedom around with it too; somewhere in his jaws it seemed to lurk; and the joy of life streamed with such ardent passion from his throat that for the onlookers it was not easy to stand the shock of it. But they braced themselves, crowded round the cage, and did not want ever to move away.

JAMAICA KINCAID

(b. 1949)

Girl

Raised in poverty by her homemaker mother and carpenter stepfather on the small Caribbean island of Antigua, Elaine Potter Richardson was sent to the United States to earn her own living at age seventeen, much like the protagonists of her first novels, Annie John (1983) and Lucy (1990). Working as an au pair and receptionist, she earned her high-school equivalency degree and studied photography at the New School for Social Research in New York and, briefly, Franconia College in New Hampshire. Returning to New York, she took the name of a character in a George Bernard Shaw play, at least in part out of resentment toward her mother, with whom she had once been very close. After a short stint as a freelance journalist, Kincaid worked as a regular contributor to the New Yorker from 1976 until 1995, in 1979 marrying its editor's son, composer Allen Shawn, with whom she would eventually move to Bennington, Vermont, and raise two children. “Girl,” her first published story, appeared in the New Yorker in 1978 and was later republished in her first collection, At the Bottom of the River (1983). Subsequent novels include The Autobiography of My Mother (1996), paradoxically the least autobiographical of her books; Mr. Potter (2002), a fictionalized account of her efforts to understand the biological father she never knew; and See Now Then (2013). Kincaid’s equally impressive nonfiction includes My Brother (1997), a memoir inspired by her youngest brother’s death from AIDS, and A Small Place (1988), an essay exploring the profound economic and psychological impact of Antigua’s dependence on tourism. Divorced in 2002, Kincaid is currently Professor of African and African American Studies in Residence at Harvard.

BOBBIE ANN MASON

(b. 1940)

Shiloh

Bobbie Ann Mason grew up on her parents' dairy farm in western Kentucky, the region where many of her stories are set. She received a BA from the University of Kentucky, an MA from the State University of New York at Binghamton, and a PhD in English from the University of Connecticut. In addition to writing a dissertation on the work of Vladimir Nabokov, later published as a book (1974), and The Girl Sleuth: A Feminist Guide to the Bobbsey Twins, Nancy Drew, and Their Sisters (1975), Mason began to publish the short stories eventually collected in the highly acclaimed Shiloh and Other Stories (1982), winner of the PEN Hemingway Award. That book, combined with her first novel, In Country (1985; filmed 1989), inspired one reviewer to dub her writing "Shopping Mall Realism." Mason has continued to write novels, including Feather Crowns (1993), Atomic Romance (2005), and The Girl in the Blue Beret (2011), as well as nonfiction ranging from a biography of Elvis Presley (2003) to Clear Springs: A Memoir (1999), a nominee for the Pulitzer Prize. She is best known and most highly praised, however, for short-story collections like Zigzagging Down a Wild Trail (2001) and Nancy Culpepper (2006). Novelist Ann Tyler describes Mason as "a full-fledged master of the short story," while fiction writer Lorrie Moore suggests that her "strongest form may be neither the novel nor the story, but the story collection."

Leroy Moffitt's wife, Norma Jean, is working on her pectorals. She lifts three-pound dumbbells to warm up, then progresses to a twenty-pound barbell. Standing with her legs apart, she reminds Leroy of Wonder Woman.

"I'd give anything if I could just get these muscles to where they're real hard," says Norma Jean. "Feel this arm. It's not as hard as the other one."

"That's cause you're right-handed," says Leroy, dodging as she swings the barbell in an arc.

"Do you think so?"

"Sure."

Leroy is a truck driver. He injured his leg in a highway accident four months ago, and his physical therapy, which involves weights and a pulley, prompted Norma Jean to try building herself up. Now she is attending a body-building class. Leroy has been collecting temporary disability since his tractor-trailer jack-knifed in Missouri, badly twisting his left leg in its socket. He has a steel pin in his hip. He will probably not be able to drive his rig again. It sits in the backyard, like a gigantic bird that has flown home to roost. Leroy has been home in Kentucky for three months, and his leg is almost healed, but the accident frightened him and he does not want to drive any more long hauls. He is not sure what to do next. In the meantime, he makes things from craft kits. He started by building a miniature log cabin from notched Popsicle sticks. He varnished it and placed it on the TV set, where it remains. It reminds him of a rustic Nativity scene. Then he tried string art (sailing ships on black velvet), a macramé owl kit, a snap-together B-17 Flying Fortress,¹ and a lamp made out of a model truck, with a light fixture screwed in the top of the cab. At first the kits were diversions, something to kill time, but now he is thinking about building a full-scale log house from a kit. It would be considerably cheaper than building a regular house, and besides, Leroy has grown to appreciate how things are put together. He has begun to realize that in all the years he was on the road he never took time to examine anything. He was always flying past scenery.

"They won't let you build a log cabin in any of the new subdivisions," Norma Jean tells him.

"They will if I tell them it's for you," he says, teasing her. Ever since they were married, he has promised Norma Jean he would build her a new home one day. They have always rented, and the house they live in is small and nondescript. It does not even feel like a home, Leroy realizes now.

Norma Jean works at the Rexall drugstore, and she has acquired an amazing amount of information about cosmetics. When she explains to Leroy the three stages of complexion care, involving creams, toners, and moisturizers, he thinks happily of other petroleum products—axle grease, diesel fuel. This is a connection between him and Norma Jean. Since he has been home, he has felt unusually tender about his wife and guilty over his long absences. But he can't tell what she feels about him. Norma Jean has never complained about his traveling; she has never made hurt remarks, like calling his truck a "widow-maker." He is reasonably certain she has been faithful to him, but he wishes she would celebrate his permanent homecoming more happily. Norma Jean is often startled to find Leroy at home, and he thinks she seems a little disappointed about it. Perhaps he reminds her too much of the early days of their marriage, before he went on the road. They had a child who died as an infant, years ago. They never speak about their memories of Randy, which have almost faded, but now that Leroy is home all the time, they sometimes feel awkward around each other, and Leroy wonders if one of them should mention the child. He has the feeling that they are waking up out of a dream together—that they must create a new marriage, start afresh. They are lucky they are still married. Leroy has read that for most people losing a child destroys the marriage—or else he heard this on Donahue.² He can't always remember where he learns things anymore.

At Christmas, Leroy bought an electric organ for Norma Jean. She used to play the piano when she was in high school. "It don't leave you," she told him once. "It's like riding a bicycle." 10

The new instrument had so many keys and buttons that she was bewildered by it at first. She touched the keys tentatively, pushed some buttons, then pecked out "Chopsticks." It came out in an amplified fox-trot rhythm, with marimba sounds.

"It's an orchestra!" she cried.

The organ had a pecan-look finish and eighteen preset chords, with optional flute, violin, trumpet, clarinet, and banjo accompaniments. Norma Jean mastered the organ almost immediately. At first she played Christmas songs. Then she bought The Sixties Songbook and learned every tune in it, adding variations to each with the rows of brightly colored buttons.

"I didn't like these old songs back then," she said. "But I have this crazy feeling I missed something."

"You didn't miss a thing," said Leroy. 15

Leroy likes to lie on the couch and smoke a joint and listen to Norma Jean play "Can't Take My Eyes Off You" and "I'll Be Back."³ He is back again. After fifteen years on the road, he is finally settling down with the woman he loves. She is still pretty. Her skin is flawless. Her frosted curls resemble pencil trimmings.

Now that Leroy has come home to stay, he notices how much the town has changed. Subdivisions are spreading across western Kentucky like an oil slick. The sign at the edge of town says "Pop: 11,500"—only seven hundred more than it said twenty years before. Leroy can't figure out who is living in all the new houses. The farmers who used to gather around the courthouse square on Saturday afternoons to play checkers and spit tobacco juice have gone. It has been years since Leroy has thought about the farmers, and they have disappeared without his noticing.

Leroy meets a kid named Stevie Hamilton in the parking lot at the new shopping center. While they pretend to be strangers meeting over a stalled car, Stevie tosses an ounce of marijuana under the front seat of Leroy's car. Stevie is wearing orange jogging shoes and a T-shirt that says CHATTAHOOCHEE SUPER-RAT. His father is a prominent doctor who lives in one of the expensive subdivisions in a new white-columned brick house that looks like a funeral parlor. In the phone book under his name there is a separate number, with the listing "Teenagers."

"Where do you get this stuff?" asks Leroy. "From your pappy?"

"That's for me to know and you to find out," Stevie says. He is slit-eyed and 20 skinny.

"What else you got?"

"What you interested in?"

"Nothing special. Just wondered."

Leroy used to take speed on the road. Now he has to go slowly. He needs to be mellow. He leans back against the car and says, "I'm aiming to build me a log house, soon as I get time. My wife, though, I don't think she likes the idea."

25 “Well, let me know when you want me again,” Stevie says. He has a cigarette in his cupped palm, as though sheltering it from the wind. He takes a long drag, then stomps it on the asphalt and slouches away.

Stevie’s father was two years ahead of Leroy in high school. Leroy is thirty-four. He married Norma Jean when they were both eighteen, and their child Randy was born a few months later, but he died at the age of four months and three days. He would be about Stevie’s age now. Norma Jean and Leroy were at the drive-in, watching a double feature (Dr. Strangelove and Lover Come Back),⁴ and the baby was sleeping in the back seat. When the first movie ended, the baby was dead. It was the sudden infant death syndrome. Leroy remembers handing Randy to a nurse at the emergency room, as though he were offering her a large doll as a present. A dead baby feels like a sack of flour. “It just happens sometimes,” said the doctor, in what Leroy always recalls as a nonchalant tone. Leroy can hardly remember the child anymore, but he still sees vividly a scene from Dr. Strangelove in which the President of the United States was talking in a folksy voice on the hot line to the Soviet premier about the bomber accidentally headed toward Russia. He was in the War Room, and the world map was lit up. Leroy remembers Norma Jean catatonically beside him in the hospital and himself thinking: Who is this strange girl? He had forgotten who she was. Now scientists are saying that crib death is caused by a virus. Nobody knows anything, Leroy thinks. The answers are always changing.

When Leroy gets home from the shopping center, Norma Jean’s mother, Mabel Beasley, is there. Until this year, Leroy has not realized how much time she spends with Norma Jean. When she visits, she inspects the closets and then the plants, informing Norma Jean when a plant is droopy or yellow. Mabel calls the plants “flowers,” although there are never any blooms. She always notices if Norma Jean’s laundry is piling up. Mabel is a short, overweight woman whose tight, brown-dyed curls look more like a wig than the actual wig she sometimes wears. Today she has brought Norma Jean an off-white dust ruffle she made for the bed; Mabel works in a custom-upholstery shop.

“This is the tenth one I made this year,” Mabel says. “I got started and couldn’t stop.”

30 “Now we can hide things under the bed,” says Leroy, who gets along with his mother-in-law primarily by joking with her. Mabel has never really forgiven him for disgracing her by getting Norma Jean pregnant. When the baby died, she said that fate was mocking her.

“What’s that thing?” Mabel says to Leroy in a loud voice, pointing to a tangle of yarn on a piece of canvas.

Leroy holds it up for Mabel to see. “It’s my needlepoint,” he explains. “This is a Star Trek pillow cover.”

“That’s what a woman would do,” says Mabel. “Great day in the morning!”

“All the big football players on TV do it,” he says.

4. A 1963 satire on nuclear war and a 1961 Rock Hudson–Doris Day romantic comedy satirizing the advertising business, respectively.

"Why, Leroy, you're always trying to fool me. I don't believe you for one minute. 35
You don't know what to do with yourself—that's the whole trouble. Sewing!"

"I'm aiming to build us a log house," says Leroy. "Soon as my plans come."

"Like heck you are," says Norma Jean. She takes Leroy's needlepoint and shoves it into a drawer. "You have to find a job first. Nobody can afford to build now anyway."

Mabel straightens her girdle and says, "I still think before you get tied down y'all ought to take a little run to Shiloh."

"One of these days, Mama," Norma Jean says impatiently.

Mabel is talking about Shiloh, Tennessee. For the past few years, she has 40 been urging Leroy and Norma Jean to visit the Civil War battleground there.⁵ Mabel went there on her honeymoon—the only real trip she ever took. Her husband died of a perforated ulcer when Norma Jean was ten, but Mabel, who was accepted into the United Daughters of the Confederacy in 1975, is still preoccupied with going back to Shiloh.

"I've been to kingdom come and back in that truck out yonder," Leroy says to Mabel, "but we never yet set foot in that battleground. Ain't that something? How did I miss it?"

"It's not even that far," Mabel says.

After Mabel leaves, Norma Jean reads to Leroy from a list she has made. "Thing you could do," she announces. "You could get a job as a guard at Union Carbide, where they'd let you set on a stool. You could get on at the lumberyard. You could do a little carpenter work, if you want to build so bad. You could—"

"I can't do something where I'd have to stand up all day."

"You ought to try standing up all day behind a cosmetics counter. It's amaz- 45 ing that I have strong feet, coming from two parents that never had strong feet at all." At the moment Norma Jean is holding on to the kitchen counter, raising her knees one at a time as she talks. She is wearing two-pound ankle weights.

"Don't worry," says Leroy. "I'll do something."

"You could truck calves to slaughter for somebody. You wouldn't have to drive any big old truck for that."

"I'm going to build you this house," says Leroy. "I want to make you a real home."

"I don't want to live in any log cabin."

"It's not a cabin. It's a house."

"I don't care. It looks like a cabin."

"You and me together could lift those logs. It's just like lifting weights."

Norma Jean doesn't answer. Under her breath, she is counting. Now she is marching through the kitchen. She is doing goose steps.

Before his accident, when Leroy came home he used to stay in the house with Norma Jean, watching TV in bed and playing cards. She would cook fried

5. Where, in April 1862, more than twenty-three thousand troops of the North and South, one-quarter of those who fought there, died. This was the first real indication of how bitter and bloody the war was to be. When Union reinforcements arrived, General Ulysses S. Grant drove the Confederate forces, who had gained an initial victory by a surprise attack, back to their base in Corinth, Mississippi.

chicken, picnic ham, chocolate pie—all his favorites. Now he is home alone much of the time. In the mornings, Norma Jean disappears, leaving a cooling place in the bed. She eats a cereal called Body Buddies, and she leaves the bowl on the table, with soggy tan balls floating in a milk puddle. He sees things about Norma Jean that he never realized before. When she chops onions, she stares off into a corner, as if she can't bear to look. She puts on her house slippers almost precisely at nine o'clock every evening and nudges her jogging shoes under the couch. She saves bread heels for the birds. Leroy watches the birds at the feeder. He notices the peculiar way goldfinches fly past the window. They close their wings, then fall, then spread their wings to catch and lift themselves. He wonders if they close their eyes when they fall. Norma Jean closes her eyes when they are in bed. She wants the lights turned out. Even then, he is sure she closes her eyes.

55 He goes for long drives around town. He tends to drive a car rather carelessly. Power steering and an automatic shift make a car feel so small and inconsequential that his body is hardly involved in the driving process. His injured leg stretches out comfortably. Once or twice he has almost hit something, but even the prospect of an accident seems minor in a car. He cruises the new subdivisions, feeling like a criminal rehearsing for a robbery. Norma Jean is probably right about a log house being inappropriate here in the new subdivisions. All the houses look grand and complicated. They depress him.

One day when Leroy comes home from a drive he finds Norma Jean in tears. She is in the kitchen making a potato and mushroom-soup casserole, with grated-cheese topping. She is crying because her mother caught her smoking.

"I didn't hear her coming. I was standing here puffing away pretty as you please," Norma Jean says, wiping her eyes.

"I knew it would happen sooner or later," says Leroy, putting his arm around her.

"She don't know the meaning of the word 'knock,'" says Norma Jean. "It's a wonder she hadn't caught me years ago."

60 "Think of it this way," Leroy says. "What if she caught me with a joint?"

"You better not let her!" Norma Jean shrieks. "I'm warning you, Leroy Moffitt!"

"I'm just kidding. Here, play me a tune. That'll help you relax."

Norma Jean puts the casserole in the oven and sets the timer. Then she plays a ragtime tune, with horns and banjo, as Leroy lights up a joint and lies on the couch, laughing to himself about Mabel's catching him at it. He thinks of Stevie Hamilton—a doctor's son pushing grass. Everything is funny. The whole town seems crazy and small. He is reminded of Virgil Mathis, a boastful policeman Leroy used to shoot pool with. Virgil recently led a drug bust in a back room at a bowling alley, where he seized ten thousand dollars' worth of marijuana. The newspaper had a picture of him holding up the bags of grass and grinning widely. Right now, Leroy can imagine Virgil breaking down the door and arresting him with a lungful of smoke. Virgil would probably have been alerted to the scene because of all the racket Norma Jean is making. Now she sounds like a hard-rock band. Norma Jean is terrific. When she switches to a Latin-rhythm version of "Sunshine Superman," Leroy hums along. Norma Jean's foot goes up and down, up and down.

"Well, what do you think?" Leroy says, when Norma Jean pauses to search through her music.

"What do I think about what?"

His mind has gone blank. Then he says, "I'll sell my rig and build us a house." That wasn't what he wanted to say. He wanted to know what she thought—what she really thought—about them.

"Don't start in on that again," says Norma Jean. She begins playing "Who'll Be the Next in Line?"

Leroy used to tell hitchhikers his whole life story—about his travels, his hometown, the baby. He would end with a question: "Well, what do you think?" It was just a rhetorical question. In time, he had the feeling that he'd been telling the same story over and over to the same hitchhikers. He quit talking to hitchhikers when he realized how his voice sounded—whining and self-pitying, like some teenage-tragedy song. Now Leroy has the sudden impulse to tell Norma Jean about himself, as if he had just met her. They have known each other so long they have forgotten a lot about each other. They could become reacquainted. But when the oven timer goes off and she runs to the kitchen, he forgets why he wants to do this.

The next day, Mabel drops by. It is Saturday and Norma Jean is cleaning. Leroy is studying the plans of his log house, which have finally come in the mail. He has them spread out on the table—big sheets of stiff blue paper, with diagrams and numbers printed in white. While Norma Jean runs the vacuum, Mabel drinks coffee. She sets her coffee cup on a blueprint.

"I'm just waiting for time to pass," she says to Leroy, drumming her fingers on the table. 70

As soon as Norma Jean switches off the vacuum, Mabel says in a loud voice, "Did you hear about the datsun dog that killed the baby?"

Norma Jean says, "The word is 'dachshund.'"

"They put the dog on trial. It chewed the baby's legs off. The mother was in the next room all the time." She raises her voice. "They thought it was neglect."

Norma Jean is holding her ears. Leroy manages to open the refrigerator and get some Diet Pepsi to offer Mabel. Mabel still has some coffee and she waves away the Pepsi.

"Datsuns are like that," Mabel says. "They're jealous dogs. They'll tear a 75 place to pieces if you don't keep an eye on them."

"You better watch out what you're saying, Mabel," says Leroy.

"Well, facts is facts."

Leroy looks out the window at his rig. It is like a huge piece of furniture gathering dust in the backyard. Pretty soon it will be an antique. He hears the vacuum cleaner. Norma Jean seems to be cleaning the living room rug again.

Later, she says to Leroy, "She just said that about the baby because she caught me smoking. She's trying to pay me back."

"What are you talking about?" Leroy says, nervously shuffling blueprints. 80

"You know good and well," Norma Jean says. She is sitting in a kitchen chair with her feet up and her arms wrapped around her knees. She looks small and helpless. She says, "The very idea, her bringing up a subject like that! Saying it was neglect."

"She didn't mean that," Leroy says.

"She might not have thought she meant it. She always says things like that. You don't know how she goes on."

"But she didn't really mean it. She was just talking."

- 85 Leroy opens a king-sized bottle of beer and pours it into two glasses, dividing it carefully. He hands a glass to Norma Jean and she takes it from him mechanically. For a long time, they sit by the kitchen window watching the birds at the feeder.

Something is happening. Norma Jean is going to night school. She has graduated from her six-week body-building course and now she is taking an adult-education course in composition at Paducah Community College. She spends her evenings outlining paragraphs.

"First you have a topic sentence," she explains to Leroy. "Then you divide it up. Your secondary topic has to be connected to your primary topic."

To Leroy, this sounds intimidating. "I never was any good in English," he says.

"It makes a lot of sense."

- 90 "What are you doing this for, anyhow?"

She shrugs. "It's something to do." She stands up and lifts her dumbbells a few times.

"Driving a rig, nobody cared about my English."

"I'm not criticizing your English."

Norma Jean used to say, "If I lose ten minutes' sleep, I just drag all day." Now she stays up late, writing compositions. She got a B on her first paper—a how-to theme on soup-based casseroles. Recently Norma Jean has been cooking unusual foods—tacos, lasagna, Bombay chicken. She doesn't play the organ anymore, though her second paper was called "Why Music Is Important to Me." She sits at the kitchen table, concentrating on her outlines, while Leroy plays with his log house plans, practicing with a set of Lincoln Logs. The thought of getting a truck-load of notched, numbered logs scares him, and he wants to be prepared. As he and Norma Jean work together at the kitchen table, Leroy has the hopeful thought that they are sharing something, but he knows he is a fool to think this. Norma Jean is miles away. He knows he is going to lose her. Like Mabel, he is just waiting for time to pass.

- 95 One day, Mabel is there before Norma Jean gets home from work, and Leroy finds himself confiding in her. Mabel, he realizes, must know Norma Jean better than he does.

"I don't know what's got into that girl," Mabel says. "She used to go to bed with the chickens. Now you say she's up all hours. Plus her a-smoking. I like to died."

"I want to make her this beautiful home," Leroy says, indicating the Lincoln Logs. "I don't think she even wants it. Maybe she was happier with me gone."

"She don't know what to make of you, coming home like this."

"Is that it?"

- 100 Mabel takes the roof off his Lincoln Log cabin. "You couldn't get me in a log cabin," she says. "I was raised in one. It's no picnic, let me tell you."

"They're different now," says Leroy.

"I tell you what," Mabel says, smiling oddly at Leroy.

"What?"

"Take her on down to Shiloh. Y'all need to get out together, stir a little. Her brain's all balled up over them books."

Leroy can see traces of Norma Jean's features in her mother's face. Mabel's face has the texture of crinkled cotton, but suddenly she looks pretty. It occurs to Leroy that Mabel has been hinting all along that she wants them to take her with them to Shiloh. 105

"Let's all go to Shiloh," he says. "You and me and her. Come Sunday."

Mabel throws up her hands in protest. "Oh, no, not me. Young folks want to be by themselves."

When Norma Jean comes in with groceries, Leroy says excitedly, "Your mama here's been dying to go to Shiloh for thirty-five years. It's about time we went, don't you think?"

"I'm not going to butt in on anybody's second honeymoon," Mabel says.

"Who's going on a honeymoon, for Christ's sake?" Norma Jean says loudly. 110

"I never raised no daughter of mine to talk that-a-way," Mabel says.

"You ain't seen nothing yet," says Norma Jean. She starts putting away boxes and cans, slamming cabinet doors.

"There's a log cabin at Shiloh," Mabel says, "It was there during the battle. There's bullet holes in it."

"When are you going to shut up about Shiloh, Mama?" asks Norma Jean.

"I always thought Shiloh was the prettiest place, so full of history," Mabel goes on. "I just hoped y'all could see it once before I die, so you could tell me about it." 115
Later, she whispers to Leroy, "You do what I said. A little change is what she needs."

"Your name means 'the king,'" Norma Jean says to Leroy that evening. He is trying to get her to go to Shiloh, and she is reading a book about another century.

"Well, I reckon I ought to be right proud."

"I guess so."

"Am I still king around here?"

Norma Jean flexes her biceps and feels them for hardness. "I'm not fooling around with anybody, if that's what you mean," she says. 120

"Would you tell me if you were?"

"I don't know."

"What does your name mean?"

"It was Marilyn Monroe's real name."

"No kidding!" 125

"Norma comes from the Normans. They were invaders," she says. She closes her book and looks hard at Leroy. "I'll go to Shiloh with you if you'll stop staring at me."

On Sunday, Norma Jean packs a picnic and they go to Shiloh. To Leroy's relief, Mabel says she does not want to come with them. Norma Jean drives, and Leroy, sitting beside her, feels like some boring hitchhiker she has picked up. He tries some conversation, but she answers him in monosyllables. At Shiloh, she drives aimlessly through the park, past bluffs and trails and steep ravines. Shiloh is an immense place, and Leroy cannot see it as a battleground. It is not what he expected. He thought it would look like a golf course. Monuments are everywhere, showing through the thick clusters of trees. Norma Jean passes the log cabin Mabel mentioned. It is surrounded by tourists looking for bullet holes.

"That's not the kind of log house I've got in mind," says Leroy apologetically.

"I know that."

130 "This is a pretty place. Your mama was right."

"It's O.K.," says Norma Jean. "Well, we've seen it. I hope she's satisfied."

They burst out laughing together.

At the park museum, a movie on Shiloh is shown every half hour, but they decide that they don't want to see it. They buy a souvenir Confederate flag for Mabel, and then they find a picnic spot near the cemetery. Norma Jean has brought a picnic cooler, with pimienta sandwiches, soft drinks, and Yodels. Leroy eats a sandwich and then smokes a joint, hiding it behind the picnic cooler. Norma Jean has quit smoking altogether. She is picking cake crumbs from the cellophane wrapper, like a fussy bird.

Leroy says, "So the boys in gray ended up in Corinth. The Union soldiers zapped 'em finally. April 7, 1862."

135 They both know that he doesn't know any history. He is just talking about some of the historical plaques they have read. He feels awkward, like a boy on a date with an older girl. They are still just making conversation.

"Corinth is where Mama eloped to," says Norma Jean.

They sit in silence and stare at the cemetery for the Union dead and, beyond, at a tall cluster of trees. Campers are parked nearby, bumper to bumper, and small children in bright clothing are cavorting and squealing. Norma Jean wads up the cake wrapper and squeezes it tightly in her hand. Without looking at Leroy, she says, "I want to leave you."

Leroy takes a bottle of Coke out of the cooler and flips off the cap. He holds the bottle poised near his mouth but cannot remember to take a drink. Finally he says, "No, you don't."

"Yes, I do."

140 "I won't let you."

"You can't stop me."

"Don't do me that way."

Leroy knows Norma Jean will have her own way. "Didn't I promise to be home from now on?" he says.

"In some ways, a woman prefers a man who wanders," says Norma Jean.

"That sounds crazy, I know."

145 "You're not crazy."

Leroy remembers to drink from his Coke. Then he says, "Yes, you are crazy. You and me could start all over again. Right back at the beginning."

"We have started all over again," says Norma Jean. "And this is how it turned out."

"What did I do wrong?"

"Nothing."

150 "Is this one of those women's lib things?" Leroy asks.

"Don't be funny."

The cemetery, a green slope dotted with white markers, looks like a subdivision site. Leroy is trying to comprehend that his marriage is breaking up, but for some reason he is wondering about white slabs in a graveyard.

"Everything was fine till Mama caught me smoking," says Norma Jean, standing up. "That set something off."

"What are you talking about?"

"She won't leave me alone—you won't leave me alone." Norma Jean seems to be crying, but she is looking away from him. "I feel eighteen again. I can't face that all over again." She starts walking away. "No, it wasn't fine. I don't know what I'm saying. Forget it." 155

Leroy takes a lungful of smoke and closes his eyes as Norma Jean's words sink in. He tries to focus on the fact that thirty-five hundred soldiers died on the grounds around him. He can only think of that war as a board game with plastic soldiers. Leroy almost smiles, as he compares the Confederates' daring attack on the Union camps and Virgil Mathis's raid on the bowling alley. General Grant, drunk and furious, shoved the Southerners back to Corinth, where Mabel and Jet Beasley were married years later, when Mabel was still thin and good-looking. The next day, Mabel and Jet visited the battleground, and then Norma Jean was born, and then she married Leroy and they had a baby, which they lost, and now Leroy and Norma Jean are here at the same battleground. Leroy knows he is leaving out a lot. He is leaving out the insides of history. History was always just names and dates to him. It occurs to him that building a house out of logs is similarly empty—too simple. And the real inner workings of a marriage, like most of history, have escaped him. Now he sees that building a log house is the dumbest idea he could have had. It was clumsy of him to think Norma Jean would want a log house. It was a crazy idea. He'll have to think of something else, quickly. He will wad the blueprints into tight balls and fling them into the lake. Then he'll get moving again. He opens his eyes. Norma Jean has moved away and is walking through the cemetery, following a serpentine brick path.

Leroy gets up to follow his wife, but his good leg is asleep and his bad leg still hurts him. Norma Jean is far away, walking rapidly toward the bluff by the river, and he tries to hobble toward her. Some children run past him, screaming noisily. Norma Jean has reached the bluff, and she is looking out over the Tennessee River. Now she turns toward Leroy and waves her arms. Is she beckoning to him? She seems to be doing an exercise for her chest muscles. The sky is unusually pale—the color of the dust ruffle Mabel made for their bed.

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

(1850–93)

The Jewelry¹

Born Henri René Albert in Normandy, France, Guy de Maupassant was expelled at sixteen from a Rouen seminary and finished his education at a public high school. After serving in the Franco-Prussian War, he worked as a government clerk in Paris for ten years. A protégé of novelist Gustave Flaubert,

1. Translated by Lafcadio Hearn.

Maupassant published during the 1880s some three hundred stories, half a dozen novels, and plays. The short stories, which appeared regularly in popular periodicals, sampled military and peasant life, the decadent world of politics and journalism, prostitution, the supernatural, and the hypocrisies of solid citizens; with Anton Chekhov, Maupassant may be said to have created the modern short story. His life ended somewhat like one of his own stories: He died of syphilis in an asylum. His novels include Une Vie (A Life, 1883), Bel Ami (Handsome Friend, 1885), and Pierre et Jean (1888).

Having met the girl one evening, at the house of the office-superintendent, M. Lantin became enveloped in love as in a net.

She was the daughter of a country-tutor, who had been dead for several years. Afterward she had come to Paris with her mother, who made regular visits to several bourgeois families of the neighborhood, in hopes of being able to get her daughter married. They were poor and respectable, quiet and gentle. The young girl seemed to be the very ideal of that pure good woman to whom every young man dreams of entrusting his future. Her modest beauty had a charm of angelic shyness; and the slight smile that always dwelt about her lips seemed a reflection of her heart.

Everybody sang her praises; all who knew her kept saying: "The man who gets her will be lucky. No one could find a nicer girl than that."

M. Lantin, who was then chief clerk in the office of the Minister of the Interior, with a salary of 3,500 francs a year,² demanded her hand, and married her.

5 He was unutterably happy with her. She ruled his home with an economy so adroit that they really seemed to live in luxury. It would be impossible to conceive of any attentions, tendernesses, playful caresses which she did not lavish upon her husband; and such was the charm of her person that, six years after he married her, he loved her even more than he did the first day.

There were only two points upon which he ever found fault with her—her love of the theater, and her passion for false jewelry.

Her lady-friends (she was acquainted with the wives of several small office holders) were always bringing her tickets for the theaters; whenever there was a performance that made a sensation, she always had her loge secured, even for first performances; and she would drag her husband with her to all these entertainments, which used to tire him horribly after his day's work. So at last he begged her to go to the theater with some lady-acquaintances who would consent to see her home afterward. She refused for quite a while—thinking it would not look very well to go out thus unaccompanied by her husband. But finally she yielded, just to please him; and he felt infinitely grateful to her therefore.

Now this passion for the theater at last evoked in her the desire of dress. It was true that her toilette remained simple, always in good taste, but modest; and her sweet grace, her irresistible grace, ever smiling and shy, seemed to take fresh charm from the simplicity of her robes. But she got into the habit of suspending in her pretty ears two big cut pebbles, fashioned in imitation of diamonds; and she wore necklaces of false pearls, bracelets of false gold, and haircombs studded with paste-imitations of precious stones.

2. Midlevel bureaucratic wage, perhaps about $30,000 to $40,000 today.

Her husband, who felt shocked by this love of tinsel and show, would often say—"My dear, when one has not the means to afford real jewelry, one should appear adorned with one's natural beauty and grace only—and these gifts are the rarest of jewels."

But she would smile sweetly and answer: "What does it matter? I like those 10 things—that is my little whim. I know you are right; but one can't make oneself over again. I've always loved jewelry so much!"

And then she would roll the pearls of the necklaces between her fingers, and make the facets of the cut crystals flash in the light, repeating: "Now look at them—see how well the work is done. You would swear it was real jewelry."

He would then smile in his turn, and declare to her: "You have the tastes of a regular Gypsy."

Sometimes, in the evening, when they were having a chat by the fire, she would rise and fetch the morocco box in which she kept her "stock" (as M. Lantin called it)—would put it on the tea-table, and begin to examine the false jewelry with passionate delight, as if she experienced some secret and mysterious sensations of pleasure in their contemplation; and she would insist on putting one of the necklaces round her husband's neck, and laugh till she couldn't laugh any more, crying out: "Oh! how funny you look!" Then she would rush into his arms, and kiss him furiously.

One winter's night, after she had been to the Opera, she came home chilled through, and trembling. Next day she had a bad cough. Eight days after that, she died of pneumonia.

Lantin was very nearly following her into the tomb. His despair was so 15 frightful that in one single month his hair turned white. He wept from morning till night, feeling his heart torn by inexpressible suffering—ever haunted by the memory of her, by the smile, by the voice, by all the charm of the dead woman.

Time did not assuage his grief. Often during office hours his fellow-clerks went off to a corner to chat about this or that topic of the day—his cheeks might have been seen to swell up all of a sudden, his nose wrinkle, his eyes fill with water—he would pull a frightful face, and begin to sob.

He had kept his dead companion's room just in the order she had left it, and he used to lock himself up in it every evening to think about her—all the furniture, and even all her dresses, remained in the same place they had been on the last day of her life.

But life became hard for him. His salary, which, in his wife's hands, had amply sufficed for all household needs, now proved scarcely sufficient to supply his own few wants. And he asked himself in astonishment how she had managed always to furnish him with excellent wines and with delicate eating which he could not now afford at all with his scanty means.

He got a little into debt, like men obliged to live by their wits. At last one morning that he happened to find himself without a cent in his pocket, and a whole week to wait before he could draw his monthly salary, he thought of selling something; and almost immediately it occurred to him to sell his wife's "stock"—for he had always borne a secret grudge against the flash-jewelry that used to annoy him so much in former days. The mere sight of it, day after day, somewhat spoiled the sad pleasure of thinking of his darling.

20 He tried a long time to make a choice among the heap of trinkets she had left behind her—for up to the very last day of her life she had kept obstinately buying them, bringing home some new thing almost every night—and finally he resolved to take the big pearl necklace which she used to like the best of all, and which he thought ought certainly to be worth six or eight francs, as it was really very nicely mounted for an imitation necklace.

He put it in his pocket, and walked toward the office, following the boulevards, and looking for some jewelry-store on the way, where he could enter with confidence.

Finally he saw a place and went in; feeling a little ashamed of thus exposing his misery, and of trying to sell such a trifling object.

“Sir,” he said to the jeweler, “please tell me what this is worth.”

The jeweler took the necklace, examined it, weighed it, took up a magnifying glass, called his clerk, talked to him in whispers, put down the necklace on the counter, and drew back a little bit to judge of its effect at a distance.

25 M. Lantin, feeling very much embarrassed by all these ceremonies, opened his mouth and began to declare—“Oh! I know it can’t be worth much” . . . when the jeweler interrupted him saying:

“Well, sir, that is worth between twelve and fifteen thousand francs; but I cannot buy it unless you can let me know exactly how you came by it.”

The widower’s eyes opened enormously, and he stood gaping—unable to understand. Then after a while he stammered out: “You said? . . . Are you sure?” The jeweler, misconstruing the cause of this astonishment, replied in a dry tone—“Go elsewhere if you like, and see if you can get any more for it. The very most I would give for it is fifteen thousand. Come back and see me again, if you can’t do better.”

M. Lantin, feeling perfectly idiotic, took his necklace and departed; obeying a confused desire to find himself alone and to get a chance to think.

But the moment he found himself in the street again, he began to laugh, and he muttered to himself: “The fool!—oh! what a fool; If I had only taken him at his word. Well, well!—a jeweler who can’t tell paste from real jewelry!”

30 And he entered another jewelry-store, at the corner of the Rue de la Paix. The moment the jeweler set eyes on the necklace, he examined—“Hello! I know that necklace well—it was sold here!”

M. Lantin, very nervous, asked:

“What’s it worth?”

“Sir, I sold it for twenty-five thousand francs. I am willing to buy it back again for eighteen thousand—if you can prove to me satisfactorily, according to legal prescriptions, how you came into possession of it.”—This time, M. Lantin was simply paralyzed with astonishment. He said: “Well . . . but please look at it again, sir. I always thought until now that it was . . . was false.”

The jeweler said:

35 “Will you give me your name, sir?”

“Certainly. My name is Lantin; I am employed at the office of the Minister of the Interior. I live at No. 16, Rue des Martyrs.”

The merchant opened the register, looked, and said: “Yes; this necklace was sent to the address of Madame Lantin, 16 Rue des Martyrs, on July 20th, 1876.”

And the two men looked into each other's eyes—the clerk wild with surprise; the jeweler suspecting he had a thief before him.

The jeweler resumed:

"Will you be kind enough to leave this article here for twenty-four hours only—I'll give you a receipt." 40

M. Lantin stuttered: "Yes—ah! certainly." And he went out folding up the receipt, which he put in his pocket.

Then he crossed the street, went the wrong way, found out his mistake, returned by way of the Tuileries, crossed the Seine, found out he had taken the wrong road again, and went back to the Champs-Élysées without being able to get one clear idea into his head. He tried to reason, to understand. His wife could never have bought so valuable an object as that. Certainly not. But then, it must have been a present! . . . A present from whom? What for?

He stopped and stood stock-still in the middle of the avenue.

A horrible suspicion swept across his mind. . . . She? . . . But then all those other pieces of jewelry must have been presents also! . . . Then it seemed to him that the ground was heaving under his feet; that a tree, right in front of him, was falling toward him; he thrust out his arms instinctively, and fell senseless.

He recovered his consciousness again in a drug-store to which some bystanders had carried him. He had them lead him home, and he locked himself into his room. 45

Until nightfall he cried without stopping, biting his handkerchief to keep himself from screaming out. Then, completely worn out with grief and fatigue, he went to bed, and slept a leaden sleep.

A ray of sunshine awakened him, and he rose and dressed himself slowly to go to the office. It was hard to have to work after such a shock. Then he reflected that he might be able to excuse himself to the superintendent, and he wrote to him. Then he remembered he would have to go back to the jeweler's; and shame made his face purple. He remained thinking a long time. Still he could not leave the necklace there; he put on his coat and went out.

It was a fine day; the sky extended all blue over the city, and seemed to make it smile. Strollers were walking aimlessly about, with their hands in their pockets.

Lantin thought as he watched them passing: "How lucky the men are who have fortunes! With money a man can even shake off grief—you can go where you please—travel—amuse yourself! Oh! if I were only rich!"

He suddenly discovered he was hungry—not having eaten anything since the evening before. But his pockets were empty; and he remembered the necklace. Eighteen thousand francs! Eighteen thousand francs!—that was a sum—that was! 50

He made his way to the Rue de la Paix and began to walk backward and forward on the sidewalk in front of the store. Eighteen thousand francs! Twenty times he started to go in; but shame always kept him back.

Still he was hungry—very hungry—and had not a cent. He made one brusque resolve, and crossed the street almost at a run, so as not to let himself have time to think over the matter; and he rushed into the jeweler's.

As soon as he saw him, the merchant hurried forward, and offered him a chair with smiling politeness. Even the clerks came forward to stare at Lantin, with gaiety in their eyes and smiles about their lips.

The jeweler said: "Sir, I made inquiries; and if you are still so disposed, I am ready to pay you down the price I offered you."

55 The clerk stammered: "Why, yes—sir, certainly."

The jeweler took from a drawer eighteen big bills,³ counted them, and held them out to Lantin, who signed a little receipt, and thrust the money feverishly into his pocket.

Then, as he was on the point of leaving, he turned to the ever-smiling merchant, and said, lowering his eyes: "I have some—I have some other jewelry, which came to me in the same—from the same inheritance. Would you purchase them also from me?"

The merchant bowed, and answered: "Why, certainly, sir—certainly. . . ." One of the clerks rushed out to laugh at his ease; another kept blowing his nose as hard as he could.

Lantin, impassive, flushed and serious, said: "I will bring them to you."

60 And he hired a cab to get the jewelry.

When he returned to the store, an hour later, he had not yet breakfasted. They examined the jewelry—piece by piece—putting a value on each. Nearly all had been purchased from that very house.

Lantin, now, disputed estimates made, got angry, insisted on seeing the books, and talked louder and louder the higher the estimates grew.

The big diamond earrings were worth 20,000 francs; the bracelets, 35,000; the brooches, rings and medallions, 16,000; a set of emeralds and sapphires, 14,000; solitaire, suspended to a gold neckchain, 40,000; the total value being estimated at 196,000 francs.

The merchant observed with mischievous good nature: "The person who owned these must have put all her savings into jewelry."

65 Lantin answered with gravity: "Perhaps that is as good a way of saving money as any other." And he went off, after having agreed with the merchant that an expert should make a counter-estimate for him the next day.

When he found himself in the street again, he looked at the Column Vendôme⁴ with the desire to climb it, as if it were a May pole. He felt jolly enough to play leapfrog over the Emperor's head—up there in the blue sky.

He breakfasted at Voisin's⁵ restaurant, and ordered wine at 20 francs a bottle.

Then he hired a cab and drove out to the Bois.⁶ He looked at the carriages passing with a sort of contempt, and a wild desire to yell out to the passers-by: "I am rich, too—I am! I have 200,000 francs!"

The recollection of the office suddenly came back to him. He drove there, walked right into the superintendent's private room, and said: "Sir, I come to give you my resignation. I have just come into a fortune of three hundred thousand francs." Then he shook hands all round with his fellow-clerks; and told them all about his plans for a new career. Then he went to dinner at the Café Anglais.

Finding himself seated at the same table with a man who seemed to him quite genteel, he could not resist the itching desire to tell him, with a certain air of coquetry, that he had just inherited a fortune of four hundred thousand francs.

For the first time in his life he went to the theater without feeling bored by the performance; and he passed the night in revelry and debauch.

Six months after he married again. His second wife was the most upright of spouses, but had a terrible temper. She made his life very miserable.

HERMAN MELVILLE

(1819–91)

Bartleby, the Scrivener: A Story of Wall Street

When his father died in debt, twelve-year-old Herman Melville's life of privilege became one of struggle. At eighteen, he left his native New York to teach in a backwoods Massachusetts school, then trained as a surveyor; finding no work, he became a sailor in 1839. After five years in the South Seas, he wrote Typee (1846) and Omoo (1847), sensationalized and wildly popular accounts of his voyages. They proved the pinnacle of Melville's career in his lifetime, however; Mardi (1849) was judged too abstruse, the travel narratives Redburn (1849) and White-Jacket (1850) too listless. Melville's magnum opus, Moby Dick (1851), was alternately shunned and condemned. His later novels—Pierre (1852), Israel Potter (1853), and The Confidence-Man (1856)—as well as his poetry collection Battle-Pieces (1866) were all but ignored. Melville's reputation as one of the giants of American literature was established only after his death; the novella Billy Budd, Sailor (not published until 1924), like Moby Dick, is judged a masterpiece.

I am a rather elderly man. The nature of my avocations for the last thirty years has brought me into more than ordinary contact with what would seem an interesting and somewhat singular set of men, of whom as yet nothing that I know of has ever been written:—I mean the law-copyists or scriveners. I have known very many of them, professionally and privately, and if I pleased, could relate divers histories, at which good-natured gentlemen might smile, and sentimental souls might weep. But I waive the biographies of all other scriveners for a few passages in the life of Bartleby, who was a scrivener the strangest I ever saw or heard of. While of other law-copyists I might write the complete life, of Bartleby nothing of that sort can be done. I believe that no materials exist for a full and satisfactory biography of this man. It is an irreparable loss to literature. Bartleby was one of those beings of whom nothing is ascertainable, except from the original sources, and in his case those are very small. What my own astonished eyes saw of Bartleby, that is all I know of him, except, indeed, one vague report which will appear in the sequel.¹

Ere introducing the scrivener, as he first appeared to me, it is fit I make some mention of myself, my employées, my business, my chambers, and general surroundings; because some such description is indispensable to an adequate understanding of the chief character about to be presented.

Imprimis:² I am a man who, from his youth upwards, has been filled with a profound conviction that the easiest way of life is the best. Hence, though I belong to a profession proverbially energetic and nervous, even to turbulence, at times, yet nothing of that sort have I ever suffered to invade my peace. I am one of those unambitious lawyers who never addresses a jury, or in any way draws down public applause; but in the cool tranquillity of a snug retreat, do a snug business among rich men's bonds and mortgages and title-deeds. All who know me, consider me an eminently safe man. The late John Jacob Astor,³ a personage little given to poetic enthusiasm, had no hesitation in pronouncing my first grand point to be prudence; my next, method. I do not speak it in vanity, but simply record the fact, that I was not unemployed in my profession by the late John Jacob Astor; a name which, I admit, I love to repeat, for it hath a rounded and orbicular sound to it, and rings like unto bullion. I will freely add that I was not insensible to the late John Jacob Astor's good opinion.

Some time prior to the period at which this little history begins, my avocations had been largely increased. The good old office, now extinct in the State of New York, of a Master in Chancery⁴ had been conferred upon me. It was not a very arduous office, but very pleasantly remunerative. I seldom lose my temper; much more seldom indulge in dangerous indignation at wrongs and outrages; but I must be permitted to be rash here and declare, that I consider the sudden and violent abrogation of the office of Master in Chancery, by the new Constitution, as a — premature act; inasmuch as I had counted upon a life-lease of the profits, whereas I only received those of a few short years. But this is by the way.

- 5 My chambers were up stairs at No. — Wall Street. At one end they looked upon the white wall of the interior of a spacious skylight shaft, penetrating the building from top to bottom. This view might have been considered rather tame than otherwise, deficient in what landscape painters call "life." But if so, the view from the other end of my chambers offered, at least, a contrast, if nothing more. In that direction my windows commanded an unobstructed view of a lofty brick wall, black by age and everlasting shade; which wall required no spyglass to bring out its lurking beauties, but for the benefit of all near-sighted spectators, was pushed up to within ten feet of my window panes. Owing to the great height of the surrounding buildings, and my chambers being on the second floor, the interval between this wall and mine not a little resembled a huge square cistern.

At the period just preceding the advent of Bartleby, I had two persons as copyists in my employment, and a promising lad as an office-boy. First, Turkey; second, Nippers, third, Ginger Nut. These may seem names the like of which are not usually found in the Directory.⁵ In truth they were nicknames, mutually conferred upon each other by my three clerks, and were deemed expressive of their respective persons or characters. Turkey was a short, pursy⁶ Englishman of about my own age, that is, somewhere not far from sixty. In the morning, one might say, his face was of a fine florid hue, but after twelve o'clock, meridian—his dinner hour—it blazed like a grate full of Christmas coals; and continued blazing—but, as it were, with a gradual wane—till 6 o'clock, P.M. or thereabouts, after which I saw no more of the proprietor of the face, which gaining its meridian with the sun, seemed to set with it, to rise, culminate, and decline the following day, with the like regularity and undiminished glory. There are many singular coincidences I have known in the course of my life, not the least among which was the fact, that exactly when Turkey displayed his fullest beams from his red and radiant countenance, just then, too, at that critical moment, began the daily period when I considered his business capacities as seriously disturbed for the remainder of the twenty-four hours. Not that he was absolutely idle, or averse to business then; far from it. The difficulty was, he was apt to be altogether too energetic. There was a strange, inflamed, flurried, flighty recklessness of activity about him. He would be incautious in dipping his pen into his inkstand. All his blots upon my documents were dropped there after twelve o'clock, meridian. Indeed, not only would he be reckless and sadly given to making blots in the afternoon, but some days he went further, and was rather noisy. At such times, too, his face flamed with augmented blazonry, as if cannel coal had been heaped on anthracite.⁷ He made an unpleasant racket with his chair; spilled his sand-box; in mending his pens, impatiently split them all to pieces, and threw them on the floor in a sudden passion; stood up and leaned over his table, boxing his papers about in a most indecorous manner, very sad to behold in an elderly man like him. Nevertheless, as he was in many ways a most valuable person to me, and all the time before twelve o'clock, meridian, was the quickest, steadiest creature too, accomplishing a great deal of work in a style not easy to be matched—for these reasons, I was willing to overlook his eccentricities, though indeed, occasionally, I remonstrated with him. I did this very gently, however, because, though the civilest, nay, the blandest and most reverential of men in the morning, yet in the afternoon he was disposed, upon provocation, to be slightly rash with his tongue, in fact, insolent. Now, valuing his morning services as I did, and resolved not to lose them; yet, at the same time made uncomfortable by his inflamed ways after twelve o'clock; and being a man of peace, unwilling by my admonitions to call forth unseemly retorts from him; I took upon me, one Saturday noon (he was always worse on Saturdays), to hint to him, very kindly, that perhaps now that he was growing old, it might be well to abridge his labors; in short, he need not come to my chambers after twelve o'clock, but, dinner over, had best go home to his lodgings and rest himself till tea-time. But no; he insisted upon his afternoon devotions. His countenance became intolerably fervid, as he oratorically assured me—gesticulating with a long ruler at the other end of the room—that if his services in the morning were useful, how indispensable, then, in the afternoon?

“With submission, sir,” said Turkey on this occasion, “I consider myself your right-hand man. In the morning I but marshal and deploy my columns; but in the afternoon I put myself at their head, and gallantly charge the foe, thus!”—and he made a violent thrust with the ruler.

“But the blots, Turkey,” intimated I.

“True,—but, with submission, sir, behold these hairs! I am getting old. Surely, sir, a blot or two of a warm afternoon is not to be severely urged against gray hairs. Old age—even if it blot the page—is honorable. With submission, sir, we both are getting old.”

- 10 This appeal to my fellow-feeling was hardly to be resisted. At all events, I saw that go he would not. So I made up my mind to let him stay, resolving, nevertheless, to see to it, that during the afternoon he had to do with my less important papers.

Nippers, the second on my list, was a whiskered, sallow, and, upon the whole, rather piratical-looking young man of about five and twenty. I always deemed him the victim of two evil powers—ambition and indigestion. The ambition was evinced by a certain impatience of the duties of a mere copyist, an unwarrantable usurpation of strictly professional affairs, such as the original drawing up of legal documents. The indigestion seemed betokened in an occasional nervous testiness and grinning irritability, causing the teeth to audibly grind together over mistakes committed in copying; unnecessary maledictions, hissed, rather than spoken, in the heat of business; and especially by a continual discontent with the height of the table where he worked. Though of a very ingenious mechanical turn, Nippers could never get this table to suit him. He put chips under it, blocks of various sorts, bits of pasteboard, and at last went so far as to attempt an exquisite adjustment by final pieces of folded blotting-paper. But no invention would answer. If, for the sake of easing his back, he brought the table lid at a sharp angle well up towards his chin, and wrote there like a man using the steep roof of a Dutch house for his desk:—then he declared that it stopped the circulation in his arms. If now he lowered the table to his waistbands, and stooped over it in writing, then there was a sore aching in his back. In short, the truth of the matter was, Nippers knew not what he wanted. Or, if he wanted any thing, it was to be rid of a scrivener’s table altogether. Among the manifestations of his diseased ambition was a fondness he had for receiving visits from certain ambiguous-looking fellows in seedy coats, whom he called his clients. Indeed I was aware that not only was he, at times, considerable of a ward-politician, but he occasionally did a little business at the Justices’ courts, and was not unknown on the steps of the Tombs.⁸ I have good reason to believe, however, that one individual who called upon him at my chambers, and who, with a grand air, he insisted was his client, was no other than a dun,⁹ and the alleged title-deed, a bill. But with all his failings, and the annoyances he caused me, Nippers, like his compatriot Turkey, was a very useful man to me; wrote a neat, swift hand; and, when he chose, was not deficient in a gentlemanly sort of deportment. Added to this, he always dressed in a gentlemanly sort of way: and so, incidentally, reflected credit upon my chambers. Whereas with respect to Turkey, I had much ado to keep him from being a reproach to me. His clothes were apt to look oily and smell of eating-houses. He wore his pantaloons very loose and baggy in summer. His coats were execrable; his hat not to be handled. But while the hat was a thing of indifference to me, inasmuch as his natural civility and deference, as a dependent Englishman, always led him to doff it the moment he entered the room, yet his coat was another matter. Concerning his coats, I reasoned with him; but with no effect. The truth was, I suppose, that a man with so small an income, could not afford to sport such a lustrous face and a lustrous coat at one and the same time. As Nippers once observed, Turkey's money went chiefly for red ink. One winter day I presented Turkey with a highly-respectable looking coat of my own, a padded gray coat, of a most comfortable warmth, and which buttoned straight up from the knee to the neck. I thought Turkey would appreciate the favor, and abate his rashness and obstreperousness of afternoons. But no. I verily believe that buttoning himself up in so downy and blanket-like a coat had a pernicious effect upon him; upon the same principle that too much oats are bad for horses. In fact, precisely as a rash, restive horse is said to feel his oats, so Turkey felt his coat. It made him insolent. He was a man whom prosperity harmed.

Though concerning the self-indulgent habits of Turkey I had my own private surmises, yet touching Nippers I was well persuaded that whatever might be his faults in other respects, he was, at least, a temperate young man. But indeed, nature herself seemed to have been his vintner,¹ and at his birth charged him so thoroughly with an irritable, brandy-like disposition, that all subsequent potations were needless. When I consider how, amid the stillness of my chambers, Nippers would sometimes impatiently rise from his seat, and stooping over his table, spread his arms wide apart, seize the whole desk, and move it, and jerk it, with a grim, grinding motion on the floor, as if the table were a perverse voluntary agent, intent on thwarting and vexing him; I plainly perceive that for Nippers, brandy and water were altogether superfluous.

It was fortunate for me that, owing to its peculiar cause—indigestion—the irritability and consequent nervousness of Nippers, were mainly observable in the morning, while in the afternoon he was comparatively mild. So that Turkey's paroxysms only coming on about twelve o'clock, I never had to do with their eccentricities at one time. Their fits relieved each other like guards. When Nippers' was on, Turkey's was off; and vice versa. This was a good natural arrangement under the circumstances.

Ginger Nut, the third on my list, was a lad some twelve years old. His father was a carman,² ambitious of seeing his son on the bench instead of a cart, before he died. So he sent him to my office as student at law, errand boy, and cleaner and sweeper, at the rate of one dollar a week. He had a little desk to himself, but he did not use it much. Upon inspection, the drawer exhibited a great array of the shells of various sorts of nuts. Indeed, to this quick-witted youth the whole noble science of the law was contained in a nutshell. Not the least among the employments of Ginger Nut, as well as one which he discharged with the most alacrity, was his duty as cake and apple purveyor for Turkey and Nippers. Copying law papers being proverbially a dry, husky sort of business, my two scriveners were fain to moisten their mouths very often with Spitzenbergs³ to be had at the numerous stalls nigh the Custom House and Post Office. Also, they sent Ginger Nut very frequently for that peculiar cake—small, flat, round, and very spicy—after which he had been named by them. Of a cold morning when business was but dull, Turkey would gobble up scores of these cakes, as if they were mere wafers—indeed they sell them at the rate of six or eight for a penny—the scrape of his pen blending with the crunching of the crisp particles in his mouth. Of all the fiery afternoon blunders and flurried rashnesses of Turkey, was his once moistening a ginger-cake between his lips, and clapping it on to a mortgage for a seal. I came within an ace of dismissing him then. But he mollified me by making an oriental bow, and saying—“With submission, sir, it was generous of me to find you in⁴ stationery on my own account.”

- 15 Now my original business—that of a conveyancer and title hunter,⁵ and drawer-up of recondite documents of all sorts—was considerably increased by receiving the master's office. There was now great work for scriveners. Not only must I push the clerks already with me, but I must have additional help. In answer to my advertisement, a motionless young man one morning stood upon my office threshold, the door being open, for it was summer. I can see that figure now—pallidly neat, pitiably respectable, incurably forlorn! It was Bartleby.

After a few words touching his qualifications, I engaged him, glad to have among my corps of copyists a man of so singularly sedate an aspect, which I thought might operate beneficially upon the flighty temper of Turkey, and the fiery one of Nippers.

I should have stated before that ground glass folding-doors divided my premises into two parts, one of which was occupied by my scriveners, the other by myself. According to my humor I threw open these doors, or closed them. I resolved to assign Bartleby a corner by the folding-doors, but on my side of them, so as to have this quiet man within easy call, in case any trifling thing was to be done. I placed his desk close up to a small side-window in that part of the room, a window which originally had afforded a lateral view of certain grimy backyards and bricks, but which, owing to subsequent erections, commanded at present no view at all, though it gave some light. Within three feet of the panes was a wall, and the light came down from far above, between two lofty buildings, as from a very small opening in a dome. Still further to a satisfactory arrangement, I procured a high green folding screen, which might entirely isolate Bartleby from my sight, though not remove him from my voice. And thus, in a manner, privacy and society were conjoined.

5. Lawyer who draws up deeds for transferring property, and one who searches out legal control of title deeds.

At first Bartleby did an extraordinary quantity of writing. As if long famishing for something to copy, he seemed to gorge himself on my documents. There was no pause for digestion. He ran a day and night line, copying by sunlight and by candlelight. I should have been quite delighted with his application, had he been cheerfully industrious. But he wrote on silently, palely, mechanically.

It is, of course, an indispensable part of a scrivener's business to verify the accuracy of his copy, word by word. Where there are two or more scriveners in an office, they assist each other in this examination, one reading from the copy, the other holding the original. It is a very dull, wearisome, and lethargic affair. I can readily imagine that to some sanguine temperaments it would be altogether intolerable. For example, I cannot credit that the mettlesome poet Byron would have contentedly sat down with Bartleby to examine a law document of, say, five hundred pages, closely written in a crimped hand.

Now and then, in the haste of business, it had been my habit to assist in 20 comparing some brief document myself, calling Turkey or Nippers for this purpose. One object I had in placing Bartleby so handy to me behind the screen, was to avail myself of his services on such trivial occasions. It was on the third day, I think, of his being with me, and before any necessity had arisen for having his own writing examined, that, being much hurried to complete a small affair I had in hand, I abruptly called to Bartleby. In my haste and natural expectancy of instant compliance, I sat with my head bent over the original on my desk, and my right hand sideways, and somewhat nervously extended with the copy, so that immediately upon emerging from his retreat, Bartleby might snatch it and proceed to business without the least delay.

In this very attitude did I sit when I called to him, rapidly stating what it was I wanted him to do—namely, to examine a small paper with me. Imagine my surprise, nay, my consternation, when without moving from his privacy, Bartleby, in a singularly mild, firm voice, replied, "I would prefer not to."

I sat awhile in perfect silence, rallying my stunned faculties. Immediately it occurred to me that my ears had deceived me, or Bartleby had entirely misunderstood my meaning. I repeated my request in the clearest tone I could assume. But in quite as clear a one came the previous reply, "I would prefer not to."

"Prefer not to," echoed I, rising in high excitement, and crossing the room with a stride. "What do you mean? Are you moon-struck?⁶ I want you to help me compare this sheet here—take it," and I thrust it towards him.

"I would prefer not to," said he.

I looked at him steadfastly. His face was leanly composed; his gray eye dimly 25 calm. Not a wrinkle of agitation rippled him. Had there been the least uneasiness, anger, impatience or impertinence in his manner; in other words, had there been anything ordinarily human about him, doubtless I should have violently dismissed him from the premises. But as it was, I should have as soon thought of turning my pale plaster-of-paris bust of Cicero⁷ out-of-doors. I stood gazing at him awhile, as he went on with his own writing, and then reseated myself at my desk. This is very strange, thought I. What had one best do? But my business hurried me. I concluded to forget the matter for the present, reserving it for my future leisure. So calling Nippers from the other room, the paper was speedily examined.

A few days after this, Bartleby concluded four lengthy documents, being quadruplicates of a week's testimony taken before me in my High Court of Chancery. It became necessary to examine them. It was an important suit, and great accuracy was imperative. Having all things arranged I called Turkey, Nippers and Ginger Nut from the next room, meaning to place the four copies in the hands of my four clerks, while I should read from the original. Accordingly Turkey, Nippers and Ginger Nut had taken their seats in a row, each with his document in hand, when I called to Bartleby to join this interesting group.

"Bartleby! quick, I am waiting."

I heard a slow scrape of his chair legs on the uncarpeted floor, and soon he appeared standing at the entrance of his hermitage.

"What is wanted?" said he mildly.

30 "The copies, the copies," said I hurriedly. "We are going to examine them. There"—and I held towards him the fourth quadruplicate.

"I would prefer not to," he said, and gently disappeared behind the screen.

For a few moments I was turned into a pillar of salt,⁸ standing at the head of my seated column of clerks. Recovering myself, I advanced towards the screen, and demanded the reason for such extraordinary conduct.

"Why do you refuse?"

"I would prefer not to."

35 With any other man I should have flown outright into a dreadful passion, scorned all further words, and thrust him ignominiously from my presence. But there was something about Bartleby that not only strangely disarmed me, but in a wonderful manner touched and disconcerted me. I began to reason with him.

"These are your own copies we are about to examine. It is labor saving to you, because one examination will answer for your four papers. It is common usage. Every copyist is bound to help examine his copy. Is it not so? Will you not speak? Answer!"

"I prefer not to," he replied in a flute-like tone. It seemed to me that while I had been addressing him, he carefully revolved every statement that I made; fully comprehended the meaning; could not gainsay the irresistible conclusion; but, at the same time, some paramount consideration prevailed with him to reply as he did.

"You are decided, then, not to comply with my request—a request made according to common usage and common sense?"

He briefly gave me to understand that on that point my judgment was sound. Yes: his decision was irreversible.

40 It is not seldom the case that when a man is browbeaten in some unprecedented and violently unreasonable way, he begins to stagger in his own plainest faith. He begins, as it were, vaguely to surmise that, wonderful as it may be, all the justice and all the reason is on the other side. Accordingly, if any disinterested persons are present, he turns to them for some reinforcement for his own faltering mind.

8. Struck dumb; in Genesis 19.26, Lot's wife, defying God's command, "looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt."

"Turkey," said I, "what do you think of this? Am I not right?"

"With submission, sir," said Turkey, with his blandest tone, "I think that you are."

"Nippers," said I, "what do you think of it?"

"I think I should kick him out of the office."

(The reader of nice perceptions will here perceive that, it being morning, 45 Turkey's answer is couched in polite and tranquil terms, but Nippers replies in ill-tempered ones. Or, to repeat a previous sentence, Nippers's ugly mood was on duty, and Turkey's off.)

"Ginger Nut," said I, willing to enlist the smallest suffrage⁹ in my behalf, "what do you think of it?"

"I think, sir, he's a little lunny," replied Ginger Nut, with a grin.

"You hear what they say," said I, turning towards the screen, "come forth and do your duty."

But he vouchsafed no reply. I pondered a moment in sore perplexity. But once more business hurried me. I determined again to postpone the consideration of this dilemma to my future leisure. With a little trouble we made out to examine the papers without Bartleby, though at every page or two, Turkey deferentially dropped his opinion that this proceeding was quite out of the common; while Nippers, twitching in his chair with a dyspeptic nervousness, ground out between his set teeth occasional hissing maledictions against the stubborn oaf behind the screen. And for his (Nippers's) part, this was the first and the last time he would do another man's business without pay.

Meanwhile Bartleby sat in his hermitage, oblivious to everything but his own 50 peculiar business there.

Some days passed, the scrivener being employed upon another lengthy work. His late remarkable conduct led me to regard his ways narrowly. I observed that he never went to dinner; indeed that he never went anywhere. As yet I had never of my personal knowledge known him to be outside of my office. He was a perpetual sentry in the corner. At about eleven o'clock though, in the morning, I noticed that Ginger Nut would advance toward the opening in Bartleby's screen, as if silently beckoned thither by a gesture invisible to me where I sat. The boy would then leave the office jingling a few pence, and reappear with a handful of ginger-nuts which he delivered in the hermitage, receiving two of the cakes for his trouble.

He lives, then, on ginger-nuts, thought I; never eats a dinner, properly speaking; he must be a vegetarian then; but no; he never eats even vegetables, he eats nothing but ginger-nuts. My mind then ran on in reveries concerning the probable effects upon the human constitution of living entirely on ginger-nuts. Ginger-nuts are so called because they contain ginger as one of their peculiar constituents, and the final flavoring one. Now what was ginger? A hot, spicy thing. Was Bartleby hot and spicy? Not at all. Ginger, then, had no effect upon Bartleby. Probably he preferred it should have none.

Nothing so aggravates an earnest person as a passive resistance. If the individual so resisted be of a not inhumane temper, and the resisting one perfectly harmless in his passivity; then, in the better moods of the former, he will endeavor charitably to construe to his imagination what proves impossible to be solved by his judgment. Even so, for the most part, I regarded Bartleby and his ways. Poor fellow! thought I, he means no mischief; it is plain he intends no insolence; his aspect sufficiently evinces that his eccentricities are involuntary. He is useful to me. I can get along with him. If I turn him away, the chances are he will fall in with some less indulgent employer, and then he will be rudely treated, and perhaps driven forth miserably to starve. Yes. Here I can cheaply purchase a delicious self-approval. To befriend Bartleby; to humor him in his strange wilfulness, will cost me little or nothing, while I lay up in my soul what will eventually prove a sweet morsel for my conscience. But this mood was not invariable with me. The passiveness of Bartleby sometimes irritated me. I felt strangely goaded on to encounter him in new opposition, to elicit some angry spark from him answerable to my own. But indeed I might as well have essayed to strike fire with my knuckles against a bit of Windsor soap.¹ But one afternoon the evil impulse in me mastered me, and the following little scene ensued:

"Bartleby," said I, "when those papers are all copied, I will compare them with you."

55 "I would prefer not to."

"How? Surely you do not mean to persist in that mulish vagary?"

No answer.

I threw open the folding-doors near by, and turning upon Turkey and Nippers, exclaimed in an excited manner—

"He says, a second time, he won't examine his papers. What do you think of it, Turkey?"

60 It was afternoon, be it remembered. Turkey sat glowing like a brass boiler, his bald head steaming, his hands reeling among his blotted papers.

"Think of it?" roared Turkey; "I think I'll just step behind his screen, and black his eyes for him!"

So saying, Turkey rose to his feet and threw his arms into a pugilistic position. He was hurrying away to make good his promise, when I detained him, alarmed at the effect of incautiously rousing Turkey's combativeness after dinner.

"Sit down, Turkey," said I, "and hear what Nippers has to say. What do you think of it, Nippers? Would I not be justified in immediately dismissing Bartleby?"

"Excuse me, that is for you to decide, sir. I think his conduct quite unusual, and indeed unjust, as regards Turkey and myself. But it may only be a passing whim."

65 "Ah," exclaimed I, "you have strangely changed your mind then—you speak very gently of him now."

"All beer," cried Turkey; "gentleness is effects of beer—Nippers and I dined together today. You see how gentle I am, sir. Shall I go and black his eyes?"

"You refer to Bartleby, I suppose. No, not today, Turkey," I replied; "pray, put up your fists."

I closed the doors, and again advanced towards Bartleby. I felt additional incentives tempting me to my fate. I burned to be rebelled against again. I remembered that Bartleby never left the office.

"Bartleby," said I, "Ginger Nut is away; just step round to the Post Office, won't you? (it was but a three minutes' walk,) and see if there is anything for me."

1. Scented soap, usually brown.

"I would prefer not to."

"You will not?"

"I prefer not."

I staggered to my desk, and sat there in a deep study. My blind inveteracy returned. Was there any other thing in which I could procure myself to be ignominiously repulsed by this lean, penniless wight?—my hired clerk? What added thing is there, perfectly reasonable, that he will be sure to refuse to do?

"Bartleby!"

No answer.

"Bartleby," in a louder tone.

No answer.

"Bartleby," I roared.

Like a very ghost, agreeably to the laws of magical invocation, at the third summons, he appeared at the entrance of his hermitage.

"Go to the next room, and tell Nippers to come to me."

"I prefer not to," he respectfully and slowly said, and mildly disappeared.

"Very good, Bartleby," said I, in a quiet sort of serenely severe self-possessed tone, intimating the unalterable purpose of some terrible retribution very close at hand. At the moment I half intended something of the kind. But upon the whole, as it was drawing towards my dinner-hour, I thought it best to put on my hat and walk home for the day, suffering much from perplexity and distress of mind.

Shall I acknowledge it? The conclusion of this whole business was, that it soon became a fixed fact of my chambers, that a pale young scrivener, by the name of Bartleby, had a desk there; that he copied for me at the usual rate of four cents a folio (one hundred words); but he was permanently exempt from examining the work done by him, that duty being transferred to Turkey and Nippers, one of compliment doubtless to their superior acuteness; moreover, said Bartleby was never on any account to be dispatched on the most trivial errand of any sort; and that even if entreated to take upon him such a matter, it was generally understood that he would prefer not to—in other words, that he would refuse point-blank.

As days passed on, I became considerably reconciled to Bartleby. His steadiness, his freedom from all dissipation, his incessant industry (except when he chose to throw himself into a standing reverie behind his screen), his great stillness, his unalterableness of demeanor under all circumstances, made him a valuable acquisition. One prime thing was this,—he was always there;—first in the morning, continually through the day, and the last at night. I had a singular confidence in his honesty. I felt my most precious papers perfectly safe in his hands. Sometimes to be sure I could not, for the very soul of me, avoid falling into sudden spasmodic passions with him. For it was exceeding difficult to bear in mind all the time those strange peculiarities, privileges, and unheard of exemptions, forming the tacit stipulations on Bartleby's part under which he remained in my office. Now and then, in the eagerness of dispatching pressing business, I would inadvertently summon Bartleby, in a short, rapid tone, to put his finger, say, on the incipient tie of a bit of red tape with which I was about compressing some papers. Of course, from behind the screen the usual answer, "I prefer not to," was sure to come; and then, how could a human creature with the common infirmities of our nature, refrain from bitterly exclaiming upon such perverseness—such unreasonableness? However, every added repulse of this sort which I received only tended to lessen the probability of my repeating the inadvertence.

85 Here it must be said, that according to the custom of most legal gentlemen occupying chambers in densely-populated law buildings, there were several keys to my door. One was kept by a woman residing in the attic, which person weekly scrubbed and daily swept and dusted my apartments. Another was kept by Turkey for convenience sake. The third I sometimes carried in my own pocket. The fourth I knew not who had.

Now, one Sunday morning I happened to go to Trinity Church, to hear a celebrated preacher, and finding myself rather early on the ground, I thought I would walk round to my chambers for a while. Luckily I had my key with me; but upon applying it to the lock, I found it resisted by something inserted from the inside. Quite surprised, I called out; when to my consternation a key was turned from within; and thrusting his lean visage at me, and holding the door ajar, the apparition of Bartleby appeared, in his shirt sleeves, and otherwise in a strangely tattered dishabille, saying quietly that he was sorry, but he was deeply engaged just then, and—preferred not admitting me at present. In a brief word or two, he moreover added, that perhaps I had better walk round the block two or three times, and by that time he would probably have concluded his affairs.

Now, the utterly unsurmised appearance of Bartleby, tenanting my law-chambers of a Sunday morning, with his cadaverously gentlemanly nonchalance, yet withal firm and self-possessed, had such a strange effect upon me, that incontinently I slunk away from my own door, and did as desired. But not without sundry twinges of impotent rebellion against the mild effrontery of this unaccountable scrivener. Indeed, it was his wonderful mildness, chiefly, which not only disarmed me, but unmanned me, as it were. For I consider that one, for the time, is sort of unmanned when he tranquilly permits his hired clerk to dictate to him, and order him away from his own premises. Furthermore, I was full of uneasiness as to what Bartleby could possibly be doing in my office in his shirt sleeves, and in an otherwise dismantled condition of a Sunday morning. Was anything amiss going on? Nay, that was out of the question. It was not to be thought of for a moment that Bartleby was an immoral person. But what could he be doing there?—copying? Nay again, whatever might be his eccentricities, Bartleby was an eminently decorous person. He would be the last man to sit down to his desk in any state approaching to nudity. Besides, it was Sunday; and there was something about Bartleby that forbade the supposition that he would by any secular occupation violate the proprieties of the day.

Nevertheless, my mind was not pacified; and full of a restless curiosity, at last I returned to the door. Without hindrance I inserted my key, opened it, and entered. Bartleby was not to be seen. I looked round anxiously, peeped behind his screen; but it was very plain that he was gone. Upon more closely examining the place, I surmised that for an indefinite period Bartleby must have ate, dressed, and slept in my office, and that too without plate, mirror, or bed. The cushioned seat of a ricketty old sofa in one corner bore the faint impress of a lean, reclining form. Rolled away under his desk, I found a blanket under the empty grate, a blacking box² and brush; on a chair, a tin basin, with soap and a ragged towel; in a newspaper a few crumbs of ginger-nuts and a morsel of cheese. Yes, thought I, it is evident enough that Bartleby has been making his home here, keeping bachelor's hall all by himself. Immediately then the thought came sweeping across me, What miserable friendlessness and loneliness are here revealed! His poverty is great; but his solitude, how horrible! Think of it. Of a Sunday, Wall Street is deserted as Petra;³ and every night of every day it is an emptiness. This building too, which of weekdays hums with industry and life, at nightfall echoes with sheer vacancy, and all through Sunday is forlorn. And here Bartleby makes his home; sole spectator of a solitude which he has seen all populous—a sort of innocent and transformed Marius brooding among the ruins of Carthage!⁴

For the first time in my life a feeling of overpowering stinging melancholy seized me. Before, I had never experienced aught but a not-unpleasing sadness. The bond of a common humanity now drew me irresistibly to gloom. A fraternal melancholy! For both I and Bartleby were sons of Adam. I remembered the bright silks and sparkling faces I had seen that day, in gala trim, swan-like sailing down the Mississippi of Broadway; and I contrasted them with the pallid copyist, and thought to myself, Ah, happiness courts the light, so we deem the world is gay; but misery hides aloof, so we deem that misery there is none. These sad fancyings—chimeras, doubtless, of a sick and silly brain—led on to other and more special thoughts, concerning the eccentricities of Bartleby. Presentiments of strange discoveries hovered round me. The scrivener's pale form appeared to me laid out, among uncaring strangers, in its shivering winding sheet.

Suddenly I was attracted by Bartleby's closed desk, the key in open sight left 90 in the lock.

I mean no mischief, seek the gratification of no heartless curiosity, thought I; besides, the desk is mine, and its contents too, so I will make bold to look within. Everything was methodically arranged, the papers smoothly placed. The pigeon-holes were deep, and removing the files of documents, I groped into their recesses. Presently I felt something there, and dragged it out. It was an old bandanna handkerchief, heavy and knotted. I opened it, and saw it was a savings' bank.

I now recalled all the quiet mysteries which I had noted in the man. I remembered that he never spoke but to answer; that though at intervals he had considerable time to himself, yet I had never seen him reading—no, not even a newspaper; that for long periods he would stand looking out, at his pale window behind the screen, upon the dead brick wall; I was quite sure he never visited any refectory or eating house; while his pale face clearly indicated that he never drank beer like Turkey, or tea and coffee even, like other men; that he never went anywhere in particular that I could learn; never went out for a walk, unless indeed that was the case at present; that he had declined telling who he was, or whence he came, or whether he had any relatives in the world; that though so thin and pale, he never complained of ill health. And more than all, I remembered a certain unconscious air of pallid—how shall I call it?—of pallid haughtiness, say, or rather an austere reserve about him, which had positively awed me into my tame compliance with his eccentricities, when I had feared to ask him to do the slightest incidental thing for me, even though I might know, from his long-continued motionlessness, that behind his screen he must be standing in one of those dead-wall reveries of his.

4. Gaius (or Caius) Marius (157–86 BCE), Roman consul and general, expelled from Rome in 88 BCE by Sulla; when an officer of Sextilius, the governor, forbade him to land in Africa, Marius replied, "Go tell him that you have seen Caius Marius sitting in exile among the ruins of Carthage," applying the example of the fortune of that city to the change of his own condition. The image was so common that a few years after the publication of Bartleby, Dickens apologized for using it.

Revolving all these things, and coupling them with the recently discovered fact that he made my office his constant abiding place and home, and not forgetful of his morbid moodiness; revolving all these things, a prudential feeling began to steal over me. My first emotions had been those of pure melancholy and sincerest pity; but just in proportion as the forlornness of Bartleby grew and grew to my imagination, did that same melancholy merge into fear, that pity into repulsion. So true it is, and so terrible too, that up to a certain point the thought or sight of misery enlists our best affections; but, in certain special cases, beyond that point it does not. They err who would assert that invariably this is owing to the inherent selfishness of the human heart. It rather proceeds from a certain hopelessness of remedying excessive and organic ill. To a sensitive being, pity is not seldom pain. And when at last it is perceived that such pity cannot lead to effectual succor, common sense bids the soul be rid of it. What I saw that morning persuaded me that the scrivener was the victim of innate and incurable disorder. I might give alms to his body; but his body did not pain him; it was his soul that suffered, and his soul I could not reach.

I did not accomplish the purpose of going to Trinity Church that morning. Somehow, the things I had seen disqualified me for the time from churchgoing. I walked homeward, thinking what I would do with Bartleby. Finally, I resolved upon this;—I would put certain calm questions to him the next morning, touching his history, &c., and if he declined to answer them openly and unreservedly (and I supposed he would prefer not), then to give him a twenty-dollar bill over and above whatever I might owe him, and tell him his services were no longer required; but that if in any other way I could assist him, I would be happy to do so, especially if he desired to return to his native place, wherever that might be, I would willingly help to defray the expenses. Moreover, if, after reaching home, he found himself at any time in want of aid, a letter from him would be sure of a reply.

95 The next morning came.

“Bartleby,” said I, gently calling to him behind his screen.

No reply.

“Bartleby,” said I, in a still gentler tone, “come here; I am not going to ask you to do anything you would prefer not to do—I simply wish to speak to you.”

Upon this he noiselessly slid into view.

100 “Will you tell me, Bartleby, where you were born?”

“I would prefer not to.”

“Will you tell me anything about yourself?”

“I would prefer not to.”

“But what reasonable objection can you have to speak to me? I feel friendly towards you.”

105 He did not look at me while I spoke, but kept his glance fixed upon my bust of Cicero, which as I then sat, was directly behind me, some six inches above my head.

"What is your answer, Bartleby?" said I, after waiting a considerable time for a reply, during which his countenance remained immovable, only there was the faintest conceivable tremor of the white attenuated mouth.

"At present I prefer to give no answer," he said, and retired into his hermitage.

It was rather weak in me I confess, but his manner on this occasion nettled me. Not only did there seem to lurk in it a certain calm disdain, but his perverseness seemed ungrateful, considering the undeniable good usage and indulgence he had received from me.

Again I sat ruminating what I should do. Mortified as I was at his behavior, and resolved as I had been to dismiss him when I entered my office, nevertheless I strangely felt something superstitious knocking at my heart, and forbidding me to carry out my purpose, and denouncing me for a villain if I dared to breathe one bitter word against this forlornest of mankind. At last, familiarly drawing my chair behind his screen, I sat down and said: "Bartleby, never mind then about revealing your history; but let me entreat you, as a friend, to comply as far as may be with the usages of this office. Say now you will help to examine papers tomorrow or next day: in short, say now that in a day or two you will begin to be a little reasonable:—say so, Bartleby."

"At present I would prefer not to be a little reasonable," was his mildly cadaverous reply. 110

Just then the folding-doors opened, and Nippers approached. He seemed suffering from an unusually bad night's rest, induced by severer indigestion than common. He overheard those final words of Bartleby.

"Prefer not, eh?" grittled Nippers—"I'd prefer him, if I were you, sir," addressing me—"I'd prefer him; I'd give him preferences, the stubborn mule! What is it, sir, pray, that he prefers not to do now?"

Bartleby moved not a limb.

"Mr. Nippers," said I, "I'd prefer that you would withdraw for the present."

Somehow, of late I had got into the way of involuntarily using this word "prefer" 115 upon all sorts of not exactly suitable occasions. And I trembled to think that my contact with the scrivener had already and seriously affected me in a mental way. And what further and deeper aberration might it not yet produce? This apprehension had not been without efficacy in determining me to summary means.

As Nippers, looking very sour and sulky, was departing, Turkey blandly and deferentially approached.

"With submission, sir," said he, "yesterday I was thinking about Bartleby here, and I think that if he would but prefer to take a quart of good ale every day, it would do much towards mending him and enabling him to assist in examining his papers."

"So you have got the word too," said I, slightly excited.

"With submission, what word, sir?" asked Turkey, respectfully crowding himself into the contracted space behind the screen, and by so doing making me jostle the scrivener. "What word, sir?"

"I would prefer to be left alone here," said Bartleby, as if offended at being 120 mobbed in his privacy.

"That's the word, Turkey," said I—"that's it."

"Oh, prefer? oh yes—queer word. I never use it myself. But, sir, as I was saying, if he would but prefer—"

"Turkey," interrupted I, "you will please withdraw."

"Oh certainly, sir, if you prefer that I should."

125 As he opened the folding-door to retire, Nippers at his desk caught a glimpse of me, and asked whether I would prefer to have a certain paper copied on blue paper or white. He did not in the least roguishly accent the word prefer. It was plain that it involuntarily rolled from his tongue. I thought to myself, surely I must get rid of a demented man, who already has in some degree turned the tongues, if not the heads of myself and clerks. But I thought it prudent not to break the dismissal at once.

The next day I noticed that Bartleby did nothing but stand at his window in his dead-wall revery. Upon asking him why he did not write, he said that he had decided upon doing no more writing.

"Why, how now? what next?" exclaimed I, "do no more writing?"

"No more."

"And what is the reason?"

130 "Do you not see the reason for yourself," he indifferently replied.

I looked steadfastly at him, and perceived that his eyes looked dull and glazed. Instantly it occurred to me, that his unexampled diligence in copying by his dim window for the first few weeks of his stay with me might have temporarily impaired his vision.

I was touched. I said something in condolence with him. I hinted that of course he did wisely in abstaining from writing for a while; and urged him to embrace that opportunity of taking wholesome exercise in the open air. This, however, he did not do. A few days after this, my other clerks being absent, and being in a great hurry to dispatch certain letters by the mail, I thought that, having nothing else earthly to do, Bartleby would surely be less inflexible than usual, and carry these letters to the post office. But he blankly declined. So, much to my inconvenience, I went myself.

Still added days went by. Whether Bartleby's eyes improved or not, I could not say. To all appearance, I thought they did. But when I asked him if they did, he vouchsafed no answer. At all events, he would do no copying. At last, in reply to my urgings, he informed me that he had permanently given up copying.

"What!" exclaimed I; "suppose your eyes should get entirely well—better than ever before—would you not copy then?"

135 "I have given up copying," he answered, and slid aside.

He remained, as ever, a fixture in my chamber. Nay—if that were possible—he became still more of a fixture than before. What was to be done? He would do nothing in the office: why should he stay there? In plain fact, he had now become a millstone⁵ to me, not only useless as a necklace, but afflictive to bear. Yet I was sorry for him. I speak less than truth when I say that, on his own account, he occasioned me uneasiness. If he would but have named a single relative or friend, I would instantly have written, and urged their taking the poor fellow away to some convenient retreat. But he seemed alone, absolutely alone in the universe. A bit of wreck in the mid-Atlantic. At length, necessities connected with my business tyrannized over all other considerations. Decently as I could, I told Bartleby that in six days' time he must unconditionally leave the office. I warned him to take measures, in the interval, for procuring some other abode. I offered to assist him in this endeavor, if he himself would but take the first step towards a removal. "And when you finally quit me, Bartleby," added I, "I shall see that you go not away entirely unprovided. Six days from this hour, remember."

At the expiration of that period, I peeped behind the screen, and lo! Bartleby was there.

I buttoned up my coat, balanced myself; advanced slowly towards him, touched his shoulder, and said, "The time has come; you must quit this place; I am sorry for you; here is money; but you must go."

"I would prefer not," he replied, with his back still towards me.

"You must."

He remained silent.

Now I had an unbounded confidence in this man's common honesty. He had frequently restored to me sixpences and shillings⁶ carelessly dropped upon the floor, for I am apt to be very reckless in such shirt-button affairs. The proceeding then which followed will not be deemed extraordinary.

"Bartleby," said I, "I owe you twelve dollars on account; here are thirty-two; the odd twenty are yours.—Will you take it?" and I handed the bills towards him.

But he made no motion.

"I will leave them here then," putting them under a weight on the table. Then 145 taking my hat and cane and going to the door I tranquilly turned and added—"After you have removed your things from these offices, Bartleby, you will of course lock the door—since everyone is now gone for the day but you—and if you please, slip your key underneath the mat, so that I may have it in the morning. I shall not see you again; so good-bye to you. If hereafter in your new place of abode I can be of any service to you, do not fail to advise me by letter. Good-bye, Bartleby, and fare you well."

But he answered not a word; like the last column of some ruined temple, he remained standing mute and solitary in the middle of the otherwise deserted room.

As I walked home in a pensive mood, my vanity got the better of my pity. I could not but highly plume myself on my masterly management in getting rid of Bartleby. Masterly I call it, and such it must appear to any dispassionate thinker. The beauty of my procedure seemed to consist in its perfect quietness. There was no vulgar bullying, no bravado of any sort, no choleric hectoring, and striding to and fro across the apartment, jerking out vehement commands for Bartleby to bundle himself off with his beggarly traps.⁷ Nothing of the kind. Without loudly bidding Bartleby depart—as an inferior genius might have done—I assumed the ground that depart he must; and upon that assumption built all I had to say. The more I thought over my procedure, the more I was charmed with it. Nevertheless, next morning, upon awakening, I had my doubts,—I had somehow slept off the fumes of vanity. One of the coolest and wisest hours a man has is just after he awakes in the morning. My procedure seemed as sagacious as ever,—but only in theory. How it would prove in practice—there was the rub. It was truly a beautiful thought to have assumed Bartleby's departure; but, after all, that assumption was simply my own, and none of Bartleby's. The great point was, not whether I had assumed that he would quit me, but whether he would prefer so to do. He was more a man of preferences than assumptions.

After breakfast, I walked downtown, arguing the probabilities pro and con. One moment I thought it would prove a miserable failure, and Bartleby would be found all alive at my office as usual; the next moment it seemed certain that I should see his chair empty. And so I kept veering about. At the corner of Broadway and Canal Street, I saw quite an excited group of people standing in earnest conversation.

"I'll take odds he doesn't," said a voice as I passed.

150 "Doesn't go?—done!" said I, "put up your money."

I was instinctively putting my hand in my pocket to produce my own, when I remembered that this was an election day. The words I had overheard bore no reference to Bartleby, but to the success or non-success of some candidate for the mayoralty. In my intent frame of mind, I had, as it were, imagined that all Broadway shared in my excitement, and were debating the same question with me. I passed on, very thankful that the uproar of the street screened my momentary absent-mindedness.

As I had intended, I was earlier than usual at my office door. I stood listening for a moment. All was still. He must be gone. I tried the knob. The door was locked. Yes, my procedure had worked to a charm; he indeed must be vanished. Yet a certain melancholy mixed with this: I was almost sorry for my brilliant success. I was fumbling under the door mat for the key, which Bartleby was to have left there for me, when accidentally my knee knocked against a panel, producing a summoning sound, and in response a voice came to me from within—"Not yet; I am occupied."

It was Bartleby.

I was thunderstruck. For an instant I stood like the man who, pipe in mouth, was killed one cloudless afternoon long ago in Virginia, by summer lightning; at his own warm open window he was killed, and remained leaning out there upon the dreamy afternoon, till some one touched him, when he fell.

155 "Not gone!" I murmured at last. But again obeying that wondrous ascendancy which the inscrutable scrivener had over me, and from which ascendancy, for all my chafing, I could not completely escape, I slowly went downstairs and out into the street, and while walking round the block, considered what I should next do in this unheard-of perplexity. Turn the man out by an actual thrusting I could not; to drive him away by calling him hard names would not do; calling in the police was an unpleasant idea; and yet, permit him to enjoy his cadaverous triumph over me,—this too I could not think of. What was to be done? or, if nothing could be done, was there anything further that I could assume in the matter? Yes, as before I had prospectively assumed that Bartleby would depart, so now I might retrospectively assume that departed he was. In the legitimate carrying out of this assumption, I might enter my office in a great hurry, and pretending not to see Bartleby at all, walk straight against him as if he were air. Such a proceeding would in a singular degree have the appearance of a home-thrust.⁸ It was hardly possible that Bartleby could withstand such an application of the doctrine of assumptions. But upon second thoughts the success of the plan seemed rather dubious. I resolved to argue the matter over with him again.

"Bartleby," said I, entering the office, with a quietly severe expression, "I am seriously displeased. I am pained, Bartleby. I had thought better of you. I had imagined you of such a gentlemanly organization, that in any delicate dilemma a slight hint would suffice—in short, an assumption. But it appears I am deceived. Why," I added, unaffectedly starting, "you have not even touched that money yet," pointing to it, just where I had left it the evening previous.

He answered nothing.

"Will you, or will you not, quit me?" I now demanded in a sudden passion, advancing close to him.

"I would prefer not to quit you," he replied, gently emphasizing the not.

"What earthly right have you to stay here? Do you pay any rent? Do you pay 160 my taxes? Or is this property yours?"

He answered nothing.

"Are you ready to go on and write now? Are your eyes recovered? Could you copy a small paper for me this morning? or help examine a few lines? or step round to the post office? In a word, will you do anything at all, to give a coloring to your refusal to depart the premises?"

He silently retired into his hermitage.

I was now in such a state of nervous resentment that I thought it but prudent to check myself at present from further demonstrations. Bartleby and I were alone. I remembered the tragedy of the unfortunate Adams and the still more unfortunate Colt in the solitary office of the latter;⁹ and how poor Colt, being dreadfully incensed by Adams, and imprudently permitting himself to get wildly excited, was at unawares hurried into his fatal act—an act which certainly no man could possibly deplore more than the actor himself. Often it had occurred to me in my ponderings upon the subject, that had that altercation taken place in the public street, or at a private residence, it would not have terminated as it did. It was the circumstance of being alone in a solitary office, up stairs, of a building entirely unhallowed by humanizing domestic associations—an uncarpeted office, doubtless, of a dusty, haggard sort of appearance;—this it must have been, which greatly helped to enhance the irritable desperation of the hapless Colt.

But when this old Adam¹ of resentment rose in me and tempted me concern- 165 ing Bartleby, I grappled him and threw him. How? Why, simply by recalling the divine injunction: "A new commandment² give I unto you, that ye love one another." Yes, this it was that saved me. Aside from higher considerations, charity often operates as a vastly wise and prudent principle—a great safeguard to its possessor. Men have committed murder for jealousy's sake, and anger's sake, and hatred's sake, and selfishness' sake, and spiritual pride's sake; but no man that ever I heard of, ever committed a diabolical murder for sweet charity's sake. Mere self-interest, then, if no better motive can be enlisted, should, especially with high-tempered men, prompt all beings to charity and philanthropy. At any rate, upon the occasion in question, I strove to drown my exasperated feelings towards the scrivener by benevolently construing his conduct. Poor fellow, poor fellow! thought I, he don't mean anything; and besides, he has seen hard times, and ought to be indulged.

I endeavored also immediately to occupy myself, and at the same time to comfort my despondency. I tried to fancy that in the course of the morning, at such time as might prove agreeable to him, Bartleby, of his own free accord, would emerge from his hermitage, and take up some decided line of march in the direction of the door. But no. Half-past twelve o'clock came; Turkey began to glow in the face, overturn his inkstand, and become generally obstreperous; Nippers abated down into quietude and courtesy; Ginger Nut munched his noon apple; and Bartleby remained standing at his window in one of his profoundest dead-wall reveries. Will it be credited? Ought I to acknowledge it? That afternoon I left the office without saying one further word to him.

Some days now passed, during which, at leisure intervals I looked a little into "Edwards on the Will," and "Priestley on Necessity."³ Under the circumstances, those books induced a salutary feeling. Gradually I slid into the persuasion that these troubles of mine touching the scrivener, had been all predestinated from eternity, and Bartleby was billeted upon me for some mysterious purpose of an all-wise Providence, which it was not for a mere mortal like me to fathom. Yes, Bartleby, stay there behind your screen, thought I; I shall persecute you no more; you are harmless and noiseless as any of these old chairs; in short, I never feel so private as when I know you are here. At least I see it, I feel it; I penetrate to the predestinated purpose of my life. I am content. Others may have loftier parts to enact; but my mission in this world, Bartleby, is to furnish you with office-room for such period as you may see fit to remain.

I believe that this wise and blessed frame of mind would have continued with me, had it not been for the unsolicited and uncharitable remarks obtruded upon me by my professional friends who visited the rooms. But thus it often is, that the constant friction of illiberal minds wears out at last the best resolves of the more generous. Though to be sure, when I reflected upon it, it was not strange that people entering my office should be struck by the peculiar aspect of the unaccountable Bartleby, and so be tempted to throw out some sinister observations concerning him. Sometimes an attorney having business with me, and calling at my office, and finding no one but the scrivener there, would undertake to obtain some sort of precise information from him touching my whereabouts; but without heeding his idle talk, Bartleby would remain standing immovable in the middle of the room. So after contemplating him in that position for a time, the attorney would depart, no wiser than he came.

3. Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), New England Calvinist theologian and revivalist, in The Freedom of the Will (1754), argued that human beings are not in fact free, for though they choose according to the way they see things, that way is predetermined (by biography, environment, and character), and they act out of personality rather than by will. Joseph Priestley (1733–1804), dissenting preacher, scientist, grammarian, and philosopher, argued in The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity (1777) that free will is theologically objectionable, metaphysically incomprehensible, and morally undesirable.

Also, when a Reference⁴ was going on, and the room full of lawyers and witnesses and business was driving fast; some deeply occupied legal gentleman present, seeing Bartleby wholly unemployed, would request him to run round to his (the legal gentleman's) office and fetch some papers for him. Thereupon, Bartleby would tranquilly decline, and yet remain idle as before. Then the lawyer would give a great stare, and turn to me. And what could I say? At last I was made aware that all through the circle of my professional acquaintance, a whisper of wonder was running round, having reference to the strange creature I kept at my office. This worried me very much. And as the idea came upon me of his possibly turning out a long-lived man, and keep occupying my chambers, and denying my authority; and perplexing my visitors; and scandalizing my professional reputation; and casting a general gloom over the premises; keeping soul and body together to the last upon his savings (for doubtless he spent but half a dime a day), and in the end perhaps outlive me, and claim possession of my office by right of his perpetual occupancy: as all these dark anticipations crowded upon me more and more, and my friends continually intruded their relentless remarks upon the apparition in my room; a great change was wrought in me. I resolved to gather all my faculties together, and forever rid me of this intolerable incubus.⁵

Ere revolving any complicated project, however, adapted to this end, I first 170 simply suggested to Bartleby the propriety of his permanent departure. In a calm and serious tone, I commended the idea to his careful and mature consideration. But having taken three days to meditate upon it, he apprised me that his original determination remained the same; in short, that he still preferred to abide with me.

What shall I do? I now said to myself, buttoning up my coat to the last button. What shall I do? what ought I to do? what does conscience say I should do with this man, or rather ghost. Rid myself of him, I must; go, he shall. But how? You will not thrust him, the poor, pale, passive mortal,—you will not thrust such a helpless creature out of your door? you will not dishonor yourself by such cruelty? No, I will not, I cannot do that. Rather would I let him live and die here, and then mason up his remains in the wall. What then will you do? For all your coaxing, he will not budge. Bribes he leaves under your own paperweight on your table; in short, it is quite plain that he prefers to cling to you.

Then something severe, something unusual must be done. What! surely you will not have him collared by a constable, and commit his innocent pallor to the common jail? And upon what ground could you procure such a thing to be done?—a vagrant, is he? What! he a vagrant, a wanderer, who refuses to budge? It is because he will not be a vagrant, then, that you seek to count him as a vagrant. That is too absurd. No visible means of support: there I have him. Wrong again: for indubitably he does support himself, and that is the only unanswerable proof that any man can show of his possessing the means so to do. No more then. Since he will not quit me, I must quit him. I will change my offices;

5. Evil spirit.

I will move elsewhere; and give him fair notice, that if I find him on my new premises I will then proceed against him as a common trespasser.

Acting accordingly, next day I thus addressed him: "I find these chambers too far from the City Hall; the air is unwholesome. In a word, I propose to remove my offices next week, and shall no longer require your services. I tell you this now, in order that you may seek another place."

He made no reply, and nothing more was said.

175 On the appointed day I engaged carts and men, proceeded to my chambers, and having but little furniture, everything was removed in a few hours. Throughout, the scrivener remained standing behind the screen, which I directed to be removed the last thing. It was withdrawn; and being folded up like a huge folio, left him the motionless occupant of a naked room. I stood in the entry watching him a moment, while something from within me upbraided me.

I re-entered, with my hand in my pocket—and—and my heart in my mouth.

"Good-bye, Bartleby; I am going—good-bye, and God some way bless you; and take that," slipping something in his hand. But it dropped upon the floor, and then,—strange to say—I tore myself from him whom I had so longed to be rid of.

Established in my new quarters, for a day or two I kept the door locked, and started at every footfall in the passages. When I returned to my rooms after any little absence, I would pause at the threshold for an instant, and attentively listen, ere applying my key. But these fears were needless. Bartleby never came nigh me.

I thought all was going well, when a perturbed-looking stranger visited me, inquiring whether I was the person who had recently occupied rooms at No. — Wall Street.

180 Full of forebodings, I replied that I was.

"Then sir," said the stranger, who proved a lawyer, "you are responsible for the man you left there. He refuses to do any copying; he refuses to do anything; he says he prefers not to; and he refuses to quit the premises."

"I am very sorry, sir," said I, with assumed tranquillity, but an inward tremor, "but, really, the man you allude to is nothing to me—he is no relation or apprentice of mine, that you should hold me responsible for him."

"In mercy's name, who is he?"

"I certainly cannot inform you. I know nothing about him. Formerly I employed him as a copyist; but he has done nothing for me now for some time past."

185 "I shall settle him then,—good morning, sir."

Several days passed, and I heard nothing more; and though I often felt a charitable prompting to call at the place and see poor Bartleby, yet a certain squeamishness of I know not what withheld me.

All is over with him, by this time, thought I at last, when through another week no further intelligence reached me. But coming to my room the day after, I found several persons waiting at my door in a high state of nervous excitement.

"That's the man—here he comes," cried the foremost one, whom I recognized as the lawyer who had previously called upon me alone.

"You must take him away, sir, at once," cried a portly person among them, advancing upon me, and whom I knew to be the landlord of No. — Wall Street.

"These gentlemen, my tenants, cannot stand it any longer; Mr. B——" pointing to the lawyer, "has turned him out of his room, and he now persists in haunting the building generally, sitting upon the banisters of the stairs by day, and sleeping in the entry by night. Everybody is concerned; clients are leaving the offices; some fears are entertained of a mob; something you must do, and that without delay."

Aghast at this torrent, I fell back before it, and would fain have locked myself 190 in my new quarters. In vain I persisted that Bartleby was nothing to me—no more than to anyone else. In vain:—I was the last person known to have anything to do with him, and they held me to the terrible account. Fearful then of being exposed in the papers (as one person present obscurely threatened) I considered the matter, and at length said, that if the lawyer would give me a confidential interview with the scrivener, in his (the lawyer's) own room, I would that afternoon strive my best to rid them of the nuisance they complained of.

Going upstairs to my old haunt, there was Bartleby silently sitting upon the banister at the landing.

"What are you doing here, Bartleby?" said I.

"Sitting upon the banister," he mildly replied.

I motioned him into the lawyer's room, who then left us.

"Bartleby," said I, "are you aware that you are the cause of great tribulation to 195 me, by persisting in occupying the entry after being dismissed from the office?"

No answer.

"Now one of two things must take place. Either you must do something, or something must be done to you. Now what sort of business would you like to engage in? Would you like to re-engage in copying for someone?"

"No; I would prefer not to make any change."

"Would you like a clerkship in a dry-goods store?"

"There is too much confinement about that. No, I would not like a clerkship; 200 but I am not particular."

"Too much confinement," I cried, "why you keep yourself confined all the time!"

"I would prefer not to take a clerkship," he rejoined, as if to settle that little item at once.

"How would a bartender's business suit you? There is no trying of the eyesight in that."

"I would not like it at all; though, as I said before, I am not particular."

His unwonted wordiness inspirited me. I returned to the charge. 205

"Well then, would you like to travel through the country collecting bills for the merchants? That would improve your health."

"No, I would prefer to be doing something else."

"How then would going as a companion to Europe, to entertain some young gentleman with your conversation,—how would that suit you?"

"Not at all. It does not strike me that there is anything definite about that. I like to be stationary. But I am not particular."

"Stationary you shall be then," I cried, now losing all patience, and for the 210 first time in all my exasperating connection with him fairly flying into a passion. "If you do not go away from these premises before night, I shall feel bound—indeed I am bound—to—to—to quit the premises myself!" I rather absurdly concluded, knowing not with what possible threat to try to frighten his immobility into compliance. Despairing of all further efforts, I was precipitately leaving him, when a final thought occurred to me—one which had not been wholly unindulged before.

“Bartleby,” said I, in the kindest tone I could assume under such exciting circumstances, “will you go home with me now—not to my office, but my dwelling—and remain there till we can conclude upon some convenient arrangement for you at our leisure? Come, let us start now, right away.”

“No: at present I would prefer not to make any change at all.”

I answered nothing; but effectually dodging everyone by the suddenness and rapidity of my flight, rushed from the building, ran up Wall Street toward Broadway, and jumping into the first omnibus was soon removed from pursuit. As soon as tranquillity returned I distinctly perceived that I had now done all that I possibly could, both in respect to the demands of the landlord and his tenants, and with regard to my own desire and sense of duty, to benefit Bartleby, and shield him from rude persecution. I now strove to be entirely carefree and quiescent; and my conscience justified me in the attempt; though indeed it was not so successful as I could have wished. So fearful was I of being again hunted out by the incensed landlord and his exasperated tenants, that, surrendering my business to Nippers, for a few days I drove about the upper part of the town and through the suburbs, in my rockaway;⁶ crossed over to Jersey City and Hoboken, and paid fugitive visits to Manhattanville and Astoria. In fact I almost lived in my rockaway for the time.

When again I entered my office, lo, a note from the landlord lay upon the desk. I opened it with trembling hands. It informed me that the writer had sent to the police, and had Bartleby removed to the Tombs as a vagrant. Moreover, since I knew more about him than anyone else, he wished me to appear at that place, and make a suitable statement of the facts. These tidings had a conflicting effect upon me. At first I was indignant; but at last almost approved. The landlord's energetic, summary disposition had led him to adopt a procedure which I do not think I would have decided upon myself; and yet as a last resort, under such peculiar circumstances, it seemed the only plan.

215 As I afterwards learned, the poor scrivener, when told that he must be conducted to the Tombs, offered not the slightest obstacle, but in his pale unmoving way, silently acquiesced.

Some of the compassionate and curious bystanders joined the party; and headed by one of the constables arm in arm with Bartleby, the silent procession filed its way through all the noise, and heat, and joy of the roaring thoroughfares at noon.

The same day I received the note I went to the Tombs, or to speak more properly, the Halls of Justice. Seeking the right officer, I stated the purpose of my call, and was informed that the individual I described was indeed within. I then assured the functionary that Bartleby was a perfectly honest man, and greatly to be compassionated, however unaccountably eccentric. I narrated all I knew, and closed by suggesting the idea of letting him remain in as indulgent confinement as possible till something less harsh might be done—though indeed I hardly knew what. At all events, if nothing else could be decided upon, the alms-house must receive him. I then begged to have an interview.

Being under no disgraceful charge, and quite serene and harmless in all his ways, they had permitted him freely to wander about the prison, and especially in the inclosed grass-platted yards thereof. And so I found him there, standing all alone in the quietest of the yards, his face towards a high wall, while all around, from the narrow slits of the jail windows, I thought I saw peering out upon him the eyes of murderers and thieves.

"Bartleby!"

"I know you," he said, without looking round,—“and I want nothing to say to 220 you.”

"It was not I that brought you here, Bartleby," said I, keenly pained at his implied suspicion. "And to you, this should not be so vile a place. Nothing reproachful attaches to you by being here. And see, it is not so sad a place as one might think. Look, there is the sky, and here is the grass."

"I know where I am," he replied, but would say nothing more, and so I left him.

As I entered the corridor again, a broad meat-like man, in an apron, accosted me, and jerking his thumb over his shoulder said—"Is that your friend?"

"Yes."

"Does he want to starve? If he does, let him live on the prison fare, that's all." 225

"Who are you?" asked I, not knowing what to make of such an unofficially-speaking person in such a place.

"I am the grub-man. Such gentlemen as have friends here, hire me to provide them with something good to eat."

"Is this so?" said I, turning to the turnkey.

He said it was.

"Well then," said I, slipping some silver into the grub-man's hands (for so 230 they called him). "I want you to give particular attention to my friend there; let him have the best dinner you can get. And you must be as polite to him as possible."

"Introduce me, will you?" said the grub-man, looking at me with an expression which seemed to say he was all impatience for an opportunity to give a specimen of his breeding.

Thinking it would prove of benefit to the scrivener, I acquiesced; and asking the grub-man his name, went up with him to Bartleby.

"Bartleby, this is Mr. Cutlets; you will find him very useful to you."

"Your sarvant, sir, your sarvant," said the grub-man, making a low salutation behind his apron. "Hope you find it pleasant here, sir;—spacious grounds—cool apartments, sir—hope you'll stay with us some time—try to make it agreeable. May Mrs. Cutlets and I have the pleasure of your company to dinner, sir, in Mrs. Cutlets' private room?"

"I prefer not to dine today," said Bartleby, turning away. "It would disagree 235 with me; I am unused to dinners." So saying he slowly moved to the other side of the inclosure, and took up a position fronting the dead-wall.

"How's this?" said the grub-man, addressing me with a stare of astonishment. "He's odd, ain't he?"

"I think he is a little deranged," said I, sadly.

“Deranged? deranged is it? Well now, upon my word, I thought that friend of yours was a gentleman forger; they are always pale and genteel-like, them forgers. I can’t help pity ’em—can’t help it, sir. Did you know Monroe Edwards?”⁷ he added touchingly, and paused. Then laying his hand pityingly on my shoulder, sighed, “he died of consumption at Sing Sing. So you weren’t acquainted with Monroe?”

“No, I was never socially acquainted with any forgers. But I cannot stop longer. Look to my friend yonder. You will not lose by it. I will see you again.”

240 Some few days after this, I again obtained admission to the Tombs, and went through the corridors in quest of Bartleby; but without finding him.

“I saw him coming from his cell not long ago,” said a turnkey, “may be he’s gone to loiter in the yards.”

So I went in that direction.

“Are you looking for the silent man?” said another turnkey passing me. “Yonder he lies—sleeping in the yard there. ’Tis not twenty minutes since I saw him lie down.”

The yard was entirely quiet. It was not accessible to the common prisoners. The surrounding walls, of amazing thickness, kept off all sounds behind them. The Egyptian character of the masonry weighed upon me with its gloom. But a soft imprisoned turf grew under foot. The heart of the eternal pyramids, it seemed, wherein, by some strange magic, through the clefts, grass seed, dropped by birds, had sprung.

245 Strangely huddled at the base of the wall, his knees drawn up, and lying on his side, his head touching the cold stones, I saw the wasted Bartleby. But nothing stirred. I paused; then went close up to him; stooped over, and saw that his dim eyes were open; otherwise he seemed profoundly sleeping. Something prompted me to touch him. I felt his hand, when a tingling shiver ran up my arm and down my spine to my feet.

The round face of the grub-man peered upon me now. “His dinner is ready. Won’t he dine today, either? Or does he live without dining?”

“Lives without dining,” said I, and closed the eyes.

“Eh!—He’s asleep, ain’t he?”

“With kings and counsellors,”⁸ murmured I.

250 There would seem little need for proceeding further in this history. Imagination will readily supply the meager recital of poor Bartleby’s interment. But ere parting with the reader, let me say, that if this little narrative has sufficiently interested him, to awaken curiosity as to who Bartleby was, and what manner of life he led prior to the present narrator’s making his acquaintance, I can only reply, that in such curiosity I fully share, but am wholly unable to gratify it. Yet here I hardly know whether I should divulge one little item of rumor, which came to my ear a few months after the scrivener’s decease. Upon what basis it rested, I could never ascertain; and hence, how true it is I cannot now tell. But inasmuch as this vague report has not been without a certain strange suggestive interest to me, however sad, it may prove the same with some others; and so I will briefly mention it. The report was this: that Bartleby had been a subordinate clerk in the Dead Letter Office at Washington, from which he had been suddenly removed by a change in the administration. When I think over this rumor, I cannot adequately express the emotions which seize me. Dead letters! does it not sound like dead men? Conceive a man by nature and misfortune prone to a pallid hopelessness, can any business seem more fitted to heighten it than that of continually handling these dead letters, and assorting them for the flames? For by the cartload they are annually burned. Sometimes from out the folded paper the pale clerk takes a ring;—the finger it was meant for, perhaps, molders in the grave; a banknote sent in swiftest charity;—he whom it would relieve, nor eats nor hungers any more; pardon for those who died despairing; hope for those who died unhoping; good tidings for those who died stifled by unrelieved calamities. On errands of life, these letters speed to death.

8. That is, dead. See Job 3.13–14: “[T]hen had I been at rest, With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves.”

Ah Bartleby! Ah humanity!

EUDORA WELTY

(1909–2001)

Why I Live at the P.O.

Known as the “First Lady of Southern Literature,” Eudora Welty grew up in Jackson, Mississippi, attended Mississippi State College for Women, and earned a BA from the University of Wisconsin. Among the countless awards she received were two Guggenheim Fellowships, six O. Henry Awards, a Pulitzer Prize, the French Legion of Honor, the National Medal for Literature, and the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Although she wrote five novels, including The Robber Bridegroom (1942), Ponder Heart (1954), and The Optimist’s Daughter (1972), Welty is best known for her short stories, many of which appear in The Collected Stories of Eudora Welty (1980). Among her nonfiction works are One Writer’s Beginnings (1984), A Writer’s Eye: Collected Book Reviews (1994), and five collections of her photographs, including One Place, One Time (1978) and Photographs (1989). In 1998 the Library of America published a two-volume edition of her selected works, making her the first living author to appear in the series.

I was getting along fine with Mama, Papa-Daddy, and Uncle Rondo until my sister Stella-Rondo just separated from her husband and came back home again. Mr. Whitaker! Of course I went with Mr. Whitaker first, when he first appeared here in China Grove, taking “Pose Yourself” photos, and Stella-Rondo broke us up. Told him I was one-sided. Bigger on one side than the other, which is a deliberate, calculated falsehood: I’m the same. Stella-Rondo is exactly twelve months to the day younger than I am and for that reason she’s spoiled.

She's always had anything in the world she wanted and then she'd throw it away. Papa-Daddy give her this gorgeous Add-a-Pearl necklace when she was eight years old and she threw it away playing baseball when she was nine, with only two pearls.

So as soon as she got married and moved away from home the first thing she did was separate! From Mr. Whitaker! This photographer with the popeyes she said she trusted. Came home from one of those towns up in Illinois and to our complete surprise brought this child of two.

Mama said she like to make her drop dead for a second. "Here you had this marvelous blonde child and never so much as wrote your mother a word about it," says Mama. "I'm thoroughly ashamed of you." But of course she wasn't.

5 Stella-Rondo just calmly takes off this hat, I wish you could see it. She says, "Why, Mama, Shirley-T.'s adopted, I can prove it."

"How?" says Mama, but all I says was, "H'm!" There I was over the hot stove, trying to stretch two chickens over five people and a completely unexpected child into the bargain without one moment's notice.

"What do you mean—'H'm'?" says Stella-Rondo, and Mama says, "I heard that, Sister."

I said that oh, I didn't mean a thing, only that whoever Shirley-T. was, she was the spit-image of Papa-Daddy if he'd cut off his beard, which of course he'd never do in the world. Papa-Daddy's Mama's papa and sulks.

Stella-Rondo got furious! She said, "Sister, I don't need to tell you you got a lot of nerve and always did have and I'll thank you to make no future reference to my adopted child whatsoever."

10 "Very well," I said. "Very well, very well. Of course I noticed at once she looks like Mr. Whitaker's side too. That frown. She looks like a cross between Mr. Whitaker and Papa-Daddy."

"Well, all I can say is she isn't."

"She looks exactly like Shirley Temple to me," says Mama, but Shirley-T. just ran away from her.

So the first thing Stella-Rondo did at the table was turn Papa-Daddy against me.

"Papa-Daddy," she says. He was trying to cut up his meat. "Papa-Daddy!" I was taken completely by surprise. Papa-Daddy is about a million years old and's got this long-long beard. "Papa-Daddy, Sister says she fails to understand why you don't cut off your beard."

15 So Papa-Daddy l-a-y-s down his knife and fork! He's real rich. Mama says he is, he says he isn't. So he says, "Have I heard correctly? You don't understand why I don't cut off my beard?"

"Why," I says, "Papa-Daddy, of course I understand, I did not say any such a thing, the idea!"

He says, "Hussy!"

I says, "Papa-Daddy, you know I wouldn't any more want you to cut off your beard than the man in the moon. It was the farthest thing from my mind! Stella-Rondo sat there and made that up while she was eating breast of chicken."

But he says, "So the postmistress fails to understand why I don't cut off my beard. Which job I got you through my influence with the government. 'Bird's nest'—is that what you call it?"

Not that it isn't the next to smallest P.O. in the entire state of Mississippi. 20

I says, "Oh, Papa-Daddy," I says, "I didn't say any such a thing, I never dreamed it was a bird's nest, I have always been grateful though this is the next to smallest P.O. in the state of Mississippi, and I do not enjoy being referred to as a hussy by my own grandfather."

But Stella-Rondo says, "Yes, you did say it too. Anybody in the world could of heard you, that had ears."

"Stop right there," says Mama, looking at me.

So I pulled my napkin straight back through the napkin ring and left the table.

As soon as I was out of the room Mama says, "Call her back, or she'll starve 25 to death," but Papa-Daddy says, "This is the beard I started growing on the Coast when I was fifteen years old." He would of gone on till nightfall if Shirley-T. hadn't lost the Milky Way she ate in Cairo.

So Papa-Daddy says, "I am going out and lie in the hammock, and you can all sit here and remember my words: I'll never cut off my beard as long as I live, even one inch, and I don't appreciate it in you at all." Passed right by me in the hall and went straight out and got in the hammock.

It would be a holiday. It wasn't five minutes before Uncle Rondo suddenly appeared in the hall in one of Stella-Rondo's flesh-colored kimonos, all cut on the bias, like something Mr. Whitaker probably thought was gorgeous.

"Uncle Rondo!" I says. "I didn't know who that was! Where are you going?"

"Sister," he says, "get out of my way, I'm poisoned."

"If you're poisoned stay away from Papa-Daddy," I says. "Keep out of the 30 hammock. Papa-Daddy will certainly beat you on the head if you come within forty miles of him. He thinks I deliberately said he ought to cut off his beard after he got me the P.O., and I've told him and told him and told him, and he acts like he just don't hear me. Papa-Daddy must of gone stone deaf."

"He picked a fine day to do it then," says Uncle Rondo, and before you could say "Jack Robinson" flew out in the yard.

What he'd really done, he'd drunk another bottle of that prescription. He does it every single Fourth of July as sure as shooting, and it's horribly expensive. Then he falls over in the hammock and snores. So he insisted on zigzagging right on out to the hammock, looking like a half-wit.

Papa-Daddy woke with this horrible yell and right there without moving an inch he tried to turn Uncle Rondo against me. I heard every word he said. Oh, he told Uncle Rondo I didn't learn to read till I was eight years old and he didn't see how in the world I ever got the mail put up at the P.O., much less read it all, and he said if Uncle Rondo could only fathom the lengths he had gone to get me that job! And he said on the other hand he thought Stella-Rondo had a brilliant mind and deserved credit for getting out of town. All the time he was just lying there swinging as pretty as you please and looping out his beard, and poor Uncle Rondo was pleading with him to slow down the hammock, it was making him as dizzy as a witch to watch it. But that's what Papa-Daddy likes about a hammock. So Uncle Rondo was too dizzy to get turned against me for the time being. He's Mama's only brother and is a good case of a one-track mind. Ask anybody. A certified pharmacist.

Just then I heard Stella-Rondo raising the upstairs window. While she was married she got this peculiar idea that it's cooler with the windows shut and locked. So she has to raise the window before she can make a soul hear her outdoors.

35 So she raises the window and says, "Oh!" You would have thought she was mortally wounded.

Uncle Rondo and Papa-Daddy didn't even look up, but kept right on with what they were doing. I had to laugh.

I flew up the stairs and threw the door open! I says, "What in the wide world's the matter, Stella-Rondo? You mortally wounded?"

"No," she says, "I am not mortally wounded but I wish you would do me the favor of looking out that window there and telling me what you see."

So I shade my eyes and look out the window.

40 "I see the front yard," I says.

"Don't you see any human beings?"

"I see Uncle Rondo trying to run Papa-Daddy out of the hammock," I says. "Nothing more. Naturally, it's so suffocating-hot in the house, with all the windows shut and locked, everybody who cares to stay in their right mind will have to go out and get in the hammock before the Fourth of July is over."

"Don't you notice anything different about Uncle Rondo?" asks Stella-Rondo.

"Why, no, except he's got on some terrible-looking flesh-colored contraption I wouldn't be found dead in, is all I can see," I says.

45 "Never mind, you won't be found dead in it, because it happens to be part of my trousseau, and Mr. Whitaker took several dozen photographs of me in it," says Stella-Rondo. "What on earth could Uncle Rondo mean by wearing part of my trousseau out in the broad open daylight without saying so much as 'Kiss my foot,' knowing I only got home this morning after my separation and hung my negligee up on the bathroom door, just as nervous as I could be?"

"I'm sure I don't know, and what do you expect me to do about it?" I says. "Jump out the window?"

"No, I expect nothing of the kind. I simply declare that Uncle Rondo looks like a fool in it, that's all," she says. "It makes me sick to my stomach."

"Well, he looks as good as he can," I says. "As good as anybody in reason could." I stood up for Uncle Rondo, please remember. And I said to Stella-Rondo, "I think I would do well not to criticize so freely if I were you and came home with a two-year-old child I had never said a word about, and no explanation whatever about my separation."

"I asked you the instant I entered this house not to refer one more time to my adopted child, and you gave me your word of honor you would not," was all Stella-Rondo would say, and started pulling out every one of her eyebrows with some cheap Kress tweezers.

50 So I merely slammed the door behind me and went down and made some green-tomato pickle. Somebody had to do it. Of course Mama had turned both the Negroes loose; she always said no earthly power could hold one anyway on the Fourth of July, so she wouldn't even try. It turned out that Jaypan fell in the lake and came within a very narrow limit of drowning.

So Mama trots in. Lifts up the lid and says, "H'm! Not very good for your Uncle Rondo in his precarious condition, I must say. Or poor little adopted Shirley-T. Shame on you!"

That made me tired. I says, "Well, Stella-Rondo had better thank her lucky stars it was her instead of me came trotting in with that very peculiar-looking child. Now if it had been me that trotted in from Illinois and brought a peculiar-looking child of two, I shudder to think of the reception I'd of got, much less controlled the diet of an entire family."

"But you must remember, Sister, that you were never married to Mr. Whitaker in the first place and didn't go up to Illinois to live," says Mama, shaking a spoon in my face. "If you had I would of been just as overjoyed to see you and your little adopted girl as I was to see Stella-Rondo, when you wound up with your separation and came on back home."

"You would not," I says.

"Don't contradict me, I would," says Mama.

55

But I said she couldn't convince me though she talked till she was blue in the face. Then I said, "Besides, you know as well as I do that that child is not adopted."

"She most certainly is adopted," says Mama, stiff as a poker.

I says, "Why, Mama, Stella-Rondo had her just as sure as anything in this world, and just too stuck up to admit it."

"Why, Sister," said Mama. "Here I thought we were going to have a pleasant Fourth of July, and you start right out not believing a word your own baby sister tells you!"

"Just like Cousin Annie Flo. Went to her grave denying the facts of life," I 60 reminded Mama.

"I told you if you ever mentioned Annie Flo's name I'd slap your face," says Mama, and slaps my face.

"All right, you wait and see," I says.

"I," says Mama, "I prefer to take my children's word for anything when it's humanly possible." You ought to see Mama, she weighs two hundred pounds and has real tiny feet.

Just then something perfectly horrible occurred to me.

"Mama," I says, "can that child talk?" I simply had to whisper! "Mama, I won- 65 der if that child can be—you know—in any way? Do you realize?" I says, "that she hasn't spoke one single, solitary word to a human being up to this minute? This is the way she looks," I says, and I looked like this.

Well, Mama and I just stood there and stared at each other. It was horrible!

"I remember well that Joe Whitaker frequently drank like a fish," says Mama. "I believed to my soul he drank chemicals." And without another word she marches to the foot of the stairs and calls Stella-Rondo.

"Stella-Rondo? O-o-o-o-o! Stella-Rondo!"

"What?" says Stella-Rondo from upstairs. Not even the grace to get up off the bed.

"Can that child of yours talk?" asks Mama.

70

Stella-Rondo says, "Can she what?"

"Talk! Talk!" says Mama. "Burdyburdyburdyburdy!"

So Stella-Rondo yells back, "Who says she can't talk?"

"Sister says so," says Mama.

"You didn't have to tell me, I know whose word of honor don't mean a thing 75 in this house," says Stella-Rondo.

And in a minute the loudest Yankee voice I ever heard in my life yells out, "OE'm Pop-OE the Sailor-r-r-r Ma-a-an!" and then somebody jumps up and down in the upstairs hall. In another second the house would of fallen down.

"Not only talks, she can tap-dance!" calls Stella-Rondo. "Which is more than some people I won't name can do."

"Why, the little precious darling thing!" Mama says, so surprised. "Just as smart as she can be!" Starts talking baby talk right there. Then she turns on me. "Sister, you ought to be thoroughly ashamed! Run upstairs this instant and apologize to Stella-Rondo and Shirley-T."

"Apologize for what?" I says. "I merely wondered if the child was normal, that's all. Now that she's proved she is, why, I have nothing further to say."

80 But Mama just turned on her heel and flew out, furious. She ran right upstairs and hugged the baby. She believed it was adopted. Stella-Rondo hadn't done a thing but turn her against me from upstairs while I stood there helpless over the hot stove. So that made Mama, Papa-Daddy, and the baby all on Stella-Rondo's side.

Next, Uncle Rondo.

I must say that Uncle Rondo has been marvelous to me at various times in the past and I was completely unprepared to be made to jump out of my skin, the way it turned out. Once Stella-Rondo did something perfectly horrible to him—broke a chain letter from Flanders Field—and he took the radio back he had given her and gave it to me. Stella-Rondo was furious! For six months we all had to call her Stella instead of Stella-Rondo, or she wouldn't answer. I always thought Uncle Rondo had all the brains of the entire family. Another time he sent me to Mammoth Cave with all expenses paid.

But this would be the day he was drinking that prescription, the Fourth of July.

So at supper Stella-Rondo speaks up and says she thinks Uncle Rondo ought to try to eat a little something. So finally Uncle Rondo said he would try a little cold biscuits and ketchup, but that was all. So she brought it to him.

85 "Do you think it wise to disport with ketchup in Stella-Rondo's flesh-colored kimono?" I says. Trying to be considerate! If Stella-Rondo couldn't watch out for her trousseau, somebody had to.

"Any objections?" asks Uncle Rondo, just about to pour out all of the ketchup.

"Don't mind what she says, Uncle Rondo," says Stella-Rondo. "Sister has been devoting this solid afternoon to sneering out my bedroom window at the way you look."

"What's that?" says Uncle Rondo. Uncle Rondo has got the most terrible temper in the world. Anything is liable to make him tear the house down if it comes at the wrong time.

So Stella-Rondo says, "Sister says, 'Uncle Rondo certainly does look like a fool in that pink kimono!'"

90 Do you remember who it was really said that?

Uncle Rondo spills out all the ketchup and jumps out of his chair and tears off the kimono and throws it down on the dirty floor and puts his foot on it. It had to be sent all the way to Jackson to the cleaners and re-pleated.

"So that's your opinion of your Uncle Rondo, is it?" he says. "I look like a fool, do I? Well, that's the last straw. A whole day in this house with nothing to do, and then to hear you come out with a remark like that behind my back!"

"I didn't say any such of a thing, Uncle Rondo," I says, "and I'm not saying who did, either. Why, I think you look all right. Just try to take care of yourself and not talk and eat at the same time," I says. "I think you better go lie down."

"Lie down my foot," says Uncle Rondo. I ought to of known by that he was fixing to do something perfectly horrible.

So he didn't do anything that night in the precarious state he was in—just played Casino with Mama and Stella-Rondo and Shirley-T. and gave Shirley-T. a nickel with a head on both sides. It tickled her nearly to death, and she called him "Papa." But at 6:30 A.M. the next morning, he threw a whole five-cent package of some unsold one-inch firecrackers from the store as hard as he could into my bedroom and they every one went off. Not one bad one in the string. Anybody else, there'd be one that wouldn't go off.

Well, I'm just terribly susceptible to noise of any kind, the doctor has always told me I was the most sensitive person he had ever seen in his whole life, and I was simply prostrated. I couldn't eat! People tell me they heard it as far as the cemetery, and old Aunt Jep Patterson, that had been holding her own so good, thought it was Judgment Day and she was going to meet her whole family. It's usually so quiet here.

And I'll tell you it didn't take me any longer than a minute to make up my mind what to do. There I was with the whole entire house on Stella-Rondo's side and turned against me. If I have anything at all I have pride.

So I just decided I'd go straight down to the P.O. There's plenty of room there in the back, I says to myself.

Well! I made no bones about letting the family catch on to what I was up to. I didn't try to conceal it.

The first thing they knew, I marched in where they were all playing Old Maid and pulled the electric oscillating fan out by the plug, and everything got real hot. Next I snatched the pillow I'd done the needlepoint on right off the davenport from behind Papa-Daddy. He went "Ugh!" I beat Stella-Rondo up the stairs and finally found my charm bracelet in her bureau drawer under a picture of Nelson Eddy.¹

"So that's the way the land lies," says Uncle Rondo. There he was, piecing on the ham. "Well, Sister, I'll be glad to donate my army cot if you got any place to set it up, providing you'll leave right this minute and let me get some peace." Uncle Rondo was in France.

"Thank you kindly for the cot and 'peace' is hardly the word I would select if I had to resort to firecrackers at 6:30 A.M. in a young girl's bedroom," I says to him. "And as to where I intend to go, you seem to forget my position as postmistress of China Grove, Mississippi," I says. "I've always got the P.O."

Well, that made them all sit up and take notice.

I went out front and started digging up some four-o'clocks to plant around the P.O.

1. Opera singer (1901–67) who enjoyed phenomenal popularity in the 1930s and 1940s when he costarred in numerous film musicals with Jeanette MacDonald. The two were known as "America's Singing Sweethearts."

105 “Ah-ah-ah!” says Mama, raising the window. “Those happen to be my four-o’clocks. Everything planted in that star is mine. I’ve never known you to make anything grow in your life.”

“Very well,” I says. “But I take the fern. Even you, Mama, can’t stand there and deny that I’m the one watered that fern. And I happen to know where I can send in a box top and get a packet of one thousand mixed seeds, no two the same kind, free.”

“Oh, where?” Mama wants to know.

But I says, “Too late. You ’tend to your house, and I’ll ’tend to mine. You hear things like that all the time if you know how to listen to the radio. Perfectly marvelous offers. Get anything you want free.”

So I hope to tell you I marched in and got that radio, and they could of all bit a nail in two, especially Stella-Rondo, that it used to belong to, and she well knew she couldn’t get it back, I’d sue for it like a shot. And I very politely took the sewing-machine motor I helped pay the most on to give Mama for Christmas back in 1929, and a good big calendar, with the first-aid remedies on it. The thermometer and the Hawaiian ukulele certainly were rightfully mine, and I stood on the step-ladder and got all my watermelon-rind preserves and every fruit and vegetable I’d put up, every jar. Then I began to pull the tacks out of the bluebird wall vases on the archway to the dining room.

110 “Who told you you could have those, Miss Priss?” says Mama, fanning as hard as she could.

“I bought ’em and I’ll keep track of ’em,” I says. “I’ll tack ’em up one on each side of the post-office window, and you can see ’em when you come to ask me for your mail, if you’re so dead to see ’em.”

“Not I! I’ll never darken the door to that post office again if I live to be a hundred,” Mama says. “Ungrateful child! After all the money we spent on you at the Normal.”²

“Me either,” says Stella-Rondo. “You can just let my mail lie there and rot, for all I care. I’ll never come and relieve you of a single, solitary piece.”

“I should worry,” I says. “And who you think’s going to sit down and write you all those big fat letters and postcards, by the way? Mr. Whitaker? Just because he was the only man ever dropped down in China Grove and you got him—unfairly—is he going to sit down and write you a lengthy correspondence after you come home giving no rhyme nor reason whatsoever for your separation and no explanation for the presence of that child? I may not have your brilliant mind, but I fail to see it.”

115 So Mama says, “Sister, I’ve told you a thousand times that Stella-Rondo simply got homesick, and this child is far too big to be hers,” and she says, “Now, why don’t you just sit down and play Casino?”

Then Shirley-T. sticks out her tongue at me in this perfectly horrible way. She has no more manners than the man in the moon. I told her she was going to cross her eyes like that some day and they’d stick.

“It’s too late to stop me now,” I says. “You should have tried that yesterday. I’m going to the P.O. and the only way you can possibly see me is to visit me there.”

So Papa-Daddy says, “You’ll never catch me setting foot in that post office, even if I should take a notion into my head to write a letter some place.” He says, "I won't have you reachin' out of that little old window with a pair of shears and cuttin' off any beard of mine. I'm too smart for you!"

"We all are," says Stella-Rondo.

But I said, "If you're so smart, where's Mr. Whitaker?"

So then Uncle Rondo says, "I'll thank you from now on to stop reading all the orders I get on postcards and telling everybody in China Grove what you think is the matter with them," but I says, "I draw my own conclusions and will continue in the future to draw them." I says, "If people want to write their innermost secrets on penny postcards, there's nothing in the wide world you can do about it, Uncle Rondo."

"And if you think we'll ever write another postcard you're sadly mistaken," says Mama.

"Cutting off your nose to spite your face then," I says. "But if you're all determined to have no more to do with the U.S. mail, think of this: What will Stella-Rondo do now, if she wants to tell Mr. Whitaker to come after her?"

"Wah!" says Stella-Rondo. I knew she'd cry. She had a conniption fit right there in the kitchen.

"It will be interesting to see how long she holds out," I says. "And now—I am leaving." 125

"Good-bye," says Uncle Rondo.

"Oh, I declare," says Mama, "to think that a family of mine should quarrel on the Fourth of July, or the day after, over Stella-Rondo leaving old Mr. Whitaker and having the sweetest little adopted child! It looks like we'd all be glad!"

"Wah!" says Stella-Rondo, and has a fresh conniption fit.

"He left her—you mark my words," I says. "That's Mr. Whitaker. I know Mr. Whitaker. After all, I knew him first. I said from the beginning he'd up and leave her. I foretold every single thing that's happened."

"Where did he go?" asks Mama.

"Probably to the North Pole, if he knows what's good for him," I says.

But Stella-Rondo just bawled and wouldn't say another word. She flew to her room and slammed the door.

"Now look what you've gone and done, Sister," says Mama. "You go apologize."

"I haven't the time, I'm leaving," I says.

"Well, what are you waiting around for?" asks Uncle Rondo.

135

So I just picked up the kitchen clock and marched off, without saying, "Kiss my foot," or anything, and never did tell Stella-Rondo good-bye.

There was a girl going along on a little wagon right in front.

"Nigger girl," I says, "come help me haul these things down the hill, I'm going to live in the post office."

Took her nine trips in her express wagon. Uncle Rondo came out on the porch and threw her a nickel.

And that's the last I've laid eyes on any of my family or my family laid eyes on me for five solid days and nights. Stella-Rondo may be telling the most horrible tales in the world about Mr. Whitaker, but I haven't heard them. As I tell everybody, I draw my own conclusions. 140

But oh, I like it here. It's ideal, as I've been saying. You see, I've got everything cater-cornered, the way I like it. Hear the radio? All the war news. Radio, sewing machine, book ends, ironing board and that great big piano lamp—peace, that's what I like. Butter-bean vines planted all along the front where the strings are.

Of course, there's not much mail. My family are naturally the main people in China Grove, and if they prefer to vanish from the face of the earth, for all the mail they get or the mail they write, why, I'm not going to open my mouth. Some of the folks here in town are taking up for me and some turned against me. I know which is which. There are always people who will quit buying stamps just to get on the right side of Papa-Daddy.

But here I am, and here I'll stay. I want the world to know I'm happy.

And if Stella-Rondo should come to me this minute, on bended knees, and attempt to explain the incidents of her life with Mr. Whitaker, I'd simply put my fingers in both my ears and refuse to listen.

PART TWO Poetry

Edna St. Vincent Millay

11 | POETRY: READING, RESPONDING, WRITING

Ways of reading poetry and reasons for doing so differ almost as widely as poems themselves, and in ways we can perhaps best appreciate by considering poetry's functions in other times and places. Though you might be aware, for example, that medieval noblemen paid courtly "bards" to commemorate their achievements and thereby help them to maintain their prestige and power, you might be surprised to learn that since 2007 millions of people across the Middle East have tuned in to watch Prince of Poets, a reality show in which poets rather than pop singers compete for audience votes.

Such phenomena might come as a surprise to us simply because today, at least in the West, we don't tend to think of poetry as having great popular appeal or political potency. Millions of us may be moved by the way hip-hop artists use rhyme and rhythm to boast about, or "celebrate and sing," themselves; to show us the danger and excitement of life on the streets; or even to get out the vote. Yet "poetry" seems to many of us a thing apart, something to suffer, to cherish, or to be simply baffled and intimidated by because it seems so arcane, so different and difficult, so essentially irrelevant to the rest of our lives. Though one rarely hears anyone say of all fiction "I hate it" or "I love it" or "I just don't get it," if you're like most people, you've probably said, thought, or heard someone else say at least one of these things about poetry.

This chapter and the ones that follow welcome poetry lovers. But they neither require you to be one nor aim to convert you. They do, we hope, demonstrate a few key points:

- Poetry isn't all one thing: Poems differ as much as the people who write and read them, or as much as music or movies do. They can be by turns goofy, sad, or angry; they can tell a story, comment on current events, or simply describe the look of a certain time of day. Deciding that you "love," "hate," "get," or "don't get" all poetry based on your experience of one poem or of one kind of poetry is a little like either deciding you love all music because Mozart moves you or giving up on music entirely because Lady Gaga leaves you cold.
- A good poem is not a secret message one needs a special decoder ring or an advanced degree to decipher. Any thoughtful person who's willing to try can make sense of it, though some poems certainly do invite us to rethink our idea of what "making sense" might mean. Poetry has spoken to millions of ordinary people across the centuries and around the world, so at least some poems can speak to us, too, if we give both them and ourselves a chance. By the same token, even the most devoted, experienced poetry lovers among us can become better, more responsive, more thoughtful readers by reading more and different kinds of poetry and by exploring, as the following chapters do, the various elements and techniques with which poetry is made.

- People around the world have often turned to poetry to express their feelings and longings precisely because poetry is, in certain vital ways, distinct from other forms of writing. Each genre plays by its own rules and has its own history and traditions, so reading poetry effectively, like succeeding in a video game, does involve learning and playing by certain rules. Any one poem may open itself to multiple responses and interpretations, just as a game may allow you many ways of advancing to the next level. But in both cases there are limits. Neither is a free-for-all in which “anything goes.” (In both cases, too, some difficulty can be essential to the fun.) A poem wouldn't mean anything if it could mean everything.
- Yet the questions we ask of a poem and the techniques we use to understand it are simply variations of the same ones we use in reading fiction or drama. Indeed, some poems narrate action just as a short story does; others work much like scenes from plays.
- Finally, poems aren't nearly as fragile as we take them to be when we worry about “over-reading” or “analyzing them to death.” You can't kill a poem. But a poem does experience a sort of living death if it's not read, re-read, and pondered over. Poems need you. They can bear the weight of your careful attention, and they deserve it: The best of them are, after all, the result of someone else's. William Wordsworth may have done much to shape our contemporary ideas about poetry when he famously described it as “the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings,” but his own poems were, like most great poems, the result of weeks, even years, of writing and revision.

DEFINING POETRY

But what, after all, is poetry? Trying to define poetry is a bit like trying to catch a snowflake; you can do it, but at the very same moment, the snowflake begins to melt and disappear. With poems, as with fiction, one can always come up with particular examples that don't do what the definition insists they must, as well as numerous writers and readers who will disagree. Yet to claim that poetry eludes all definition is merely to reinforce the idea that it is simply too mysterious for ordinary mortals. Without being all-sufficient or entirely satisfying, a dictionary definition can at least give us a starting point. Here are two such definitions of poetry:

1. Writing that formulates a concentrated imaginative awareness of experience in language chosen and arranged to create a specific emotional response through meaning, sound, and rhythm. (Merriam-Webster)
2. Composition in verse or some comparable patterned arrangement of language in which the expression of feelings and ideas is given intensity by the use of distinctive style and rhythm[. . .]. Traditionally associated with explicit formal departure from the patterns of ordinary speech or prose, e.g., in the use of elevated diction, figurative language, and syntactical reordering. (The Oxford English Dictionary)

Different as they are, both of these definitions stress four elements: 1) the “patterned arrangement of language” to 2) generate “rhythm” and thereby both 3) express and evoke specific “emotion[s]” or “feelings” in 4) a “concentrated” way, or with “intensity.”

But what does all that really mean? To test drive this definition, let's look at an example. And let's pick a tough one: HEAD, HEART, taken from The Collected Stories of Lydia Davis, is usually classified as a work of fiction, and it certainly does have the elements of one, including characters and some action arranged into a plot related to us by a narrator. Yet one reviewer of Davis's Collected Stories tellingly describes this one as "a poem of a story." What specific features of the following story might make it work like a poem? Which, if any, of the features essential to poetry might it lack?

LYDIA DAVIS

Head, Heart

Heart weeps.

Head tries to help heart.

Head tells heart how it is, again:

You will lose the ones you love. They will all go. But even the earth will go, someday.

5 Heart feels better, then.

But the words of head do not remain long in the ears of heart.

Heart is so new to this.

I want them back, says heart.

Head is all heart has.

10 Help, head. Help heart.

If difficulty were essential to poetry, "Head, Heart" would not seem to qualify. It's hard to imagine less formal, even less elementary, diction or syntax. And the whole seems relatively easy to paraphrase (often a helpful thing to do when first encountering a poem): When we're sad about losing someone we love, we reason with ourselves that loss is inevitable because everything earthly, even the earth itself, can't last forever. Such rational explanations give us comfort, but that comfort is itself temporary; we still miss those we've lost and have to keep calling on our heads to help our hearts cope.

We do have emotion here, then, as well as a conflict between emotion and reason—and even when they lack plots, most poems do explore conflicts, just as stories and plays do. But do we have a poem? Does it matter that "Head, Heart" depends entirely on two figures of speech—metonymy, the use of the name of one thing for another closely associated thing (here, "head" for "reason," and "heart" for "emotion"), as well as personification, the representation of an object or an abstraction (here, "head" and "heart") as a person (capable of weeping and talking, for example)? Though fiction and drama both use figurative language, we often describe such language as "poetic," even when it occurs in a story or play, because poems do tend to depend much more on it (as we discuss further in ch. 16).

Does it matter that "Head, Heart" is short—just seventy-one words? Though poems come in every size, many poems are short or at least shorter than the typical work of fiction. Brevity is one way that some poems achieve the "concentration" and "intensity" the dictionaries take to be essential. Such concentration invites, even requires, ours. As poet Billy Collins puts it, "Poetry offers us the possibility of modulating our pace." The very brevity of a poem can teach us simply to slow down for a moment and pay attention—not only to the details within the poem, but also, through them, to whatever in the world or in ourselves the poem attends to. Sometimes that's all a poem does—simply invites us to pay attention to something we wouldn't notice otherwise.

Regardless of their overall length, moreover, almost all poems concentrate our attention and modulate our pace by doling out words a few at a time, arranging them not just into sentences (as in prose), but into discrete lines. One result is much more blank space and thus more silences and pauses than in prose. For this reason alone, “Head, Heart” looks and works somewhat like a poem. And the deliberateness with which it does so is signaled by the fact that one of its sentences is divided so as to span multiple lines. (Line 3 ends with a colon, not a period.) By arranging words into lines and, often, into stanzas, the poet, not a typesetter or printer, determines where words fall on the page. And that perhaps is the most important aspect of that arrangement of language that has differentiated poetry from prose since poetry became a written, as well as spoken, art (an issue discussed further in ch. 20). All printings of a poem, if accurate, reproduce exactly the same breaks and space the words precisely the same way on the page.

AUTHORS ON THEIR CRAFT

BILLY COLLINS ON THE POET AS “LINE-MAKER”

From “A Brisk Walk: An Interview with Billy Collins” (2006)*

I'm a line-maker. I think that's what makes poets different from prose-writers. [. . .] We think not just in sentences the way prose writers do but also in lines. [. . .] When I'm constructing a poem, I'm trying to write one good line after another. [. . .] I'm not thinking of just writing a paragraph and then chopping it up. I'm very conscious of the fact that every line should have a cadence to it. It should contribute to the progress of the poem. And that the ending of the line is a way of turning the reader's attention back into the interior of the poem.

*“A Brisk Walk: An Interview with Billy Collins.” Interview by Joel Whitney. Guernica, 14 June 2006, www.guernicamag.com/interviews/a_brisk_walk/.

One result is that line endings and beginnings inevitably get more of our attention, bear more oomph and meaning. Notice how many of the lines of “Head, Heart” begin with head and heart and how these words repeat in a pattern (Heart, Head, Head, Heart, Heart, Head—and then Help), as if the line beginnings themselves enact the same interplay between “head” and “heart” that the sentences describe. Conversely, certain end words reverberate: Again, for example, suggests the repetitive familiarity of this conflict, one that paradoxically seems all the more difficult or poignant because it's both repetitive (each person goes through this again and again) and familiar (all of us go through this); then alerts us to the temporariness of the comfort head offers heart, preparing us for the But in the next line.

Again and then also reverberate in us and with each other because they rhyme, just as head, heart, and help alliterate. These words share a special aural, as well as spatial and visual, relationship to each other. Though prose writers certainly make their appeal to us in part through sound, poetry remains, as it has been for thousands of years, a more insistently aural form—one that appeals through aural patterning to what Davis here humorously, but not wrongly, calls “the ears of heart” (line 6). As poet Mary Oliver puts it, “To make a poem, we must make sounds. Not random sounds, but chosen sounds.”

But are there qualities essential to poetry that “Head, Heart” lacks? Is it, for example, sufficiently aural in its appeal? Does it have genuine rhythm? Perhaps so, perhaps not. As you work your way through the rest of the chapters in this section and read more poems, we encourage you to keep thinking critically about our definitions in order to hone your own sense of just what poetry is, how it works, and what it does.

POETIC SUBGENRES AND KINDS

All poems share some common elements, use some of the same techniques, and thus require us to ask some of the same questions. Later in this chapter, we’ll outline some of the steps you can follow and some of the questions you can pose as you read, respond to, and write about any poem. But different sorts of poems also work by slightly different rules and thus invite somewhat different responses and questions.

Poems may be classified into subgenres based on various characteristics, including their length, appearance, and formal features (patterns of rhyme and rhythm, for example); their subject; or even the type of situation and setting (time and place) they depict. (A sonnet, for example, traditionally has fourteen lines. Defined broadly, an elegy is a poem about death.) A single poem might well represent multiple subgenres or at least might contain elements of more than one. (One could write an elegy that is also a sonnet, for instance.)

Since Aristotle’s time, however, readers and writers have also often divided poems into three broad categories or subgenres—narrative, dramatic, or lyric—based upon their mode of presentation. Put simply, poems that have a plot are either narrative poems (if they feature a narrator) or dramatic poems (if they don’t), and many poems that lack a plot are lyrics. The rest of this section describes each of these subgenres in more detail, starting with the one that most resembles fiction and ending with the dramatic monologue, a sort of hybrid that combines features of both dramatic and lyric poetry.

As the dramatic monologue demonstrates, the borders between narrative, dramatic, and lyric poetry are fuzzy, contestable, and shifting. Some poems will cross those borders; others will resist these categories altogether. And the very definition of lyric poetry has not only changed over time, but also remains contested today. The ultimate goal isn’t to definitively pigeonhole every poem but rather to develop a language through which to recognize, describe, and explore different poetic modes. Knowing which mode dominates in a particular poem can help ensure that we privilege the right questions as we read and write about it. Learning the conventions of particular subgenres and kinds allows us to better adjust to individual poems, to compare them to each other, and to appreciate how each creatively uses, reworks, or even defies or questions generic conventions.

Narrative Poetry

Like a work of prose fiction, a narrative poem tells a story; in other words, it has a plot related by a narrator, though its plot might be based on actual rather than made-up events. Comprising the same elements discussed in the Fiction section of this book, a narrative poem encourages us to ask the same questions—about character, plot, narration, and so on—that we do when reading a short story or novel. (See “Questions about the Elements of Fiction” in chapter 1.)

In centuries past, narrative poetry was a—even the—dominant subgenre of poetry. As a result, there are many different kinds of narrative poems, including book-length epics like Homer’s Iliad; chivalric romances like Thomas Malory’s Le Morte d’Arthur; grisly murder ballads, often rooted in actual events; and a range of harder-to-classify works of varying lengths such as the relatively short but quietly shocking examples below.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

Richard Cory

Whenever Richard Cory went down town,
We people on the pavement looked at him:
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

- 5 And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
“Good-morning,” and he glittered when he walked.

- And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
10 And admirably schooled in every grace:
In fine,¹ we thought that he was everything
To make us wish that we were in his place.

- So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
15 And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

1897

- How does the poem characterize Richard Cory? What is the effect of the first-personal plural narration?
- What details in the poem’s first three stanzas might make its final stanza simultaneously surprising, ironic, and predictable?

1. In conclusion, in sum.

ROBERT FROST

“Out, Out—”

- The buzz saw snarled and rattled in the yard
 And made dust and dropped stove-length sticks of wood,
 Sweet-scented stuff when the breeze drew across it.
 And from there those that lifted eyes could count
 5 Five mountain ranges one behind the other
 Under the sunset far into Vermont.
 And the saw snarled and rattled, snarled and rattled,
 As it ran light, or had to bear a load.
 And nothing happened: day was all but done.
 10 Call it a day, I wish they might have said
 To please the boy by giving him the half hour
 That a boy counts so much when saved from work.
 His sister stood beside them in her apron
 To tell them “Supper.” At the word, the saw,
 15 As if to prove saws knew what supper meant,
 Leaped out at the boy’s hand, or seemed to leap—
 He must have given the hand. However it was,
 Neither refused the meeting. But the hand!
 The boy’s first outcry was a rueful laugh,
 20 As he swung toward them holding up the hand Half in appeal, but half as if to keep
 The life from spilling. Then the boy saw all—
 Since he was old enough to know, big boy
 Doing a man’s work though a child at heart—
 25 He saw all spoiled. “Don’t let him cut my hand off—
 The doctor, when he comes. Don’t let him, sister!”
 So. But the hand was gone already.
 The doctor put him in the dark of ether.
 He lay and puffed his lips out with his breath.
 30 And then—the watcher at his pulse took fright.
 No one believed. They listened at his heart.
 Little—less—nothing!—and that ended it.
 No more to build on there. And they, since they Were not the one dead, turned to their affairs.

1916

- What is the effect of Frost’s use of a third-person speaker/narrator?
- How does he characterize the poem’s central event—the “meeting” between saw and hand (line 18)? What might the poem ask or show us through that event and the characters’ responses to it?

Dramatic Poetry

For centuries, plays were written in verse; as a result, drama itself was understood not as a genre in its own right (as we think of it today) but rather as a subgenre of poetry. Dramatic poetry thus meant and still can mean actual plays in verse (or verse drama). But any poem that consists wholly of dialogue among characters, unmediated by a narrator, counts as a dramatic poem. And we might even apply that label to poems like the following, in which narration is kept to the barest minimum. Indeed, this narrator's only words are "said she," and since every other word in the poem is spoken by one female character to another, the poem essentially reads like a scene from a play. Notice, though, that the poem also depends on techniques of formal organization and patterning unique to poetry: In each of the poem's six stanzas, for example, one woman speaks the first lines, while her companion gets the last line (or two).

THOMAS HARDY

The Ruined Maid

"O 'Melia,² my dear, this does everything crown!
Who could have supposed I should meet you in Town?
And whence such fair garments, such prosperi-ty?"—
"O didn't you know I'd been ruined?" said she.

5 —"You left us in tatters, without shoes or socks,
Tired of digging potatoes, and spudding up docks;³
And now you've gay bracelets and bright feathers three!"—
"Yes: that's how we dress when we're ruined," said she.

—"At home in the barton⁴ you said 'thee' and 'thou,'
10 And 'thik oon,' and 'theäs oon,' and 't'other'; but now
Your talking quite fits 'ee for high compa-ny!"—
"Some polish is gained with one's ruin," said she.

—"Your hands were like paws then, your face blue and bleak
But now I'm bewitched by your delicate cheek,
15 And your little gloves fit as on any la-dy!"—
"We never do work when we're ruined," said she.

—"You used to call home-life a hag-ridden dream,
And you'd sigh, and you'd sock;⁵ but at present you seem
To know not of megrims⁶ or melancho-ly!"— 20 "True. One's pretty lively when ruined," said she.

—"I wish I had feathers, a fine sweeping gown,
And a delicate face, and could strut about Town!"—

2. Short for Amelia. 3. Spading up weeds. 4. Farmyard. 5. Sigh (English dialect).
6. Migraine headaches.

“My dear—a raw country girl, such as you be,
Cannot quite expect that. You ain’t ruined,” said she.

1866

When we read and write about dramatic poems, we can usefully bring to bear the same questions we do in reading drama. (See “Questions to Ask When Reading a Play” in ch. 25.) But when it comes to short poems like THE RUINED MAID, questions about sets, staging, and even plot will usually be much less relevant than those related to character and conflict, as well as setting, tone, language, symbol, and theme. In Hardy’s poem, for example, how are each of the two speakers characterized by how they speak, as well as what they say? How is our view of them, and especially of ‘Melia, “the ruined maid,” affected by the formal pattern mentioned earlier, which ensures (among other things) that she gets the last line? How might this pattern, along with rhythm and rhyme, also add irony to the poem?

Lyric Poetry

For good historical reasons, lyric poems probably best fulfill your expectations of what poetry should be like. Yet lyric poetry has been and still is defined in myriad ways. The word lyric derives from the ancient Greeks, for whom it designated a short poem chanted or sung by a single singer to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument called a lyre (hence, the word lyric and the fact that we today also use the word lyrics to denote the words of any song). Scholars believe that the earliest “lyrics” in the Greek sense were likely associated with religious occasions and feelings, especially those related to celebration, praise, and mourning. Ever since, the lyric has been associated with brevity, musicality, a single speaker, and the expression of intense feeling. Not surprisingly, at least a few specific kinds of lyric, including the ode and the elegy, originated in the ancient world.

Over the centuries, the lyric’s boundaries have expanded and become fuzzier. Few lyrics are intended to be sung at all, much less to a lyre. But everyone agrees that relatively short poems that focus primarily on the feelings, impressions, and thoughts—that is, on the subjective, inward experience—of a single first-person speaker are lyrics.

Below are two examples very different from each other in subject matter and tone. Yet with these, as with all lyrics, our initial questions in both reading and writing will likely focus on each speaker’s situation and inward experience of it. What is each speaker experiencing, feeling, and thinking, and how exactly does the poem make that state of mood and mind at once vivid and relevant to us?

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

*I wandered lonely as a cloud*⁷

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o’er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,

7. When any poem lacks a title, it is conventional to substitute the poem’s first line, maintaining original capitalization (or lack thereof).

A host, of golden daffodils;
 5 Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
 Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

 Continuous as the stars that shine
 And twinkle on the milky way,
 They stretched in never-ending line
 10 Along the margin of a bay:
 Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
 Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

 The waves beside them danced; but they
 Out-did the sparkling waves in glee:
 15 A poet could not but be gay,
 In such a jocund company:
 I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
 What wealth the show to me had brought:

 For oft, when on my couch I lie
 20 In vacant or in pensive mood,
 They flash upon that inward eye
 Which is the bliss of solitude;
 And then my heart with pleasure fills,
 And dances with the daffodils.

- According to the speaker, what is “the bliss of solitude” (line 22)? Why and how does “solitude” become less “lonely” for him (1)?
- What about the relationship between human beings and nature might be implied by the speaker’s description of his particular experience?

FRANK O'HARA

Poem

Lana Turner⁸ has collapsed!
 I was trotting along and suddenly it started raining and snowing and you said it was hailing
 5 but hailing hits you on the head hard so it was really snowing and raining and I was in such a hurry to meet you but the traffic was acting exactly like the sky
 10 and suddenly I see a headline
 LANA TURNER HAS COLLAPSED!
 there is no snow in Hollywood
 there is no rain in California

8. American actress (1921–95); in 1958, Turner’s lover, John Stompanato, Jr., was stabbed to death by her daughter, who was determined to have acted in self-defense.

Lana Turner testifying at the John Stompanato inquest, April 1958

I have been to lots of parties 15 and acted perfectly disgraceful but I never actually collapsed
 oh Lana Turner we love you get up 1962

- What or whom exactly does this poem seem to make fun of? Does the poem also convey more serious sentiments?
- What current celebrity seems to you the best potential substitute for Lana Turner? What about both this celebrity's public persona and the poem itself make your choice seem especially appropriate?

What makes these lyrics different from narrative and dramatic poems? Though both include action (“wander[ing],” “trotting,” and so on), that action doesn’t quite add up to a plot; what we have might be better described as a situation, scene, or incident. Similarly, though the poems vividly describe external things, from “golden daffodils” to “traffic,” greater emphasis ultimately falls on how the “I” experiences and feels about them—the internal, subjective experience or state of mind and mood that those outward things inspire or reflect. Both poems thus encourage us to focus almost exclusively on the complex emotional experience and thoughts of a particular speaker in a specific situation, but ones that we can, if the poem is effective, ultimately understand as having a much wider, sometimes even universal, resonance and relevance.

Most lyrics require us to infer a general theme from a specific experience, but some offer more explicit reflection, commentary, even argument. As you read the following example, notice what happens in line 5 (exactly halfway through the poem), as the speaker turns from personal statements to more impersonal, argumentative ones. How does personal reflection relate to, even enable, argument here?

Frontispiece to Phillis Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, 1773

PHILLIS WHEATLEY On Being Brought from Africa to America

'Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land, Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Saviour too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.

- 5 Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
"Their colour is a diabolic die."
Remember, Christians, Negroes,
black as Cain,⁹
May be refin'd, and join th' angelic train.

- What do the poem's first four lines imply about how the speaker feels about "being brought from Africa to America" and about what motivates these feelings?
- What two "view[s]" of Africans are contrasted in the last four lines (line 5)? According to the entire poem, which is the right view, and why and how so?

Descriptive or Observational Lyrics

As Wheatley's poem demonstrates, lyrics come in many varieties. Quite a few are more exclusively descriptive or observational than the examples above, insofar as they describe something or someone to us without bringing much attention to the speaker's personal state of mind or feelings. As we've noted, after all, some poems simply give us the opportunity to look more closely and carefully at something in the world around us. Nineteenth-century poet Percy Bysshe Shelley suggested, in fact, that all poetry's major purpose is just that—helping us see in a new way. Poetry, he said, "strips the veil of familiarity from the world, and lays bare [its] naked and sleeping beauty" and "wonder." Over a century later, American poet James Dickey expressed a similar idea somewhat differently when he defined a poet as "someone who notices and is enormously taken by things that somebody else would walk by."

Obviously, any descriptive poem inevitably reflects its speaker's point of view. Yet lyrics of this type invite us to focus more on what they describe than on the subjective, internal experience or feelings of the speaker doing the describing. As a result, our focus in reading and writing will probably be how the poem characterizes, and encourages us to see, think, and feel about, whatever it describes—whether a moment, a person, an object, or a phenomenon. What is described in each of the poems that follow? What figures of speech are used, and with what implications and effects?

- This poem consists almost entirely of metaphor (implied comparison). What is compared to what here? How would you describe the poem’s tone? (Is it funny, sad, bitter, or some combination of these?) Why and how so?

The Dramatic Monologue

Finally, we come to the dramatic monologue, a subgenre of poem that—by residing somewhere in between lyric and dramatic poetry—can teach us more about both. Robert Browning, the nineteenth-century British poet often credited with inventing this kind of poem, tellingly labeled his own works “dramatic lyrics,” describing them as “dramatic in principle,” “lyric in expression.” On the one hand, the dramatic monologue is “lyric in expression” or like a lyric poem because it features a single speaker who speaks in the first person. On the other hand, it is “dramatic in principle” or resembles a scene from a play for at least two reasons. First, the poem’s primary focus is characterization, an obviously fictional or historical speaker’s often unintentional revelation of his or her personality, outlook, and values. Such poems tend to offer us a window into an entire, complex psychology and even life history rather than simply one experience or feeling of a speaker we otherwise discover little about (as in lyrics). Often, too, dramatic monologues invite us to see their speakers and situations somewhat differently than the speakers themselves do, much as does fiction narrated by unreliable narrators. Second, the speaker of a dramatic monologue conventionally addresses one or more silent auditors whose identity we can only infer from the speaker's words to them. Often, speaker and auditor are caught in a very specific and "dramatic" moment or situation, one which we also have to tease out from the clues the speaker gives us and which frequently involves some sort of persuasion on the speaker's part. The questions we pose in reading and writing about such poems thus often center on character and characterization and on the comparison of our perception of the speaker and his or her situation with the speaker's own self-representation.

This subgenre remains as popular with contemporary songwriters as with contemporary poets. Bruce Springsteen's albums Nebraska (1982) and The Rising (2002), for instance, consist mainly of dramatic monologues. Below, you will find the lyrics to one of these, followed by a poem that takes the form of an imaginary letter, thus putting an interesting twist on the conventions regarding "speakers" and "auditors."

BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN

Nebraska

I saw her standin' on her front lawn
 just twirlin' her baton
 Me and her went for a ride, sir, and ten innocent people died

- 5 From the town of Lincoln, Nebraska, with a sawed-off .410 on my lap
 Through the badlands of Wyoming I killed everything in my path

- I can't say that I'm sorry for the things
 10 that we done
 At least for a little while, sir, me and her we had us some fun

- The jury brought in a guilty verdict and the judge he sentenced me to death 15 Midnight in a prison storeroom with leather straps across my chest

- Sheriff, when the man pulls that switch, sir, and snaps my poor head back
 You make sure my pretty baby is sittin'
 20 right there on my lap

They declared me unfit to live, said into that great void my soul'd be hurled

They wanted to know why I did what I did
 Well, sir, I guess there's just a meanness in this world¹

- What different motives and explanations for the speaker's actions might NEBRASKA provide by means of what he says, how he speaks, and how his speech is rendered on the page? Might the song as a whole offer explanations that the speaker doesn't offer, at least consciously or directly?

ROBERT HAYDEN

A Letter from Phillis Wheatley

(London, 1773)

Dear Obour²

- Our crossing was without event. I could not help, at times, reflecting on that first—my Destined—
 5 voyage long ago (I yet have some remembrance of its Horrors)³ and marvelling at God's Ways.
 Last evening, her Ladyship⁴ presented me to her illustrious Friends.
 10 I scarce could tell them anything of Africa, though much of Boston and my hope of Heaven. I read my latest Elegies to them.
 "O Sable Muse!" the Countess cried,
 15 embracing me, when I had done.
 I held back tears, as is my wont,
 and there were tears in Dear
 Nathaniel's eyes.
 At supper—I dined apart
 20 like captive Royalty—the Countess and her Guests promised signatures affirming me
 True Poetess, albeit once a slave.⁵

1. Allusion to words spoken by a murderer in Flannery O'Connor's "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" (par. 134; p. 525).

2. Obour Tanner, a Rhode Island slave and Wheatley's intimate friend and frequent correspondent.

3. Born in Africa c. 1753–54, Wheatley was taken at around age eight on the slave ship Phillis to America, where she was purchased by Boston merchant John Wheatley. In 1773, he sent her to London with his son, Nathaniel, a visit partly motivated by concerns about her health.

4. Selina Hastings, Countess of Huntingdon (1707–91), helped arrange publication of Wheatley's first book of poems, which appeared in London just months after the poet's return to the United States.

5. Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773) was prefaced by a letter, signed by seventeen eminent Bostonians, attesting to the poems' authenticity, which had been questioned because of her race.

Indeed, they were most kind, and spoke,
 25 moreover, of presenting me at Court (I thought of Pocahontas)⁶—an Honor, to be sure, but one,
 I should, no doubt, as Patriot decline.
 My health is much improved;
 30 I feel I may, if God so Wills, entirely recover here.
 Idyllic England! Alas, there is no Eden without its Serpent. Beneath chiming Complaisance I hear him hiss;
 35 I see his flickering tongue when foppish would-be Wits murmur of the Yankee Pedlar and his Cannibal Mockingbird.
 Sister, forgive th'intrusion of 40 my Sombreness—Nocturnal Mood
 I would not share with any save your trusted Self. Let me disperse, in closing, such unseemly Gloom
 by mention of an Incident
 45 you may, as I, consider Droll:
 Today, a little Chimney Sweep,
 his face and hands with soot quite Black,
 staring hard at me, politely asked:
 “Does you, M'lady, sweep chimneys too?”
 50 I was amused, but Dear Nathaniel (ever Solicitous) was not.
 I pray the Blessings of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ will Abundantly be yours.

- What internal and external conflicts seem to be revealed here? What conflict does Wheatley herself seem aware of? Why might Hayden have chosen both this particular moment in Wheatley's life and this particular addressee (Obour Tanner)?
- How does Hayden's portrayal of both Wheatley's feelings and others' views of her compare to Wheatley's own characterization of these in ON BEING BROUGHT FROM AFRICA TO AMERICA?

RESPONDING TO POETRY

Not all poems are as readily accessible as those in this chapter, and even those that are take on additional meanings if we approach them systematically, bringing to bear specific reading habits and skills and some knowledge of poetic genres, conventions, and traditions. Experience will give you a sense of what to expect, but knowing what to expect isn't everything. As a reader of poetry, you should always be open—to new experiences, new feelings, new ideas, new forms of expression. Every poem is a potential new experience, and you will often discover something new with every re-reading.

Steps to Follow, Questions to Ask, and Sample Reading Notes

No one can give you a method that will offer you total experience of all poems. But because individual poems share characteristics with other poems, taking certain steps can prompt you both to ask the right questions and to devise compelling answers. If you are relatively new to poetry, encounter a poem that seems especially difficult, or plan to write about a poem, you may need to tackle the following steps one at a time, pausing to write even as you read and respond. With further experience, you will often find that you can skip some steps or run through them quickly and almost automatically, though your experience and understanding of any poem will be enriched if you slow down and take your time.

Try the first step on your own, then we will both detail and demonstrate the others.

1. Listen to a poem first. When you encounter a new poem, read through it once without thinking too much about what it means. Try to simply listen to the poem, even if you read silently, much as you might a song on the radio. Better yet, read it aloud. Doing so will help you hear the poem's sound qualities, get a clearer impression of its tone, and start making sense of its syntax, the way words combine into sentences.

APHRA BEHN

On Her Loving Two Equally

I

How strongly does my passion flow,
 Divided equally twixt⁷ two?
 Damon had ne'er subdued my heart
 Had not Alexis took his part;
 5 Nor could Alexis powerful prove,
 Without my Damon's aid, to gain my love.

II

When my Alexis present is,
 Then I for Damon sigh and mourn;

7. Between.

- But when Alexis I do miss,
 10 Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
 But if it chance they both are by,
 For both alike I languish, sigh, and die.

III

- Cure then, thou mighty wingèd god,⁸
 This restless fever in my blood:
 15 One golden-pointed dart take back:
 But which, O Cupid, wilt thou take?
 If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed;
 Or that of my Alexis, I am lost.

Now that you've read Behn's poem, read through the remaining steps and see how one reader used them as a guide for responding. Later, return to these steps as you read and respond to other poems.

2. Articulate your expectations, starting with the title. Poets often try to surprise readers, but you can appreciate such surprises only if you first define your expectations. As you read a poem, take note of what you expect and where, when, and how the poem does and doesn't fulfill your expectations.

The title of Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally" makes me think the poem will be about a woman. But can someone really "love two equally"? Maybe this is the question the poem will ask. If so, I expect its answer to be no, because I don't think this is possible. If so, maybe the title is a sort of pun—"On Her Loving Too Equally."

3. Read the syntax literally. What the sentences literally say is only a starting point, but it is vital. You cannot begin to explore what a poem means unless you first know what it says. Though poets arrange words into lines and stanzas, they usually write in complete sentences, just as writers in other genres do. At the same time and partly in order to create the sort of aural and visual patterns discussed earlier in this chapter, poets make much more frequent use of inversion (a change in normal word order or syntax). To ensure you don't misread, first "translate" the poem rather than fixing on certain words and free-associating or leaping to conclusions. To translate accurately, especially with poems written before the twentieth century, you may need to break this step down into the following smaller steps:

- a. Identify sentences. For now, ignore the line breaks and look for sentences or independent clauses (word groups that can function as complete sentences). These will typically be preceded and followed by a period (.), a semicolon (;), a colon (:), or a dash (—).

8. Cupid, who, according to myth, shot darts of lead and of gold at the hearts of lovers, corresponding to false love and true love, respectively.

The eighteen lines of Behn's poem can be broken down into nine sentences.

1. How strongly does my passion flow, Divided equally twixt two?
2. Damon had ne'er subdued my heart, Had not Alexis took his part;
3. Nor could Alexis powerful prove, Without my Damon's aid, to gain my love.
4. When my Alexis present is, Then I for Damon sigh and mourn;
5. But when Alexis I do miss, Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
6. But if it chance they both are by, For both alike I languish, sigh, and die.
7. Cure then, thou mighty wingèd god, This restless fever in my blood;
8. One golden-pointed dart take back: But which, O Cupid, wilt thou take?
9. If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed; Or that of my Alexis, I am lost.

b. Reorder sentences. Identify the main elements—subject(s), verb(s), object(s)—of each sentence or independent clause, and if necessary rearrange them in normative word order. (In English, this order tends to be subject-verb-object except in the case of a question; in either case, dependent clauses come at the beginning or end of the main clause and next to whatever element they modify.)

c. Replace each pronoun with the antecedent noun it replaces; if the antecedent is ambiguous, indicate all the possibilities.

In the following sentences, the reordered words appear in italics, nouns substituted for pronouns appear in parentheses:

1. How strongly does my passion flow, Divided equally twixt two?
2. Damon had ne'er subdued my heart, Had not Alexis took (Alexis's or Damon's) part;
3. Nor could Alexis prove powerful to gain my love Without my Damon's aid.
4. When my Alexis is present, Then I sigh and mourn for Damon;
5. But when I do miss Alexis, Damon gains nothing but my scorn.
6. But if it chance both (Damon and Alexis) are by, I languish, sigh, and die For both (Damon and Alexis) alike.
7. thou mighty wingèd god, Cure then This restless fever in my blood;
8. take back One golden-pointed dart: But which wilt thou take, O Cupid?
9. If Damon's, all my hopes are crossed; Or that (dart) of my Alexis, I am lost.

d. Translate sentences into modern prose. Use a dictionary to define unfamiliar or ambiguous words or words that seem to be used in an unfamiliar or unexpected way. Add any implied words necessary to link the parts of a sentence to each other and one sentence logically to the next. At this stage, don't move to outright paraphrase; instead, stick closely to the original.

Below, added words appear in brackets, substituted definitions in parentheses:

1. How strongly does my passion flow [when it is] divided equally between two [people]?
2. Damon would never have (conquered or tamed) my heart if Alexis had not taken (Damon or Alexis's) (portion) [of my heart].
3. Nor could Alexis [have] prove[n] powerful [enough] to gain my love without my Damon's aid.
4. When my Alexis is present, then I sigh and mourn for Damon;
5. But when I miss Alexis, Damon doesn't gain anything (except) my scorn.
6. But if it (so happens) that both (Damon and Alexis) are [near]by [me], I languish, sigh, and die for both (Damon and Alexis) alike.
7. [Cupid], (you) mighty god (with wings), cure then this restless fever in my blood;
8. Take back one [of your two] darts [with] pointed gold [tips]: But which [of these darts] will you take, O Cupid?
9. If [on the one hand, you take away] Damon's [dart], all my hopes are (opposed, invalidated, spoiled); Or [if, on the other hand, you take away] Alexis's [arrow], I am (desperate, ruined, destroyed; no longer claimed or possessed by anyone; helpless or unable to find my way).

- e. Note any ambiguities in the original language that you might have ignored in your translation. For example, look for modifiers that might modify more than one thing; verbs that might have multiple subjects or objects; words that have multiple relevant meanings.

In the second sentence, "his" could refer either to Damon or to Alexis since both names appear in the first part of this sentence; in other words, this could say either "Alexis took Damon's part" or "Alexis took his own part." But what about the word part? I translated this as portion, and I assumed it referred back to "heart," partly because the two words come at the ends of lines 3 ("heart") and 4 ("part") and also rhyme. But two other definitions of part might make sense here: "the role of a character in a play" or "one's . . . allotted task (as in an action)," and "one of the opposing sides in a conflict or dispute," which in this case could be the "conflict" over the speaker's love. On the one hand, then, I could translate this as "Alexis took his own portion of my heart"; "Alexis played his own role in my life or in this three-way courtship drama"; or "Alexis defended his own side in the battle for my love." On the other hand, I could translate it as "Alexis took Damon's part of my heart"; "Alexis played Damon's role"; or even "Alexis defended Damon's side in the battle for my love."

4. Consult reference works. In addition to using a dictionary to define unfamiliar or ambiguous words, look up anything else to which the poem refers that you either don't understand or that you suspect might be ambiguous: a place, a person, a myth, a quotation, an idea, etc.

According to Britannica.com, Cupid was the “ancient Roman god of love” and “often appeared as a winged infant carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows whose wounds inspired love or passion in his every victim.” It makes sense, then, that the speaker of this poem would think that she might stop loving one of these men if Cupid took back the arrow that made her love him. But the poem wasn’t written in ancient Rome (it’s dated 1684), so is the speaker just kidding or being deliberately “poetic” when she calls on Cupid? And what about the names “Damon” and “Alexis”? Were those common in the seventeenth century? Maybe so, if a poet could be named Aphra Behn.

5. Figure out who, where, when, and what happens. Once you have gotten a sense of the literal meaning of each sentence, ask the following very general factual questions about the whole poem. Remember that not all of the questions will suit every poem. (Which questions apply will depend in part on whether the poem is narrative, dramatic, or lyric.) At this point, stick to the facts. What do you know for sure?

Who?

- Who is, or who are, the poem’s speaker(s)?
- Who is, or who are, the auditor(s), if any?
- Who are the other characters, if any, that appear in the poem?

The title suggests that the speaker is a woman who loves two people. In the poem, she identifies these as two men—Damon and Alexis. The speaker doesn’t seem to address anyone in particular (certainly not the two men she talks about) except in the third stanza, when she addresses Cupid—first through the epithet “mighty wingèd god” (line 13) and then by name (16). (Because Cupid isn’t present, this is an apostrophe.)

Where? When?

- Where is the speaker?
- Where and when do any actions described in the poem take place? That is, what is the poem’s setting?

No place or time is specified in Behn’s poem. The poem is dated 1684, and the antiquated diction (“twixt,” line 2; “wilt,” 16) seems appropriate to that time. But nothing in the poem makes the situation or feelings it describes specific to a time or place. The speaker doesn’t say things like “Last Thursday, when Damon and I were hanging out in the garden . . .,” for example. She seems to describe situations that keep happening repeatedly rather than specific incidents.

What?

- What is the situation described in the poem?
- What, if anything, literally happens over the course of it, or what action, if any, does it describe?
- Or, if the poem doesn’t have a plot, then how would you describe its internal structure? Even when a poem seems less interested in telling a story than in simply capturing a feeling or describing something or someone, you can still usually read in it some kind of progression or development or even an argument. When and how does the subject matter or focus or address shift over the course of the poem?

The basic situation is that the speaker loves two men equally. In the second stanza she describes recurring situations—being with one of the men and not the other or being with both of them at once—and the feelings that result. Then, in the third stanza, she imagines what would happen if she stopped loving one of them. The topic or subject essentially remains the same throughout, but there are two subtle shifts. First is the shift from addressing anyone in stanzas one and two to addressing Cupid in stanza three. Second, there are shifts in verb tense and time: the first stanza floats among various tenses (“does,” line 1; “took,” 4), the second sticks to the present tense (“is,” “sigh,” “mourn,” etc.), and the third shifts to future (“wilt,” 16). As a result, I would say that the poem has two parts: in one, the speaker characterizes her situation in the present and recent past; in the other she explores a possible alternative future (that she ends up not liking any better).

6. Formulate tentative answers to the questions, Why does it matter? What does it all mean?

- Why should the poem matter to anyone other than the poet, or what might the poem show and say to readers?
- What problems, issues, questions, or conflicts does the poem explore that might be relevant to people other than the speaker(s) or the poet—to humanity in general, to the poet’s contemporaries, to people of a certain type or in a certain situation, and so forth?
- How is each problem or conflict developed and resolved over the course of the poem, or how is each question answered? What conclusions does the poem seem to reach about these, or what are its themes?

The title and first two lines pose a question: how strong is our love if we love two people instead of one? We tend to assume that anything that is “divided” is less strong than something unified. The use of the word flow in the first line reinforces that assumption because it implicitly compares love to something that flows: a river, for example, “flows,” and when a river divides into two streams, each stream is smaller and its flow less strong than the river’s. So the way the speaker articulates the question implies an answer: love, like a river, isn’t strong and sure when divided.

But the rest of the poem undermines that answer. In the first stanza, the speaker points out that each lover and his love has “aided” and added to the “power” of the other: neither man would have “gain[ed her] love” if the other hadn’t. The second stanza gives a more concrete sense of why: since we tend to yearn for what we don’t have at the moment, being with one of these men makes her miss the other one. But if both men are present, she feels the same about both and perhaps even feels more complete and satisfied.

As if realizing she can't solve the problem herself, she turns in the third stanza to Cupid and asks him to help by taking away her love for either Damon or Alexis. As soon as she asks for this, though, she indicates the result would be unhappiness. In the end, the poem seems to say (or its theme is) that love doesn't flow or work like a river because love can actually be stronger when we love more than one person, as if it's multiplied instead of lessened by division.

Clearly, this is the opposite of what I expected, which was that the poem would ask whether it was possible to love two people and conclude it wasn't. The conflict is also different than I expected—though there's an external conflict between the two men (maybe), the focus is on the speaker's internal conflict, but that conflict isn't over which guy to choose but about how this is actually working (I love both of them equally; each love reinforces the other) versus how she thinks things should work (I'm not supposed to love two equally).

7. Consider how the poem's form contributes to its effect and meaning.

- How is the poem organized on the page, into lines and/or stanzas, for example? (What are the lines and stanzas like in terms of length, shape, and so on? Are they all alike, or do they vary? Are lines enjambéd or end-stopped?)
- What are the poem's other formal features? (Is there rhyme or another form of aural patterning such as alliteration? What is the poem's base meter, and are there interesting variations? If not, how else might you describe the poem's rhythm?)
- How do the poem's overall form and its various formal features contribute to its meaning and effect? In other words, what gets lost when you translate the poem into modern prose?

The stanza organization underscores shifts in the speaker's approach to her situation. But organization reinforces meaning in other ways as well. On the one hand, the division into three stanzas and the choice to number them, plus the fact that each stanza has three sentences, mirror the three-way struggle or love triangle described in the poem. On the other hand, because the poem has eighteen lines and nine sentences, every sentence is "divided equally twixt two" lines. Sound and especially rhyme reinforce this pattern, since the two lines that make up one sentence usually rhyme with each other (to form a couplet). The only lines that aren't couplets are those that begin the second stanza, where we instead have alternating rhyme—is (line 7) rhymes with miss (9), mourn (8) rhymes with scorn (10). But these lines describe how the speaker "miss[es]" one man when the other is "by," a sensation she arguably reproduces in readers by ensuring that we twice "miss" the rhyme that the rest of the poem leads us to expect.

8. Investigate and consider the ways the poem both uses and departs from poetic conventions, especially those related to form and subgenre.

- Does the poem use a traditional verse form (such as blank verse) or a traditional stanza form (such as ballad stanza)? Is it a specific subgenre or kind of poem—a sonnet, an ode, a ballad, for example? If so, how does that affect its meaning?

Over time, stanza and verse forms have been used in certain ways and to certain ends, and particular subgenres have observed certain conventions. As a result, they generate particular expectations for readers familiar with such traditions, and poems gain additional meaning by both fulfilling and defying those expectations. For example, anapestic meter (two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed one, as in Tennessee) is usually used for comic poems, so when poets use it in a serious poem they are probably making a point.

9. Argue. Discussion with others—both out loud and in writing—usually results in clarification and keeps you from being too dependent on personal biases and preoccupations that sometimes mislead even the best readers. Discussing a poem with someone else (especially someone who thinks very differently) or sharing what you’ve written about the poem can expand your perspective and enrich your experience.

WRITING ABOUT POETRY

If you follow the steps outlined above and keep notes on your personal responses to the poems you read, you will have already begun writing informally. You have also generated ideas and material you can use in more formal writing. To demonstrate how, we conclude this chapter with two examples of such writing. Both grow out of the notes earlier in this chapter. Yet each is quite different in form and content. The first example is a relatively informal response paper that investigates the allusions in Aphra Behn’s ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY, following up on the discoveries and questions generated by consulting reference works (as in step 4 above). The second example is an essay on the poem that defends and develops as a thesis one answer to the questions Why does it matter? What does it all mean? (as in step 6 above) by drawing on discoveries made in earlier and later steps.

As these examples illustrate, there are many different ways to write about poems, just as there are many different things to say about any one. But all such writing begins with a clear sense of the poem itself and your responses to it. Effective writing also depends on a willingness to listen carefully to the poem and to ask genuine questions about how it works, what it says and means, and how it both fulfills and challenges your expectations about life and about poetry.

From bardic chronicles to imaginary letters, brief introspective lyrics to action-packed epics, “poetry” comes in many sizes, shapes, and varieties; serves myriad purposes for many diverse audiences; and offers pleasures and rewards both like and unlike those we get from fiction, drama, music, or any other art form. In part, though, that’s because poetry is something of a trickster and a trespasser, crossing in and out of those other generic domains and trying on their clothes, even as it inhabits and wears very special ones all its own. Poetry speaks to head, as well as heart; ears, as well as eyes. If you keep yours open, it just might speak to you in ways you never expected.

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

The following response paper investigates the allusions in Aphra Behn's ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY by drawing upon information from reference works. Few response papers involve research, but we have included one that does in order to demonstrate both how you can use information from credible secondary sources to test and deepen your personal response to a poem and how you can develop reading notes like those in chapter 11 into a thoughtful informal response paper.

Names in "On Her Loving Two Equally"

Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally" is dated 1684, but refers to an ancient pagan god. That seems weird and made me curious about what he was doing in the poem. According to the Encyclopedia Britannica Online, Cupid was the "ancient Roman god of love," "often appeared as a winged infant carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows whose wounds inspired love or passion in his every victim," and "was sometimes portrayed wearing armour like that of Mars, the God of war, perhaps to suggest ironic parallels between warfare and romance" ("Cupid"). It makes sense, then, that the speaker of this poem would think that she might stop loving one of these guys if Cupid took back the arrow that made her love him. And the reference to Cupid also reinforces the association in the poem "between warfare" or at least conflict "and romance." (The speaker is internally conflicted, and there is also an external conflict between the two male lovers.)

I'm still not sure whether the speaker is kidding or being deliberately "poetic" by talking to an ancient Roman god. But either way, this reinforces the idea I had when I was reading, that the poem isn't very specific about time or place. The poem makes the speaker's situation seem like something that has happened or could happen any time, anywhere.

But what about the names Damon and Alexis? Were these real names in seventeenth-century England, which is apparently where Behn was from? According to the Oxford Dictionary of First Names, Damon is "a classical Greek name" that was made famous in antiquity by the story of Damon and Pythias. In the early 4th century BC Pythias was condemned to death by Dionysius, ruler of Syracuse. His friend Damon offered to stand surety for him, and took his place in the condemned cell while Pythias put his affairs in order. When Pythias duly returned to be executed rather than absconding and leaving his friend to his fate, Dionysius was so impressed by the trust and friendship of the two young men that he pardoned both of them. ("Damon")

This doesn't tell me for sure whether there were really men named Damon in seventeenth-century England, but it's now clear that using the name "Damon" is another way of alluding to "antiquity" and maybe making this situation and poem seem "antique." But the story of Damon and Pythias seems even more relevant. When I was translating this poem, I noticed that it could imply that Damon and Alexis were actually helping each other, not just fighting over the speaker (especially because "his," in line 4, could refer to either man). Does the fact that the most famous Damon was willing to sit in prison and even be executed to help his best friend give me more evidence that I'm right? On the other hand, does it matter that the name comes from a word meaning "to tame, subdue" (often a euphemism for "kill") ("Damon")?

I couldn't find anything nearly this interesting about "Alexis," except that it is a Latin form of a Greek name that originally came from a word that means "to defend" ("Alexis").

To sum up, I think two things are important: (1) by referring to Cupid and naming her boyfriends Damon and Alexis, Behn makes her poem and her speaker's situation seem "antique," even for the seventeenth century, and implies her situation could happen any time anywhere; and (2) the fact that the men's names mean "to tame, subdue," even "kill," and "to defend" makes the conflict in the poem more intense, but the fact that the world's most famous Damon sacrificed himself for his friend might add fuel to the idea that these rivals are also friends who are helping each other. Maybe there's even more "loving two equally" going on here than I thought at first? If the speaker loves each of these guys more because she loves the other one, is that true of them, too? This poem is crazy!

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY

The following sample essay develops the observations about Aphra Behn's ON HER LOVING TWO EQUALLY in chapter 11, demonstrating how you can turn notes about a poem into a coherent, well-structured essay. As this essay also shows, however, you will often discover new ways of looking at a poem (or any literary text) in the very process of writing about it. (For guidelines on correctly quoting and citing poetry, see "Writing about Literature," chapter 34.)

The writer begins by considering why she is drawn to the poem, even though it does not express her ideal of love. She then uses her personal response to the poem as a starting point for analyzing it in greater depth.

Multiplying by Dividing in Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally"

My favorite poem in "Reading, Responding, Writing" is Aphra Behn's "On Her Loving Two Equally"—not because it expresses my ideal of love, but because it challenges conventional ideals. The main ideal or assumption explored in the poem is that true love is exclusive and monogamous, as the very titles of poems like "How Do I [singular] Love Thee [singular]?" or "To My Dear and Loving [and One and Only] Husband" insist (emphasis added). The mere title of Behn's poem upsets that idea by insisting that at least one woman is capable of "Loving Two Equally." In fact, one thing that is immediately interesting about Behn's poem is that, though it poses and explores a question, its question is not "Can a woman love two equally?" The title and the poem take it for granted that she can. Instead, the poem asks whether equally loving two people lessens the power or quality of love—or, as the speaker puts it in the first two lines, "How strongly does my passion flow, / Divided equally twixt two?" Every aspect of this poem suggests that when it comes to love, as opposed to math, division leads to multiplication.

This answer grabs attention because it is so counterintuitive and unconventional. Forget love for just a minute: It's common sense that anything that is divided is smaller and weaker than something unified. In math, for example, division is the opposite of multiplication; if we divide one number by another, we get a number smaller than the first number, if not the second. Although Behn's use of the word flow to frame her question compares love to a river instead of a number, the implication is the same: When a river divides into two streams, each of them is smaller than the river, and its flow less strong; as a result, each stream is more easily dammed up or diverted than the undivided river. So the way the speaker initially poses her question seems to support the conventional view: love is stronger when it “flows” toward one person, weaker when divided between two.

As conventional and comforting as that implied answer is, however, it's one the poem immediately rejects. In the remaining lines of the first stanza, the speaker insists that each of her two lovers and the love she feels for him has not lessened the strength of her feelings for the other, but the reverse. Each lover and each love has “aid[ed]” (line 6) the other, making him and it more “powerful” (5). Indeed, she says, neither man would have “subdued [her] heart” (3) or “gain[ed her] love” (6) at all if the other hadn't done so as well.

In the second stanza, the speaker gives us a somewhat more concrete sense of why this might be the case. On the one hand, being with either one of these men (“When my Alexis present is,” 7) actually makes her both “scorn” him (10) and “miss” (9) the man who's not there (“I for Damon sigh and mourn,” 8). This isn't really a paradox; we often yearn more for the person or thing we don't have (the grass is always greener on the other side of the fence), and we often lose our appreciation for nearby, familiar things and people. What is far away and inaccessible is often dearer to us because its absence either makes us aware of what it means to us or allows us to forget its flaws and idealize it.

Perhaps because all of this makes the speaker feel that she can't possibly solve the problem by herself, the speaker turns in the third stanza to Cupid—the deity who is supposed to control these things by shooting a “golden-pointed dart” (15) into the heart of each lover. She asks him to solve her dilemma for her by “tak[ing] back” her love for either Damon or Alexis (15). As with her question in the first stanza, however, this plea is revoked as soon as it's formulated, for if she loses Damon, “all [her] hopes are crossed”; if she loses Alexis, she is “lost” (17-18).

Here and throughout the poem, the speaker's main preoccupation seems to be what she feels and what this situation is like for her—“my passion” (1), “my heart” (3), “my Damon's aid, . . . my love” (6), “my Alexis” (7), “I . . . sigh and mourn” (8), “I do miss” (9), “my scorn” (10), “I languish, sigh, and die” (12), “This restless fever in my blood” (14), “my hopes” (17), “my Alexis” and “I am lost” (18). Yet the poem implies that the payoff here is not hers alone and that her feelings are not purely selfish. Both times the word gain appears in the poem, for example, her lovers' gains and feelings are the focus—the fact that Alexis is able “to gain [her] love” thanks to “Damon's aid” (6) and that “Damon gains nothing but my scorn” when she is missing Alexis (10). Moreover, ambiguous wording in the first stanza suggests that the men here may be actively, intentionally helping to create this situation and even acting in contradictory, selfish and unselfish, ways. When the speaker says that “Damon had ne'er subdued my heart / Had not Alexis took his part” (3-4), his could refer to Alexis or Damon and part could mean “a portion” (of her “heart,” presumably), “a role” (in her life or in this courtship drama), or a “side in a dispute or conflict” (over her love). Thus, she could be saying that Alexis (unselfishly) defended Damon's suit; (selfishly) fought against Damon or took a share or role that properly belonged to Damon; and/or (neutrally) took his (Alexis's) own share or role or defended his (Alexis's) own cause. Perhaps all of this has been the case at various times; people do behave in contradictory ways when they are in love, especially when they perceive that they have a rival. It's also true that men and women alike often more highly prize something or someone that someone else prizes, too. So perhaps each lover's "passion" for her also "flow[s]" more strongly than it would otherwise precisely because he has a rival.

In the end, the poem thus seems to say that love doesn't flow or work like a river because love isn't a tangible or quantifiable thing. As a result, love is also different from the sort of battle implied by the martial language of the first stanza in which someone wins only if someone else loses. The poem attributes this to the perversity of the human heart—especially our tendency to yearn for what we can't have and what we think other people want, too.

Through its form, the poem demonstrates that division can increase instead of lessen meaning, as well as love. On the one hand, just as the poem's content stresses the power of the love among three people, so the poem's form also stresses "threeness" as well as "twoness." It is after all divided into three distinctly numbered stanzas, and each stanza consists of three sentences. On the other hand, every sentence is "divided equally twixt two" lines, just as the speaker's "passion" is divided equally between two men. Formally, then, the poem mirrors the kinds of division it describes. Sound and especially rhyme reinforce this pattern since the two lines that make up one sentence usually rhyme with each other to form a couplet. The only lines that don't conform to this pattern come at the beginning of the second stanza where we instead have alternating rhyme—is (7) rhymes with miss (9), mourn (8) rhymes with scorn (10). But here, again, form reinforces content since these lines describe how the speaker "miss[es]" one man when the other is "by," a sensation that she arguably reproduces in us as we read by ensuring we twice "miss" the rhyme that the rest of the poem leads us to expect.

Because of the way it challenges our expectations and our conventional ideas about romantic love, the poem might well make us uncomfortable, perhaps all the more so because the speaker and poet here are female. For though we tend to think all true lovers should be loyal and monogamous, this has been expected even more of women than of men. What the poem says about love might make more sense and seem less strange and even objectionable, however, if we think of other, nonromantic kinds of love: after all, do we really think that our mother and father love us less if their love is "divided equally twixt" ourselves and our siblings, or do we love each of our parents less because there are two of them? If we think of these familial kinds of love, it becomes much easier to accept Behn's suggestion that love multiplies when we spread it around.

The Art of (Reading) Poetry

AN ALBUM

It is difficult to get the news from poems yet men die miserably every day for lack of what is found there.

—WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, “ASPHODEL, THAT GREENY FLOWER”

Poets obviously have a keen, even vested, interest in offering their own answers to the questions of what poetry is and why and how it should be written and read. Not surprisingly, many poets have found poetry itself the best medium through which to tackle those questions. Such poems, as well as prose works devoted to the same topic, constitute a genre of sorts—the “Ars Poetica,” a Latin phrase meaning “Art of Poetry” that many writers also use in the titles of individual works of this kind. In so doing, these writers deliberately insert themselves into a conversation that began many centuries ago, by alluding directly to a treatise on poetry with just that name by the Roman poet Horace (65–8 BCE).

You won’t find any quotations from Horace in this album. But it does gather a range of more recent “Ars Poetica” poems and invite you to compare their visions of the art of poetry, both to each other and with your own ideas and experience. As you read the poems, consider the relationship between the vision of poetry that the poems articulate (by virtue of what they say) and enact (by virtue of how they say it)—that is, the relationship between content and form, theory and practice. Does each poem manage to be or to do the things it suggests poetry must? Does the poem invite the sort of readerly response it envisions as ideal? How so or not? Which poems found elsewhere in this book do you think each of the poets in this album might like or admire the most? the least? Why and how so?

Because You Asked about the Line between Prose and Poetry

Sparrows were feeding in a freezing drizzle
That while you watched turned to pieces of snow
Riding a gradient invisible
From silver aslant to random, white, and slow.

- 5 There came a moment that you couldn't tell.
And then they clearly flew instead of fell.

1980

- What “couldn’t” you “tell” (line 5)? Who or what is “they” (6)?
- What answers, in the end, might this poem describing birds and snow offer to the question implied in its title: What defines the difference or “Line between Prose and Poetry”?

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

*Ars Poetica*¹

A poem should be palpable and mute
As a globed fruit,

Dumb
As old medallions to the thumb,

- 5 Silent as the sleeve-worn stone
Of casement ledges where the moss has grown—

A poem should be wordless
As the flight of birds.

- A poem should be motionless in time
10 As the moon climbs,

Leaving, as the moon releases
Twig by twig the night-entangled trees,

Leaving, as the moon behind the winter leaves,
Memory by memory the mind—

- 15 A poem should be motionless in time
As the moon climbs.

A poem should be equal to:
Not true.

For all the history of grief

- 20 An empty doorway and a maple leaf.

For love

The leaning grasses and two lights above the sea—

A poem should not mean
But be.

1926

- How can a poem “be wordless” (line 7)? “not mean / But be” (23–24)? How does or doesn’t this poem manage both?

CZESLAW MILOSZ

Ars Poetica?

I have always aspired to a more spacious form that would be free from the claims of poetry or prose and would let us understand each other without exposing the author or reader to sublime agonies.

- 5 In the very essence of poetry there is something indecent:
 a thing is brought forth which we didn't know we had in us, so we blink our eyes, as if a tiger had sprung out and stood in the light, lashing his tail.

- That's why poetry is rightly said to be dictated by a daimonion,² 10 though it's an exaggeration to maintain that he must be an angel.
 It's hard to guess where that pride of poets comes from,
 when so often they're put to shame by the disclosure of their frailty.

- What reasonable man would like to be a city of demons, who behave as if they were at home, speak in many tongues, 15 and who, not satisfied with stealing his lips or hand, work at changing his destiny for their convenience?

- It's true that what is morbid is highly valued today, and so you may think that I am only joking or that I've devised just one more means 20 of praising Art with the help of irony.

There was a time when only wise books were read,
 helping us to bear our pain and misery.
 This, after all, is not quite the same as leafing through a thousand works fresh from psychiatric clinics.

- 25 And yet the world is different from what it seems to be and we are other than how we see ourselves in our ravings.
 People therefore preserve silent integrity,
 thus earning the respect of their relatives and neighbors.

- The purpose of poetry is to remind us 30 how difficult it is to remain just one person, for our house is open, there are no keys in the doors, and invisible guests come in and out at will.

- What I'm saying here is not, I agree, poetry,
 as poems should be written rarely and reluctantly, 35 under unbearable duress and only with the hope that good spirits, not evil ones, choose us for their instrument.

2. Internal mentor conceived to be like, or inspired by, a demon.

- How might this poem explain or justify the question mark in its title? What does the poem suggest about where poems come from, what they are or should be like, and why they might be useful, even necessary (and to whom)?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

CZESLAW MILOSZ (1911–2004)

From “Czesław Miłosz, The Art of Poetry No. 70” (1994)*

My poetry has been called polyphonic, which is to say that I have always been full of voices speaking; in a way I consider myself an instrument, a medium. [. . .] Am I alone in this? I don't think so. [Russian novelist Fyodor] Dostoyevsky was one of the first writers, along with [German philosopher] Friedrich Nietzsche, to identify a crisis of modern civilization: that every one of us is visited by contradictory voices, contradictory physical urges. I have written about the difficulty of remaining the same person when such guests enter and go and take us for their instrument. But we must hope to be inspired by good spirits, not evil ones. [. . .]

I suppose, looking back, that everything was dictated to me, and I was just a tool. Of what I don't know. I would like to believe that I am a tool of God, but that's presumptuous. So I prefer to call whatever it is my “daimonion.”

Introduction to Poetry

I ask them to take a poem

- Who is “them” (line 1), and what is the effect of the speaker’s choice to refer to “them” and “they” (12) in this way? What different approaches to reading poetry come into conflict here? Why and how?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Both Billy Collins’s INTRODUCTION TO POETRY and Elizabeth Alexander’s ARS POETICA #100: I BELIEVE can be interpreted as exploring, from a teacher’s perspective, what happens among teachers, students, and poems in a classroom. Write a response paper in which you reflect on how either of those poems characterizes that situation and how that depiction compares to your own classroom experience.

2. Consider your responses to all the poems in this album. Which one most accurately expresses your view of what poetry is, what it does, and how we should read it? Why and how so? What does your choice say about you? Write an essay in which you reflect on how at least two of these poems express, reinforce, refine, or perhaps challenge your views of poetry.
3. Pick any poem in this album and write an essay that both explains what qualities it attributes to good poetry and then demonstrates whether, why, and how any other poem in the anthology has those qualities. Be sure to use concrete evidence from both poems to make your case.

Understanding the Text

12 | SPEAKER: WHOSE VOICE DO WE HEAR?

Poems are personal. The thoughts and feelings they express belong to a specific person, and however general or universal their sentiments seem to be, poems come to us as the expression of an individual human voice. That voice is often a voice of the poet, but not always. Poets sometimes create characters just as writers of fiction or drama do. And the speaker of a poem may express ideas or feelings very different from the poet's own and in a distinct voice.

Usually there is much more to a poem than the characterization of the speaker, but often it is necessary first to identify the speaker and determine his or her character before we can appreciate what else goes on in the poem. And sometimes, in looking for the speaker of the poem, we discover the gist of the entire poem.

NARRATIVE POEMS AND THEIR SPEAKERS

In the following narrative poem, the poet relies mainly on one speaker with a highly distinctive voice. This speaker acts as a narrator. Generally speaking in the third-person plural, on behalf of a group, however, the speaker sometimes quotes the remarks of individual members of the group (lines 1–2, 16–20), who are thus also speakers in the poem, even if they are never individually identified. As you read the poem, notice how your impressions of Hard Rock and of the group are shaped by both the narrator's words and those of the speakers he quotes.

ETHERIDGE KNIGHT

Hard Rock Returns to Prison from the Hospital for the Criminal Insane

Hard Rock was “known not to take no shit
From nobody,” and he had the scars to prove it:
Split purple lips, lumped ears, welts above
His yellow eyes, and one long scar that cut
5 Across his temple and plowed through a thick
Canopy of kinky hair.

The WORD was that Hard Rock wasn't a mean nigger
Anymore, that the doctors had bored a hole in his head,
Cut out part of his brain, and shot electricity
10 Through the rest. When they brought Hard Rock back, Handcuffed and chained, he was turned loose,

Like a freshly gelded stallion, to try his new status.
 And we all waited and watched, like indians at a corral,
 To see if the WORD was true.

- 15 As we waited we wrapped ourselves in the cloak
 Of his exploits: “Man, the last time, it took eight Screws to put him in the Hole.”¹ “Yeah, remember when he Smacked the captain with his dinner tray?” “He set
 The record for time in the Hole—67 straight days!”
 20 “Ol Hard Rock! man, that’s one crazy nigger.”
 And then the jewel of a myth that Hard Rock had once bit
 A screw on the thumb and poisoned him with syphilitic spit.

The testing came, to see if Hard Rock was really tame.
 A hillbilly called him a black son of a bitch

- 25 And didn’t lose his teeth, a screw who knew Hard Rock
 From before shook him down and barked in his face.
 And Hard Rock did nothing. Just grinned and looked silly,
 His eyes empty like knot holes in a fence.

And even after we discovered that it took Hard Rock

- 30 Exactly 3 minutes to tell you his first name,
 We told ourselves that he had just wised up,
 Was being cool; but we could not fool ourselves for long,
 And we turned away, our eyes on the ground. Crushed.
 He had been our Destroyer, the doer of things
 35 We dreamed of doing but could not bring ourselves to do,
 The fears of years, like a biting whip,
 Had cut grooves too deeply across our backs.

As we might expect, we learn a good deal in this poem about its title character: The first stanza lets us know that he is a black prison inmate and vividly describes his hair and his various “scars” (line 2) as evidence of his fierce, indomitable character, his refusal ever to back down or let anyone treat him badly. In the third stanza we hear about some of his more famous past “exploits” (16). But by the time we get to the third stanza we’ve been warned that this Hard Rock might already be a thing of the past. And the fourth stanza and the first part of the fifth and final one confirm that fear, presenting a man radically transformed and reduced by the lobotomy and electroshock therapy described in stanza two. The poem thus becomes, in part, the tragic tale of Hard Rock’s fast, hard fall. And it would be worthwhile to think further about just what other aspects of the poem help to make that fall seem so fast, so hard, so poignant.

One might be the fact that Hard Rock is literally never allowed to speak for himself in the poem. Everything we learn about him comes to us from the narrator and the other speakers whom that narrator quotes—all Hard Rock’s fellow inmates. And it is this group, this “we,” and its perceptions of Hard Rock even more than the man himself that arguably emerge as HARD ROCK RETURNS’s major focus. The poem begins, after all, with what “was ‘known’”—and, as the quotation marks here stress, said—about Hard Rock by these men (1). It ends with a stanza devoted almost exclusively to their collective reaction to his transformation. How else might the poem work to train our focus on its speakers? How, ultimately, does it characterize them, through how they speak and what they say? What exactly does Hard Rock and Hard Rock's fall mean to these men, and why?

1. Solitary confinement. Screws: guards.

Not all narrative poems are as much about their speakers as “Hard Rock Returns” is. Robert Frost’s “OUT, OUT—,” for instance, features as its main speaker a third-person omniscient narrator, one who isn’t a character in the gruesome story he tells and about whom we learn nothing specific. “Out, Out—” thereby keeps our attention utterly riveted on the characters and the action themselves. Yet this poem’s effect ultimately depends on this very fact and thus, like all narrative poems, on its particular narrator and mode of narration, on all its speakers’ words. To fully experience and better understand such poems, we can always draw upon the very same concepts and questions about narrators and characters that we draw upon when reading fiction (see chs. 3 and 4).

SPEAKERS IN THE DRAMATIC MONOLOGUE

Like all dramatic monologues, the following poem has no narrator. Rather, it consists entirely of the words a single, fictional speaker speaks to a fictional auditor in a specific time, place, and dramatic situation, much as would a character in a play. As you read the poem, pay attention to the details that alert you to the time, place, and situation and that help to characterize the speaker, the auditor, and their relationship.

A. E. STALLINGS

Hades² Welcomes His Bride

- Come now, child, adjust your eyes, for sight
 Is here a lesser sense. Here you must learn Directions through your fingertips and feet
 And map them in your mind. I think some shapes
 5 Will gradually appear. The pale things twisting Overhead are mostly roots, although some worms
 Arrive here clinging to their dead. Turn here.
 Ah. And in this hall will sit our thrones,
 And here you shall be queen, my dear, the queen
 10 Of all men ever to be born. No smile?
 Well, some solemnity befits a queen.
 These thrones I have commissioned to be made
 Are unlike any you imagined; they glow
 Of deep-black diamonds and lead, subtler
 15 And in better taste than gold, as will suit
 Your timid beauty and pale throat. Come now, Down these winding stairs, the air more still

2. Greek god of the underworld (also called Hades) and of death; he married Persephone after abducting her from her mother, Demeter, goddess of corn, grain, and the earth's harvest.

- And dry and easier to breathe. Here is a room
 For your diversions. Here I've set a loom
 20 And silk unraveled from the finest shrouds
 And dyed the richest, rarest shades of black.
 Such pictures you shall weave! Such tapestries!
 For you I chose those three thin shadows³ there,
 And they shall be your friends and loyal maids,
 25 And do not fear from them such gossiping
 As servants usually are wont. They have Not mouth nor eyes and cannot thus speak ill
 Of you. Come, come. This is the greatest room;
 I had it specially made after great thought
 30 So you would feel at home. I had the ceiling
 Painted to recall some evening sky—
 But without the garish stars and lurid moon.
 What? That stark shape crouching in the corner?
 Sweet, that is to be our bed. Our bed.
 35 Ah! Your hand is trembling! I fear
 There is, as yet, too much pulse in it.

1993

So, what do you think of the speaker, his bride (and auditor), and their bower of wormy wedded bliss? Stallings's title alerts us that the former is Hades. If we know our Greek mythology (or simply read the handy footnote), we go into the poem knowing, too, that his bride is also his kidnap victim, Persephone (whose name, interestingly enough, never appears here). Yet HADES WELCOMES HIS BRIDE puts a unique new spin on this old, familiar story by presenting it from the perspective of Hades—or, in Stallings's words, from “the bad guy's point of view”—so as to also make him seem anything but the straightforwardly ghoulish devil or brutish villain we might expect. Hades, after all, speaks formally, respectfully, even tenderly to his bride and “queen” from the beginning (line 9), inviting her into a new home to which he recognizes she must “adjust” (1) and offering advice about how to do so (1–5). As he leads her through its rooms and points out its various features, it becomes clear (long before he explicitly says so, in lines 29–30) that he has taken pains to create an environment as tasteful, grand, and hospitable, even homey, as he knows how. He is also sensitive to his bride's reactions, noticing that she isn't smiling (10); that she seems startled by what turns out to be the bed she will share with him; that after he twice utters the words “our bed. Our bed,” she “is trembling” (34–35). The fact that he repeats those words also implies that he's eagerly anticipating his wedding night. As the details accumulate, the horrors of this home and of the life and marriage to which this bride is doomed become as palpably apparent to readers as they are to her. Yet Hades's character remains ambiguous: Is he being knowingly malevolent, grandiose, even abusive by arranging and presenting things as he does and by rationalizing his bride's reactions? Is he enjoying scaring the pants off his bride, as it were? Or might he instead be, as one reviewer contends, “engag[ing] in the same self-deception as” any ordinary “mortal lover” might, so genuinely bent on his bride sharing his delight and so inured to his own literally hellish milieu that he can't or won't see the truth?

3. Especially in the sense of “phantoms”; also suggesting shades, another word both for “ghost” and for Hades.

Your answers and your interpretation of the speaker here, as in all dramatic monologues, depend entirely on the speaker's own words—on what he says and when and how he says it. The details accumulate into a fairly full, if—in this case—delightfully ambiguous, wonderfully creepy portrait, even though we do not have either a narrator's description or another speaker to give us perspective (as in Knight's "Hard Rock Returns"). As in other dramatic monologues, we do get some hint of another perspective via the reactions of the auditor, but we can only deduce what those reactions might be from what the speaker himself says.

In reading a dramatic monologue aloud, we would want our voice to suggest the feelings, motives, and attitudes the speaker's words imply. Like an actor, we would need to adopt the appropriate tone of voice and emphasis. Conversely, reading a dramatic monologue aloud, trying out various ways of delivering the lines, can help us figure out which interpretation of the speaker's character ultimately seems most faithful to the poem as a whole.

THE LYRIC AND ITS SPEAKER

With narrative poems and dramatic monologues, we are usually in no danger of mistaking the speaker for the poet. Lyrics may present more of a challenge. When there is a pointed discrepancy between the speaker of a lyric and what we know of the poet—when the speaker is a woman, for example, and the poet is a man—we know we have a fictional speaker to contend with and that the point (or at least one point) of the poem is to observe the characterization carefully.

Sometimes even in lyrics poets "borrow" a character from history and ask readers to factor in historical facts and contexts. In the following poem, for example, the Canadian poet Margaret Atwood draws heavily on facts and traditions about a nineteenth-century émigré from Scotland to Canada. The poem is a lyric spoken in the first person, but its speaker is a fictional character based on a real woman.

The poem comes from a volume called The Journals of Susanna Moodie: Poems by Margaret Atwood (1970). A frontier pioneer, Moodie (1803–84) herself wrote two books about Canada, Roughing It in the Bush and Life in the Clearings, and Atwood found their observations rather stark and disorganized. She wrote her Susanna Moodie poems to refocus the "character" and to reconstruct Moodie's actual geographical exploration and self-discovery. To fully understand these thoughts and meditations, then, we need to know something of the history behind them. Yet even without such knowledge, we can appreciate the poem's powerful evocation of its speaker's situation and feelings.

MARGARET ATWOOD

Death of a Young Son by Drowning

He, who navigated with success the dangerous river of his own birth once more set forth

on a voyage of discovery
 5 into the land I floated on but could not touch to claim.

His feet slid on the bank,
 the currents took him;
 he swirled with ice and trees in the swollen water

10 and plunged into distant regions, his head a bathysphere;⁴
 through his eyes' thin glass bubbles

he looked out, reckless adventurer on a landscape stranger than Uranus
 15 we have all been to and some remember.

There was an accident; the air locked,
 he was hung in the river like a heart.
 They retrieved the swamped body,

cairn of my plans and future charts, 20 with poles and hooks from among the nudging logs.

It was spring, the sun kept shining, the new grass
 leapt to solidity;
 my hands glistened with details.

25 After the long trip I was tired of waves.
 My foot hit rock. The dreamed sails collapsed, ragged.

I planted him in this country like a flag.

1970

Even when poets present themselves as if they were speaking directly to us in their own voices, their poems present only a partial portrait, something considerably less than the full personality and character of the poet. Though there is not an obviously created character—someone with distinct characteristics that are different from those of the poet—strategies of characterization are used to present the person speaking in one way and not another. As a result, you should still differentiate between the speaker and the poet.

BILLY COLLINS AND SHARON OLDS ON “FINDING YOUR OWN VOICE”

(2006)*

[. . . T]here’s this pet phrase about writing that is bandied around [. . .] “finding your own voice as a poet,” which I suppose means that you come out from under the direct influence of other poets and have perhaps found a way to combine those influences so that it appears to be your own voice. But I think you could also put it a different way. You, quote, find your voice, unquote, when you are able to invent this one character who resembles you, obviously, and probably is more like you than anyone else on earth, but is not the equivalent to you.

It is like a fictional character in that it has a very distinctive voice, a voice that seems to be able to accommodate and express an attitude that you are comfortable staying with but an attitude that is flexible enough to cover a number of situations.

From “Olds’ Worlds” (2008)

[. . . O]nce a poem is written, and [. . .] it’s rewritten, and maybe published, and I’m in front of people, reading it aloud—I’m not too embarrassed by that. [. . .] It doesn’t feel personal. It feels like art—a made thing—the “I” in it not myself anymore, but, I’d hope, some pronoun that a reader or hearer could slip into. But how much can a poem reflect or embody a life anyhow? You can want to come close, but it’s so profoundly different—the actual body, the flesh, the mortal life.

Although the poet is probably writing about a personal, actual experience in the following poem, he is also making a character of himself—that is, characterizing himself in a certain way, emphasizing some parts of himself and not others. We call this character a persona.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

She Dwelt among the Untrodden Ways

She dwelt among the untrodden ways

Beside the springs of Dove,⁵

A Maid whom there were none to praise

And very few to love:

5 A violet by a mossy stone

Half hidden from the eye!

—Fair as a star, when only one

Is shining in the sky.

She lived unknown, and few could know

10 When Lucy ceased to be;

But she is in her grave, and, oh,

The difference to me!

1800

Did Lucy actually live? Was she a friend of the poet? We don't know; the poem doesn't tell us, and even biographers of Wordsworth are unsure. What we do know is that Wordsworth was able to represent grief very powerfully. Whether the speaker is the historical Wordsworth or not, that speaker is a major focus of the poem, and it is his feelings that the poem isolates and expresses. We need to recognize some characteristics of the speaker and be sensitive to his feelings for the poem to work.

Analyzing Speakers: An Exercise

In the following poem, we do not get a full sense of the speaker until well into the poem. As you read, try to imagine the tone of voice you think this person would use. Exactly when do you begin to know what she sounds like?

DOROTHY PARKER

A Certain Lady

Oh, I can smile for you, and tilt my head,

And drink your rushing words with eager lips,

And paint my mouth for you a fragrant red,

And trace your brows with tutored finger-tips.

5 When you rehearse your list of loves to me,

Oh, I can laugh and marvel, rapturous-eyed.

And you laugh back, nor can you ever see

The thousand little deaths my heart has died.

5. Small stream in the Lake District in northern England, near where Wordsworth lived.

And you believe, so well I know my part,
 10 That I am gay as morning, light as snow,
 And all the straining things within my heart
 You'll never know.
 Oh, I can laugh and listen, when we meet,
 And you bring tales of fresh adventurings—
 15 Of ladies delicately indiscreet,
 Of lingering hands, and gently whispered things.
 And you are pleased with me, and strive anew
 To sing me sagas of your late delights.
 Thus do you want me—marveling, gay, and true—
 20 Nor do you see my staring eyes of nights.
 And when, in search of novelty, you stray,
 Oh, I can kiss you blithely as you go . . .
 And what goes on, my love, while you're away,
 You'll never know.

To whom does the speaker seem to be talking? What sort of person is he? How do you feel about him? Which habits and attitudes of his do you like least? How soon can you tell that the speaker is not altogether happy about his conversation and conduct? In what tone of voice would you read the first twenty-two lines aloud? What attitude would you try to express toward the person spoken to? What tone would you use for the last two lines? How would you describe the speaker's personality? What aspects of her behavior are most crucial to the poem's effect?

The poems we have looked at in this chapter—and those that follow—all suggest the value of beginning the reading of any poem with three simple questions: Who is speaking? What do we know about him or her? What kind of person is she or he? Putting together the evidence that the poem presents in answer to such questions can often take us a long way into the poem. For some poems, such questions won't help a great deal because the speaking voice is too indistinct or the character too scantily presented. But starting with such questions will often lead you toward the central experience the poem offers.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WALT WHITMAN

I celebrate myself, and sing myself

I celebrate myself, and sing myself,
 And what I assume you shall assume,
 For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.

- I loafe and invite my soul,
 5 I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass.
- My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air, Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents
 the same,
 I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin,
 Hoping to cease not till death.
- 10 Creeds and schools in abeyance,
 Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
 I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard,
 Nature without check with original energy.

LANGSTON HUGHES

Ballad of the Landlord

- Landlord, landlord,
 My roof has sprung a leak.
 Don't you 'member I told you about it
 Way last week?
- 5 Landlord, landlord,
 These steps is broken down.
 When you come up yourself
 It's a wonder you don't fall down.
- Ten Bucks you say I owe you?
 10 Ten Bucks you say is due?
 Well, that's Ten Bucks more'n I'll pay you Till you fix this house up new.
- What? You gonna get eviction orders?
 You gonna cut off my heat?
- 15 You gonna take my furniture and Throw it in the street?
- Um-huh! You talking high and mighty.
 Talk on—till you get through.
 You ain't gonna be able to say a word
- 20 If I land my fist on you.
- Police! Police!*
Come and get this man!
He's trying to ruin the government
And overturn the land!
- 25 Copper's whistle!
 Patrol bell!
 Arrest.

- Who are the various speakers in this poem? What is the effect of Hughes's choice not to give us all the words of all the speakers?

E. E. CUMMINGS

next to of course god america i

"next to of course god america i love you land of the pilgrims' and so forth oh say can you see by the dawn's early my country 'tis of centuries come and go 5 and are no more what of it we should worry in every language even deafanddumb thy sons acclaim your glorious name by gorrry by jingo by gee by gosh by gum
 why talk of beauty what could be more beaut-10 iful than these heroic happy dead who rushed like lions to the roaring slaughter they did not stop to think they died instead then shall the voice of liberty be mute?"

- Except for the last line, this poem works much like a dramatic monologue. What can you discern about the situation in which the quoted words are spoken? about the speaker and his or her audience? about the poem's attitude toward the speaker?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)

From “An Interview with Gwendolyn Brooks” (1970)*

Q[UESTION:] Are your characters literally true to your experience or do you set out to change experience?

A[NSWER:] Some of them are, are invented, some of them are very real people.

Q[UESTION:] How about the seven pool players in the poem “We Real Cool”?

A[NSWER:] They have no pretensions to any glamor. They are supposedly drop-outs, or at least they’re in the poolroom when they should possibly be in school, since they’re probably young enough, or at least those I saw were when I looked in a poolroom [. . .]. First of all, let me tell you how that’s supposed to be said, because there’s a reason why I set it out as I did. These are people who are essentially saying, “Kilroy is here. We are.” But they’re a little uncertain of the strength of their identity. [. . .]

The “We”—you’re supposed to stop after the “We” and think about their validity, and of course there’s no way for you to tell whether it should be said softly or not, I suppose, but I say it rather softly because I want to represent their basic uncertainty, which they don’t bother to question every day, of course.

Q[UESTION:] Are you saying that the form of this poem, then, was determined by the colloquial rhythm you were trying to catch?

A[NSWER:] No, determined by my feeling about these boys, these young men.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Several of the poems in this chapter create characters and imply situations, as in drama. Write an essay in which you describe and analyze the main speaker of any poem in this chapter.
2. Write an essay in which you compare the speakers in any two poems in this chapter. What kinds of self-image do they have? In each poem, what is the implied distance between the speaker and the poet?
3. Choose any of the poems in this or the previous chapter and write an essay about the way a poet can create irony and humor through the use of a speaker who is clearly distinct from the poet himself or herself.
4. Write a poem, short story, or personal essay in which the speaker or narrator is a character mentioned by a speaker in any of the poems in this chapter—for example, a pre-op Hard Rock, the lover in Dorothy Parker's A CERTAIN LADY, Ben and Jemima in CREAM OF WHEAT, or Persephone in Stallings's HADES WELCOMES HIS BRIDE. How might the same situation, as well as the main speaker of these poems, look and sound different when viewed from another speaker's point of view and described in another speaker's voice?

Exploring Gender

AN ALBUM

As far as I'm concerned, being any gender is a drag.

—PATTI SMITH

In poetry, as in life, the meaning of what is said to us depends in great part on who says it. In both contexts, too, our sense of who a speaker (or any person) is has much to do with gender, even when we aren't aware of it. Is this person a he or a she? Those little pronouns make all the difference, which is one reason why many people today opt to refuse the binary these pronouns imply by adopting the gender-neutral they.

As an experiment, look back at one or two of the poems in the last chapter. At what point, and for what reason, did you first decide that a poem's speaker was male or female? Did you ever change your mind? Does any speaker's gender seem more ambiguous now, on a second reading of the poem, than it did on the first reading? What difference does the speaker's gender make to your response? How might your response relate to the ways the poem does or doesn't conform to your expectations of men and women? What is the effect of the correspondence (or lack thereof) between the author's gender and the speaker's?

Despite all we have said about the danger of confusing the author of a poem with its speaker(s), in practice we usually use our knowledge of an author's gender in determining a speaker's gender, particularly when the latter is ambiguous. Consider William Wordsworth's poem SHE DWELT AMONG THE UNTRODDEN WAYS. The title tells us that the poem describes a "she," whom we later learn is "A Maid"—that is, an unmarried woman, probably young and virginal, named Lucy (lines 3, 10). But what about the speaker? On the one hand, we know that Lucy's death and burial make all "[t]he difference" to this person (12), and the poem also gives us plenty of reasons to suspect that the speaker is among the "very few" who "love[d]" Lucy (4), finding her flowerlike and "[f]air" (5, 7). On the other hand, you might be surprised to discover that nothing in the poem establishes the speaker's gender beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet based on these few cues—on the fact that the poem is written by William Wordsworth, on our experience of the ways men and women tend to feel and talk about each other, and on the ways a lyric is likely to portray a lost beloved—we almost inevitably assume as we read that the speaker is a man.

In the absence of definitive textual cues about a speaker's gender, such assumptions are perfectly acceptable and conventional. But it is nonetheless important (and just plain interesting) to notice that when we assign gender to the speaker of some poems, we are making an assumption—one that greatly affects our reading and response. Notice, too, that in assigning gender we not only tend to assume there are only two options but also often draw on assumptions about sexuality as well, taking it for granted that people are heterosexual. When it comes to gender we need to pay attention to all the details that a poem gives us, as well as to those it withholds. We also need to be ready for surprises and to look for evidence that might overturn, or at least complicate, our assumptions. For example, Shakespeare's sonnets famously include some addressed to a young man, others addressed to a woman, and still others that are ambiguous, especially when read independently of the rest of the sonnets in the sequence. In some cases, the erotic charge of the poems, combined with our own tendency to believe that love poems must be addressed from a man to a woman or vice versa, might well lead us to make problematic inferences about the gender of the speaker or the lover.

To help you think more about these issues, this album gathers poems whose speakers vary widely. In one way or another, however, all of these poems invite us to explore our ideas and feelings about gender and, to a lesser extent, sexuality. What does it mean to be a man or a woman? What has it meant in other times and places? Might gender be more complex than the phrases man or woman and he or she suggest? When, where, and how do we acquire our ideas about gender-appropriate roles, qualities, behavior, and appearance? Are some or all of these "ideas" not learned at all, but rather innate or instinctual? When and why might having a gender be a burden? a pleasure? How does gender shape our experience? our sense of ourselves and others? our interactions with, and our emotional responses to, poems and people?

RICHARD LOVELACE

Song: To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind
To war and arms I fly.

- 5 True: a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

- Yet this inconstancy is such 10 As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honor more.

1649

- What might this poem imply about men's and women's attitudes toward love and war?

MARY, LADY CHUDLEIGH

To the Ladies

Wife and servant are the same,
But only differ in the name:
For when that fatal knot is tied,
Which nothing, nothing can divide,

- 5 When she the word *Obe*y has said,
 And man by law supreme has made,
 Then all that's kind is laid aside,
 And nothing left but state¹ and pride.
 Fierce as an eastern prince he grows,
 10 And all his innate rigor shows:
 Then but to look, to laugh, or speak,
 Will the nuptial contract break.
 Like mutes, she signs alone must make,
 And never any freedom take,
 15 But still be governed by a nod,
 And fear her husband as her god:
 Him still must serve, him still obey,
 And nothing act, and nothing say,
 But what her haughty lord thinks fit,
 20 Who, with the power, has all the wit.
 Then shun, oh! shun that wretched state,
 And all the fawning flatterers hate.
 Value yourselves, and men despise:
 You must be proud, if you'll be wise.

1703

- What might the speaker mean when she says a husband “with the power, has all the wit” (line 20)? How might that statement multiply the meanings of the poem’s last line?

WILFRED OWEN

Disabled

- He sat in a wheeled chair, waiting for dark,
 And shivered in his ghastly suit of grey,
 Legless, sewn short at elbow. Through the park
 Voices of boys rang saddening like a hymn,
 5 Voices of play and pleasure after day,
 Till gathering sleep had mothered them from him.

 About this time Town used to swing so gay
 When glow-lamps budded in the light blue trees,
 And girls glanced lovelier as the air grew dim,—
 10 In the old times, before he threw away his knees.
 Now he will never feel again how slim
 Girls' waists are, or how warm their subtle hands;
 All of them touch him like some queer disease.

 There was an artist silly for his face,
 15 For it was younger than his youth, last year.
 Now, he is old; his back will never brace;
 He's lost his color very far from here,

1. Social position.

- Poured it down shell-holes till the veins ran dry,
 And half his lifetime lapsed in the hot race,
 20 And leap of purple spurted from his thigh.
- One time he liked a blood-smear down his leg,
 After the matches,² carried shoulder-high.
 It was after football, when he'd drunk a peg,³
 He thought he'd better join.—He wonders why.
 25 Someone had said he'd look a god in kilts,
 That's why; and may be, too, to please his Meg;
 Aye, that was it, to please the giddy jilts
 He asked to join. He didn't have to beg;
 Smiling they wrote his lie; aged nineteen years.
- 30 Germans he scarcely thought of; all their guilt,
 And Austria's, did not move him. And no fears
 Of Fear came yet. He thought of jeweled hilts
 For daggers in plaid socks; of smart salutes;
 And care of arms; and leave; and pay arrears;
 35 Esprit de corps; and hints for young recruits.
 And soon, he was drafted out with drums and cheers.
- Some cheered him home, but not as crowds cheer Goal.
 Only a solemn man who brought him fruits
Thanked him; and then inquired about his soul.
- 40 Now, he will spend a few sick years in Institutes,
 And do what things the rules consider wise,
 And take whatever pity they may dole.
 Tonight he noticed how the women's eyes
 Passed from him to the strong men that were whole.
- 45 How cold and late it is! Why don't they come
 And put him into bed? Why don't they come?

1917

- How might you respond differently to this poem if the soldier himself were the speaker? if the poem described the events of his life in the order in which they happened? if the poem lacked its last two lines?

Exchanging Hats

- Unfunny uncles who insist
 in trying on a lady's hat,
 —oh, even if the joke falls flat,
 we share your slight transvestite twist
- 5 in spite of our embarrassment.
 Costume and custom are complex.

The headgear of the other sex inspires us to experiment.

Anandrous⁴ aunts, who, at the beach
10 with paper plates upon your laps, keep putting on the yachtsmen's caps with exhibitionistic screech, the visors hanging o'er the ear
so that the golden anchors drag,
15 —the tides of fashion never lag.
Such caps may not be worn next year.

Or you who don the paper plate itself, and put some grapes upon it, or sport the Indian's feather bonnet, 20 —perversities may aggravate

the natural madness of the hatter.
And if the opera hats collapse and crowns grow drafty, then, perhaps, he thinks what might a miter matter?

25 Unfunny uncle, you who wore a hat too big, or one too many, tell us, can't you, are there any stars inside your black fedora?

Aunt exemplary and slim,
30 with avernal⁵ eyes, we wonder what slow changes they see under their vast, shady, turned-down brim.

1956

- The speaker in this poem uses the first-person plural ("we," line 4; "our," 5; "us," 8). Who might "we" be? How might your response to the poem change if the speaker instead used the first-person singular ("I") or the third-person plural ("they")?

DAVID WAGONER

My Father's Garden

On his way to the open hearth where white-hot steel
Boiled against furnace walls in wait for his lance
To pierce the fireclay and set loose demons
And dragons in molten tons, blazing
5 Down to the huge satanic caldrons,
Each day he would pass the scrapyard, his kind of garden.

4. Literally, "husbandless." 5. Infernal.

In rusty rockeries of stoves and brake drums,
 In grottoes of sewing machines and refrigerators,
 He would pick flowers for us: small gears and cogwheels
 10 With teeth like petals, with holes for anthers,
 Long stalks of lead to be poured into toy soldiers,
 Ball bearings as big as grapes to knock them down.

He was called a melter. He tried to keep his brain
 From melting in those tyger-mouthed mills
 15 Where the same steel reappeared over and over
 To be reborn in the fire as something better
 Or worse: cannons or cars, needles or girders,
 Flagpoles, swords, or plowshares.

But it melted. His classical learning ran
 20 Down and away from him, not burning bright.⁶
 His fingers culled a few cold scraps of Latin
 And Greek, magna sine laude,⁷ for crosswords
 And brought home lumps of tin and sewer grills
 As if they were his ripe prize vegetables.

1987

- What facts do we learn here about the speaker's father and his life? What are the speaker's feelings about both?

JUDITH ORTIZ COFER

The Changeling

As a young girl
 vying for my father's attention,
 I invented a game that made him look up from his reading and shake his head
 5 as if both baffled and amused.

In my brother's closet, I'd change into his dungarees—the rough material molding me into boy shape; hide my long hair under an army helmet
 10 he'd been given by Father, and emerge transformed into the legendary Ché⁸ of grown-up talk.

Strutting around the room,
 I'd tell of life in the mountains,
 15 of carnage and rivers of blood, and of manly feasts with rum and music to celebrate victories para la libertad.⁹

6. Like "tyger-mouthed" (line 14), an allusion to William Blake's poem "The Tyger" (1790; p. 1060).

7. Without great distinction; a reversal of the usual magna cum laude.

8. Ernesto "Che" Guevara (1928–67), Argentinian-born Cuban revolutionary leader.

9. For freedom (Spanish).

He would listen with a smile to my tales of battles and brotherhood
20 until Mother called us to dinner.

She was not amused
by my transformations, sternly forbidding me from sitting down with them as a man.
She'd order me back to the dark cubicle
25 that smelled of adventure, to shed my costume, to braid my hair furiously with blind hands, and to return invisible, as myself,
to the real world of her kitchen.

1993

- Why do you think the speaker's father is amused by her "transformations" (line 22), and why does her mother forbid them? What does this poem imply about all three characters?

MARIE HOWE

Practicing

I want to write a love poem for the girls I kissed in seventh grade, a song for what we did on the floor in the basement of somebody's parents' house, a hymn for what we didn't say but thought:
That feels good or I like that, when we learned how to open each other's mouths

- 5 how to move our tongues to make somebody moan. We called it practicing, and one was the boy, and we paired off—maybe six or eight girls—and turned out the lights and kissed and kissed until we were stoned on kisses, and lifted our nightgowns or let the straps drop, and, Now you be the boy:
concrete floor, sleeping bag or couch, playroom, game room, train room, laundry.
- 10 Linda's basement was like a boat with booths and portholes instead of windows. Gloria's father had a bar downstairs with stools that spun,
plush carpeting. We kissed each other's throats.
We sucked each other's breasts, and we left marks, and never spoke of it upstairs outdoors, in daylight, not once. We did it, and it was
- 15 practicing, and slept, sprawled so our legs still locked or crossed, a hand still lost in someone's hair . . . and we grew up and hardly mentioned who the first kiss really was—a girl like us, still sticky with the moisturizer we'd shared in the bathroom. I want to write a song for that thick silence in the dark, and the first pure thrill of reluctant desire, 20 just before we made ourselves stop.

1998

- What does the speaker of this poem imply about why her memories of “practicing” matter to her now that she is an adult? What does she imply about how being a girl compares to being a woman?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

MARIE HOWE (b. 1950)

From “Marie Howe” (1997)*

M[ARIE] H[OWE]: [. . .] I was interested in what it means to be a woman, what it means to be a man. [. . .]

In this culture, our mothers don't tell us about their first sexual experience, they don't tell us about their marriage, their lives, their sexual life in marriage, they don't tell us anything.

My mother told us nothing. [. . .] So, I've been really aware lately, at 46 years old, that I still need my sisters and my friends to teach me and help me figure out how to be a “girl.”

[INTERVIEWER]: So much of our time as girls and women is spent trying to figure out what is allowed, by men and by other women as well. What is not talked about and what is talked about. How we can have an authentic sexuality.

MH: In learning how to be a girl in this culture, we are learning how to be objects. [. . .]

So in the poems, I was trying to find places in my young life where I was actually the subject, and I found it was in practicing how to kiss, which I did with other girls. I got to be a boy-girl and a girl-girl—I got to kiss the girl and kiss the boy. I loved that.

From “The Complexity of the Human Heart: A Conversation with Marie Howe” (2004)

[INTERVIEWER]: I was interested in your saying you don't want to write personal poems anymore. Is one of the dangers having people confuse your poetry with your life? Once I heard someone say to Sharon Olds, “Tell me, how old are your son and daughter now?” And she said, “I have no son or daughter. Those are fictitious children.”

MH: I understand what she means. For example, with that poem “Practicing,” [. . .] the New Yorker legal department called up and said, “Are those girls identifiable?” I said, well, Linda's basement was like a boat and Gloria's father did have a bar downstairs with plush carpeting, but I didn't kiss those girls. So, yes, they're identifiable, because the poem has great, great details from my childhood, but that to me is the answer to the question of whether it is autobiographical. It's all constructed. I didn't kiss those two girls. They were my best friends when I was a kid. I kissed other girls, but how could you give up those gorgeous details with those basements, and it poured into the poems. [. . .] But what comes together in a poem isn't true [. . .].

[. . .] I'm making something, like [the artist] Joseph Cornell makes his boxes and everyone looks into them, but it's the box you look into; it's not the man or the woman. It's alchemy of language and memory and imagination and time and music and sounds that gets made, and that's different from "Here is what happened to me when I was ten." That poem is a good example. Linda's boat basement and Gloria's plush carpeting were there, but they weren't there there.

BOB HICOK

O my pa-pa

- Our fathers have formed a poetry workshop.
 They sit in a circle of disappointment over our fastballs and wives. We thought they didn't read our stuff, whole anthologies of poems that begin, My father never,
 5 or those that end, and he was silent as a carp, or those with middles which, if you think of the right side as a sketch, look like a paunch of beer and worry, but secretly, with flashlights in the woods, they've read every word and noticed 10 that our nine happy poems have balloons and sex and giraffes inside, but not one dad waving hello from the top of a hill at dusk. Theirs is the revenge school of poetry, with titles like
 "My Yellow Sheet Lad" and "Given Your Mother's Taste 15 for Vodka, I'm Pretty Sure You're Not Mine."
 They're not trying to make the poems better so much as sharper or louder, more like a fishhook or electrocution, as a group
 they overcome their individual senilities, 20 their complete distaste for language, how cloying it is, how like tears it can be, and remember every mention of their long hours at the office or how tired they were when they came home, when they were dragged through the door
 25 by their shadows. I don't know why it's so hard to write a simple and kind poem to my father, who worked, not like a dog, dogs sleep most of the day in a ball of wanting to chase something, but like a man, a man with seven kids and a house to feed, whose absence 30 was his presence, his present, the Cheerios, the PF Flyers, who taught me things about trees,
 that they're the most intricate version of standing up, who built a grandfather clock with me so I would know that time is a constructed thing, a passing, ticking fancy.
 35 A bomb. A bomb that'll go off soon for him, for me, and I notice in our fathers' poems a reciprocal dwelling on absence, that they wonder why we disappeared as soon as we got our licenses, why we wanted the rocket cars, as if running away from them 40 to kiss girls who looked like mirrors of our mothers wasn't fast enough, and it turns out they did start to say something, to form the words hey or stay, but we'd turned into a door full of sun, into the burning leave, and were gone

 45 before it came to them that it was all right to shout, that they should have knocked us down with a hand on our shoulders, that they too are mystified by the distance men need in their love.

- What does the speaker seem to discover about fathers, sons, and men by imagining the poems "Our fathers" might write (line 1)? What does the poem imply about the relationship between poetry, "language" (20), and gender?

TERRANCE HAYES

Mr. T—¹

A man made of scrap muscle & the steam engine's imagination, white feathers flapping in each lobe for the skull's migration, should the need arise. Sometimes drugged
 5 & duffed (by white men) in a cockpit bound for the next adventure. And liable to crush a fool's face like newsprint; headlines of Hollywood blood and wincing. Half Step 'N Fetchit,² half John Henry. What were we, the skinny B-boys,³ 10 to learn from him? How to hulk through Chicago in a hedgerow afro, an ox-grunt kicking dust behind the teeth; those eighteen glammering gold chains around the throat of pity, that fat hollow medallion like the sun on a leash—

- How does the poem characterize Mr. T and the speaker's feelings about him? Why might it matter that the speaker uses the first-person plural ("we") versus the singular ("I")?

1. Stage name of bodyguard-turned-actor Laurence Tureaud (b. 1952), who first rose to fame as a star of the 1980s action-adventure series The A Team and the film Rocky III (1982). His boast "I pity the fool" became a popular catchphrase.

2. Born Lincoln Theodore Perry (1902–85), "Stepin Fetchit" is widely regarded as the first African American movie star; he became famous and controversial in the 1930s by repeatedly playing the same stereotypically simpleminded character.

3. Hip-hop dancers or "breakers." John Henry: American folk hero portrayed as an enormously strong railroad worker who dies from exhaustion after winning a contest against a steam-powered drill.

The Kind of Man I Am at the DMV

“Mommy, that man is a girl,” says the little boy pointing his finger, like a narrow spotlight, targeting the center of my back, his kid-hand learning to assert what he sees, his kid-hand 5 learning the failure of gender’s tidy little story about itself. I try not to look at him because, yes that man is a girl. I, man, am a girl.

I am the kind of man who is a girl and because the kind of man I am is patient with children 10 I try not to hear the meanness in his voice, his boy voice that sounds like a girl voice because his boy voice is young and pitched high like the tent in his pants will be years later because he will grow to be the kind of man 15 who is a man, or so his mother thinks.

His mother snatches his finger from the air, of course he’s not, she says, pulling him back to his seat, what number does it say we are?
she says to her boy, bringing his attention
20 to numbers, to counting and its solid sense.

But he has earrings, the boy complains now sounding desperate like he's been the boy who cries wolf, like he's been the hub of disbelief before, but this time 25 he knows he is oh so right. The kind of man I am is a girl, the kind of man
 I am is push-ups on the basement floor, is chest bound tight against himself, is thick gripping hands to the wheel
 30 when the kind of man I am drives away from the boy who will become a boy except for now while he's still a girl voice,
 a girl face, a hairless arm, a powerless hand.
That boy is a girl that man who is a girl 35 thinks to himself, as he pulls out of the lot, his girl eyes shining in the Midwest sun.

- According to the poem, what is wrong with “gender’s tidy little / story about itself,” or what is its “failure” (lines 5–6)? How does the speaker characterize and seem to feel about the little boy? his mother? Why and how so?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Identify the poem in this album that moves you the most, whether to anger, frustration, sadness, delight, or any other emotion. Write an essay exploring why and how the poem evokes the emotions it does, focusing especially on the way your emotional response relates, on the one hand, to the poem’s representation of gender and, on the other hand, either to your own experience of being a certain gender (or not) or to your own ideas about gender. Alternatively, choose any poem in the album that you find especially good or interesting, and write an essay exploring what it shows about gender and how it does so.
2. Some of the poems in this album explore the relationship between adults and children from the grown-up child’s perspective (David Wagoner’s MY FATHER’S GARDEN, Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING, Elizabeth Bishop’s EXCHANGING HATS, Bob Hicok’s O MY PA-PA). Write an essay comparing the way at least two of these poems portray either these relationships or the role of parents in teaching their children what it means to be a certain gender. What feelings do the poems express about these relationships or roles?
3. Richard Lovelace’s SONG: TO LUCASTA, GOING TO THE WARS, Wilfred Owen’s DISABLED, and Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING all deal with war and men’s and women’s relationship to it. Write an essay in which you compare these poems and their implications about the role of war in defining masculinity and femininity.
4. Elizabeth Bishop’s EXCHANGING HATS, Judith Ortiz Cofer’s THE CHANGELING, and Marie Howe’s PRACTICING all describe games or experiments that involve trying on different roles, sometimes by trying on different clothes. Write an essay in which you compare at least two of these poems and the games they describe. What does each game and each poem illustrate about social roles and rules? about the difference between “play” and “real life” or between childhood and adulthood? If you focus on PRACTICING, feel free to draw on the excerpts from the Howe interviews, as well as the poem.
5. Choose any poem from another chapter or album in this book, and write an essay exploring how the poem’s meaning and emotional impact are affected by the fact that its speaker either is or is not clearly male or female.

13 | SITUATION AND SETTING: WHAT HAPPENS? WHERE? WHEN?

Questions about the speaker in a poem (Who? questions) lead to questions about What? and Why? as well as Where? and When? First you identify the imagined situation in the poem: To whom is the speaker speaking? Is there an auditor in the poem? Is anyone else present or referred to in the poem? What is happening? Why is this event or communication occurring, and why is it significant? As soon as you zoom in on answers to such questions about persons and actions, you also encounter questions about place and time. (Where and when does the action or communication take place?) In other words, situation entails setting.

The place involved in a poem is its spatial setting, and the time is its temporal setting. The temporal setting may be a specific date or an era, a season of the year or a time of day. Temporal and spatial settings often influence our expectations, although a poet may surprise us by making something very different of what we had thought was familiar. We tend, for example, to think of spring as a time of discovery and growth, and poems set in spring are likely to make use of that association. Similarly, morning usually suggests discovery—beginnings, vitality, the world fresh and new.

Not all poems have an identifiable situation or setting, just as not all poems have a speaker who is easily distinguishable from the author. Lyrics that simply present a series of thoughts and feelings directly, in a reflective way, may not present anything resembling a scene with action, dialogue, or description. But many poems depend crucially on a sense of place, a sense of time, and scenes that resemble those in plays or films. And questions about these matters will often lead you to define not only the “facts” but also the feelings central to the design a poem has on its readers.

To understand the dialogue in Thomas Hardy’s THE RUINED MAID, for example, we need to recognize that the two women are meeting after an extended period of separation (the situation) and that they meet in a town rather than the rural area in which they grew up together (the setting). We infer (from the opening lines) that the meeting is accidental and that no one else is present for the conversation. The poem’s whole “story” depends on their situation: After leading separate lives for a while, they have some catching up to do. We don’t know what specific town they are in or what year, season, or time of day it is—and those details are not important to the poem’s effect.

More specific settings matter in other poems. Etheridge Knight’s HARD ROCK RETURNS TO PRISON FROM THE HOSPITAL FOR THE CRIMINAL INSANE depends entirely on its prison setting, as does A. E. Stallings’s HADES WELCOMES HIS BRIDE on all the vividly rendered objects that make up its version of the underworld. Here, the contrast between the actuality of the setting and the alternately matter-of-fact and glowing terms in which the speaker presents it generates irony, adds to the overall creepiness, and helps define the ambiguities of the speaker’s character.

Situation and setting may be treated in various ways in a poem, ranging from silence to the barest hints of description to full photographic detail. Often it is relatively easy to identify the situation at the beginning of a poem, but the implications of setting, and what happens as the poem unfolds, may be subtler. Poets often rely on readers to fill in the gaps, drawing on their knowledge of circumstances and familiar experiences in the present or in the past. The poem may specify only a few aspects of a kind of setting, such as a motel room in the afternoon.

SITUATION

The following poem portrays a situation that should be—at least in some of its aspects—familiar to you. How would you summarize that situation?

RITA DOVE

Daystar

She wanted a little room for thinking;
but she saw diapers steaming on the line,
a doll slumped behind the door.
So she lugged a chair behind the garage
5 to sit out the children's naps.

Sometimes there were things to watch—
the pinched armor of a vanished cricket, a floating maple leaf. Other days
she stared until she was assured 10 when she closed her eyes she'd see only her own vivid blood.

She had an hour, at best, before Liza appeared pouting from the top of the stairs.
And just what was mother doing 15 out back with the field mice? Why, building a palace. Later that night when Thomas rolled over and lurched into her, she would open her eyes and think of the place that was hers 20 for an hour—where she was nothing,
pure nothing, in the middle of the day.

The mother in Dove's DAYSTAR, overwhelmed by the demands of young children, needs a room of her own. All she can manage, however, is a brief hour of respite. The situation is virtually the whole story here. Nothing really happens except that daily events (washing diapers, picking up toys, explaining the world to children, having sex) that surround her brief private hour and make it precious. Being "nothing" (lines 21 and 22) takes on great value in these circumstances.

Not every poem presents, as Dove's does, familiar and real or realistic situations (any more than all fiction does). Yet even poems that present imaginary or fantastic situations must make them somehow real-seeming and relevant to us. The two poems below are good examples. Both contemplate imaginary situations but of very different kinds. The first works by simply twisting a familiar situation: The poem describes the speaker's experience as a student in a college course, only the course is in Humanity, not Humanities. The second poem is more abstract and speculative: Like the genre of fiction and film to which its title refers (science fiction), it imagines a possible future. As you read the poems, think about what each suggests about real-world situations ("what is") by the way it depicts its wholly imaginary ("what if") one.

DENISE DUHAMEL

Humanity 101

I was on my way to becoming a philanthropist, or the president, or at least someone who gave a shit, but I was a nontraditional student with a lot of catching up to do. I enrolled in Humanity 101 5 (not to be confused with the Humanities, a whole separate department). When I flunked the final exam, my professor suggested
 I take Remedial Humanity where I'd learn the basics that I'd missed so far. I may have been a nontraditional student, 10 but I was a traditional person, she said, the way a professor can say intimate things sometimes, as though your face and soul are aglow in one of those magnified (10x) makeup mirrors.

So I took Remedial Humanity, which sounds like an easy A, 15 but, believe me, it was actually quite challenging.
 There were analogy questions, such as:
 Paris Hilton¹ is to a rich U.S. suburban kid as a U.S. middle-class kid is to:
 1.) a U.S. poverty-stricken kid, 20 2.) a U.S. kid with nothing in the fridge, or
 3.) a Third World kid with no fridge at all.
 We were required to write essays about the cause of war—
 Was it a phenomenon? Was it our lower animal selves?
 25 Was it economics? Was it psychological/sexual/religious (good vs. evil and all that stuff)? For homework we had to bend down to talk to a homeless person slouched against a building. We didn't necessarily have to give them money or food, but we had to say something like 30 How are you? or What is your favorite color?
 We took field trips to nursing homes, prisons, day-care centers. We stood near bedsides or sat on the floor to color with strange little people who cried and were afraid of us at first.
 35 I almost dropped out. I went to see the professor during his office hours because I wanted to change my major.

1. Socialite and media personality (b. 1981), granddaughter of Hilton Hotels founder Conrad Hilton.

He asked, “Is that because your heart is being smashed?”
 He thought I should stick it out, that I could make it, if I just escaped for an hour a day blasting music
 40 into my earbuds or slumping in front of the TV.
 I said, “But that’s just it. Now I see humanity everywhere, even on sitcoms, even in pop songs, even in beer commercials.” He closed his door and showed me the scars under his shirt 45 where he had been stabbed. He said I had to assume everyone had such a wound, whether I could see it or not.

He assured me that it really did get easier in time, and that it was hard to make music when you were still learning how to play the scales. He made me see 50 my potential. He convinced me of my own humanity, that one day I might even be able to get a PhD. But first
 I had to, for extra credit, write a treatise on detachment.

- What does the speaker learn from her Humanity class? Why, according to the poem, might we all need one? What aspects of the situation imagined here seem especially funny or ironic? How does the poem use specific aspects of familiar situations?

TRACY K. SMITH

Sci-Fi

There will be no edges, but curves.
 Clean lines pointing only forward.

History, with its hard spine & dog-eared
 Corners, will be replaced with nuance,

5 Just like the dinosaurs gave way
 To mounds and mounds of ice.

Women will still be women, but
 The distinction will be empty. Sex,

Having outlived every threat, will gratify
 10 Only the mind, which is where it will exist.

For kicks, we’ll dance for ourselves
 Before mirrors studded with golden bulbs.

The oldest among us will recognize that glow—
 But the word sun will have been re-assigned

15 To a Standard Uranium-Neutralizing device
 Found in households and nursing homes.

And yes, we'll live to be much older, thanks
To popular consensus. Weightless, unhinged,

Eons from even our own moon, we'll drift
20 In the haze of space, which will be, once

And for all, scrutable and safe.

- Does the poem present the future it imagines as positive? negative? both? How might this poem's version of the future compare to those conventionally offered up in science fiction and film? Might the poem comment on such conventional representations?

SETTING

Frequently a poem's setting draws on common notions of a particular time or place. Setting a poem in a garden, for example, or writing about apples almost inevitably reminds readers of the Garden of Eden because it is an important and widely recognized part of the Western heritage. Even people who don't read at all or who lack Judeo-Christian religious commitments are likely to know about Eden, and poets writing in Western cultures can count on that knowledge. A reference to something outside the poem that carries a history of meaning and strong emotional associations is called an allusion. For example, gardens may carry suggestions of innocence and order, or temptation and the Fall, or both, depending on how the poem handles the allusion.

Specific, well-known places may similarly be associated with particular ideas, values, ways of life, or natural phenomena. The titles of many poems refer, like the following one, directly to specific places or times. As you read the poem, pay attention to when and where it takes place and to the details of setting, as well as situation.

MATTHEW ARNOLD

Dover Beach²

The sea is calm tonight.
The tide is full, the moon lies fair
Upon the straits; on the French coast the light
Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,
5 Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay.
Come to the window, sweet is the night-air!
Only, from the long line of spray
Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land,
Listen! you hear the grating roar
10 Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in.

2. At the narrowest point on the English Channel. The light on the French coast (lines 3–4) would be about twenty miles away.

- 15 Sophocles long ago
 Heard it on the Aegean, and it brought Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow
 Of human misery,³ we Find also in the sound a thought,
 20 Hearing it by this distant northern sea.
- The Sea of Faith
 Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
 Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled.
 But now I only hear
 25 Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
 Retreating, to the breath
 Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
 And naked shingles⁴ of the world.
- Ah, love, let us be true
 30 To one another! for the world, which seems
 To lie before us like a land of dreams,
 So various, so beautiful, so new,
 Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
 Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
 35 And we are here as on a darkling plain
 Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
 Where ignorant armies clash by night.

c. 1851

1867

The situation and setting of DOVER BEACH are concrete and specific. It is night by the seashore, and the speaker is gazing at the view from a room with someone he invites to “Come to the window” (line 6) and “Listen” (9); later he says to this person, “Ah, love, let us be true / To one another!” (29–30). Most readers have assumed that the speaker and his companion are about to travel from Dover across the sea to France and that the situation is a honeymoon, or at least that the couple is young and married; after all, the “world [. . .] seems / To lie before us [. . .] / so new” (30–32). Although this poem is not a prayer, it is a kind of plea for hope despite the modern loss of faith. The tide is now full, but the poet hears a destructive repetition of rising and falling waves (the pebbles will be worn down eventually), and he dwells on the “withdrawing” side of this pattern. For centuries, Christian belief, “The Sea of Faith” (21), was at high tide, but now the speaker can only “hear” it “[r]etreating” (24, 26). On the one hand, then, the specifics of setting—the fact that it is night, that the speaker looks out on a stony beach lined with cliffs, and so on—seem to evoke the sense of danger, isolation, and uncertainty the speaker feels as a result of the loss of faith. On the other hand, how might details of setting introduce hope into the poem, especially when we combine them with our knowledge of how tides ebb and flow and how the dark of night gives way to the light of day?

3. In Sophocles's Antigone (lines 637–46; p. 1617), the chorus compares the fate of the house of Oedipus to the waves of the sea. 4. Pebble-strewn beaches.

ONE POEM, MULTIPLE SITUATIONS AND SETTINGS

Though many poems depict a single situation and setting, a single poem will sometimes juxtapose multiple “scenes.” In such cases, we need both to determine the situation and setting particular to each scene and to consider how the poem interrelates its various scenes to create a singular effect and meaning.

The following poem describes several scenes. Some seem to have actually occurred at particular places and times (when the main speaker was “In sixth grade,” for example [line 1]). Others seem hypothetical, abstract, or generic—events that might or often do happen almost anywhere to almost anybody (like “choos[ing] / persimmons,” 6–7). Still others seem indeterminate as to time and/or place (Did “Donna undres[s]” only once [18]? When?). How many different scenes of each type can you discern? What connects them to each other? For example, how might at least some of these scenes demonstrate or discuss various kinds of “precision” (5, 82)? How so, and what kinds?

LI-YOUNG LEE

Persimmons

- In sixth grade Mrs. Walker slapped the back of my head and made me stand in the corner for not knowing the difference
 5 between persimmon and precision.
 How to choose persimmons. This is precision.
 Ripe ones are soft and brown-spotted.
 Sniff the bottoms. The sweet one 10 will be fragrant. How to eat:
 put the knife away, lay down newspaper.
 Peel the skin tenderly, not to tear the meat.
 Chew the skin, suck it,
 and swallow. Now, eat 15 the meat of the fruit,
 so sweet,
 all of it, to the heart.
- Donna undresses, her stomach is white.
 In the yard, dewy and shivering 20 with crickets, we lie naked, face-up, face-down.
 I teach her Chinese.
 Crickets: chiu chiu. Dew: I’ve forgotten.
 Naked: I’ve forgotten.
 25 Ni, wo: you and me.
 I part her legs,
 remember to tell her she is beautiful as the moon.

Other words

- 30 that got me into trouble were fight and fright, wren and yarn.
 Fight was what I did when I was frightened, fright was what I felt when I was fighting.
 Wrens are small, plain birds,
 35 yarn is what one knits with.
 Wrens are soft as yarn.
 My mother made birds out of yarn.
 I loved to watch her tie the stuff;
 a bird, a rabbit, a wee man.

- 40 Mrs. Walker brought a persimmon to class and cut it up
 so everyone could taste
 a Chinese apple. Knowing it wasn't ripe or sweet, I didn't eat
 45 but watched the other faces.

My mother said every persimmon has a sun inside, something golden, glowing, warm as my face.

- Once, in the cellar, I found two wrapped in newspaper,
 50 forgotten and not yet ripe.
 I took them and set both on my bedroom windowsill, where each morning a cardinal sang, The sun, the sun.
 Finally understanding
 55 he was going blind, my father sat up all one night waiting for a song, a ghost.
 I gave him the persimmons,
 swelled, heavy as sadness,
 60 and sweet as love.

This year, in the muddy lighting of my parents' cellar, I rummage, looking for something I lost.

- My father sits on the tired, wooden stairs, 65 black cane between his knees,
 hand over hand, gripping the handle.

He's so happy that I've come home.
 I ask how his eyes are, a stupid question.
All gone, he answers.

- 70 Under some blankets, I find a box.
 Inside the box I find three scrolls.
 I sit beside him and untie
 three paintings by my father:
 Hibiscus leaf and a white flower.

- 75 Two cats preening.
Two persimmons, so full they want to drop from the cloth.

He raises both hands to touch the cloth, asks, Which is this?

This is persimmons, Father.
- 80 *Oh, the feel of the wolftail on the silk,
the strength, the tense
precision in the wrist.
I painted them hundreds of times eyes closed. These I painted blind.*
- 85 *Some things never leave a person:
scent of the hair of one you love,
the texture of persimmons,
in your palm, the ripe weight.*

ONE SITUATION AND SETTING, MULTIPLE POEMS

Careful attention to situation and setting can be helpful not only in understanding how any one poem works and means but also in appreciating the differences among poems. We can usefully compare any two or more poems that focus on a similar situation or setting. But some poems deliberately invite such comparison by revisiting precisely the same situation and setting depicted in other, earlier poems.

The following two poems, by Christopher Marlowe and Sir Walter Raleigh, respectively, provide a famous example of this sort of response. Like all pastoral poems, these are both set in a rural landscape and concerned with the simple life of country folk, usually (as here) shepherds, who live an outdoor life and tend to basic human needs. Yet Marlowe's is the more conventional of the two insofar as it presents that landscape and that life in stylized, idealized terms—as a simple, timeless world of beauty, music, and love that implicitly operates as a kind of counter to, and interlude from, the more urbane, adult, complicated, time-bound “real world.” Raleigh's poem is only one of many replies to Marlowe's, which itself indirectly alludes and responds to countless, even earlier works in the pastoral tradition.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove⁵
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

- 5 And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,

By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
10 And a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle⁶
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
15 Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
20 Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains⁷ shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

1600

- What, according to the speaker, are the specific virtues of the ideal world (or setting) and the life to which he invites his “love” (line 1)? How, by implication, might the poem characterize the (real) world he invites her to leave behind?

SIR WALTER RALEIGH

The Nymph’s Reply to the Shepherd

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd’s tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

5 Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage, and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel⁸ becometh dumb;
The rest complain of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
10 To wayward winter reckoning yields:
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy’s spring, but sorrow’s fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies
15 Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten;
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

6. Gown. 7. Youths. 8. The nightingale.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
 Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
 All these in me no means can move
 20 To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
 Had joys no date,⁹ nor age no need,
 Then these delights my mind might move
 To live with thee and be thy love.

1600

- Raleigh's poem works by presenting the same situation and setting Marlowe's does from a different speaker's perspective and having that speaker, in turn, present a sort of "if/then" scenario (If all this were true, then I would say yes): For what specific reasons is this nymph not going to accept her shepherd's offer? What's the effect of the poem's "if/then" structure?

THE OCCASIONAL POEM

Some subgenres or kinds of poetry are defined mostly, even wholly, by the way they handle situation or setting or by the specific sorts of situation and/or setting they depict, and these will be the major focus of the rest of this chapter. In fact, we've already discussed one: the pastoral poem, which by definition portrays an idyllic rural setting with certain conventional features.

Rather than depicting a particular kind of setting, an occasional poem is a poem written about or for a specific real, especially public and ceremonial, occasion. In the past, writing—and often publicly reading—poems in honor of royal birthdays and other state occasions or commemorating military victories and other major national events was considered an obligation of those serving as Poet Laureate. Since 1961, U.S. presidents have sometimes invited poets to recite at their inaugurations poems written for the occasion. (John F. Kennedy was the first to do so, with Robert Frost; Barack Obama was, to date, the last.) But not all poets have needed an invitation to write occasional poems, nor are all occasional poems celebratory: Though written while he was Poet Laureate, Alfred Tennyson's THE CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE commemorates an infamously disastrous battle. Occasional poems can even consider much more ordinary, even personal "occasions." Yet the occasional poem and its history are a healthy reminder that, while we often today think of all poems as addressing an individual reader and expressing exclusively personal feelings, a good deal of poetry written over the centuries has had a more public, civic focus and purpose, speaking about and to an entire community and its history.

The following, quite modern poem is a good example: an occasional poem that works to capture the significance of a recent public event by considering it in the historical perspective inspired by a very specific setting.

MARTÍN ESPADA

Litany at the Tomb of Frederick Douglass¹

Mount Hope Cemetery, Rochester, New York

November 7, 2008

This is the longitude and latitude of the impossible;
this is the epicenter of the unthinkable;
this is the crossroads of the unimaginable:
the tomb of Frederick Douglass, three days after the election.

- 5 This is a world spinning away from the gravity of centuries, where the grave of a fugitive slave has become an altar.
This is the tomb of a man born as chattel, who taught himself to read in secret, scraping the letters in his name with chalk on wood; now on the anvil-flat stone
a campaign button fills the O in Douglass. The button says: Obama.
10 This is the tomb of a man in chains, who left his fingerprints on the slavebreaker's throat so the whip would never carve his back again;
now a labor union T-shirt drapes itself across the stone, offered up by a nurse, a janitor, a bus driver. A sticker on the sleeve says: I Voted Today.

- This is the tomb of a man who rolled his call to arms off the press, 15 peering through spectacles at the abolitionist headline; now a newspaper spreads above his dates of birth and death. The headline says: Obama Wins.

- This is the stillness at the heart of the storm that began in the body of the first slave, dragged aboard the first ship to America. Yellow leaves descend in waves, and the newspaper flutters on the tomb, like the sails 20 Douglass saw in the bay, like the eyes of a slave closing to watch himself escape with the tide. Believers in spirits would see the pages trembling on the stone and say: look how the slave boy teaches himself to read.

I say a prayer, the first in years: that here we bury what we call the impossible, the unthinkable, the unimaginable, now and forever. Amen.

- Why, according to this poem, was the result of the 2008 presidential election meaningful? Why and how does the poem's particular setting make that occasion's significance especially apparent? In these terms, what details of setting matter most, and why?

1. Escaped slave (c. 1818–95) who was involved in the Underground Railroad and became a major spokesman for abolition, especially through his autobiography (1845) and his Rochester-based newspaper, the North Star.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

MARTÍN ESPADA (b. 1957)

From “Poetry Month: Martín Espada” (2011)*

While we all have our criticisms of President Obama, we must not forget the history he made in 2008, and the history we all made by voting for him and the feeling behind the making of that history. [. . .] Right after the election, I found myself in Rochester, New York. And it so happens that’s where Frederick Douglass is buried, and so this is the poem that came out of it.

First, it’s not an Obama poem; it’s a Frederick Douglass poem. Second, it’s a poem about the making of history; it’s about how we felt at the moment that history was made. [. . .] We can’t lose that feeling, even as we become frustrated or disillusioned. [. . .] We can’t lose the way we felt at that moment [. . .].

THE CARPE DIEM POEM

The following two poems from the 1600s represent similar situations: In each, a male speaker addresses a female auditor whom he desires. The poems belong to the tradition of carpe diem (Latin for “seize the day”) because the speaker is urging his auditor, his lover, to enjoy pleasures now, before they die. The woman is resisting because of her concern for chastity or social rules. The action of these poems is implied in the shifts in what the speaker is saying. What does the woman do in THE FLEA? Can you imagine the woman’s response in To His COY MISTRESS?

JOHN DONNE

The Flea

- Mark but this flea, and mark in this,²
 How little that which thou deny’st me is;
 It sucked me first, and now sucks thee,
 And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;
 5 Thou know’st that this cannot be said
 A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead.
 Yet this enjoys before it woo,
 And pampered³ swells with one blood made of two,
 And this, alas, is more than we would do.⁴

2. Medieval preachers and rhetoricians asked their hearers to “mark” (look at) an object that illustrated a moral or philosophical lesson they wished to emphasize.

3. Fed luxuriously.

4. According to seventeenth-century medical theory, conception involved the literal mingling of the lovers’ blood.

- 10 Oh stay,⁵ three lives in one flea spare,
 Where we almost, yea more than, married are.
 This flea is you and I, and this
 Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
 Though parents grudge, and you, we're met
 15 And cloistered in these living walls of jet.
 Though use⁶ make you apt to kill me,
 Let not to that, self-murder added be,
 And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

- Cruel and sudden, hast thou since 20 Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
 Wherein could this flea guilty be,
 Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
 Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
 Find'st not thyself, nor me, the weaker now;
 25 'Tis true; then learn how false fears be;
 Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
 Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

1633

- What lines help you imagine what the speaker is doing as he speaks? what the auditor does or says?

ANDREW MARVELL

To His Coy Mistress

- Had we but world enough, and time,
 This coyness,⁷ lady, were no crime.
 We would sit down, and think which way
 To walk, and pass our long love's day.
 5 Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
 Shouldst rubies⁸ find: I by the tide
 Of Humber would complain.⁹ I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
 And you should if you please refuse
 10 Till the conversion of the Jews.¹
 My vegetable love² should grow
 Vaster than empires, and more slow;
 An hundred years should go to praise
 Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
 15 Two hundred to adore each breast,
 But thirty thousand to the rest.

5. Desist. 6. Habit. 7. Hesitancy, modesty (not necessarily suggesting calculation).

8. Talismans believed to preserve virginity.

9. Write love complaints, conventional songs lamenting the cruelty of love. Humber: a river and estuary in Marvell's hometown of Hull, England.

1. Which, according to popular Christian belief, will occur just before the end of the world.

2. Which is capable only of passive growth, not of consciousness. The "vegetable soul" is lower than the other two divisions of the soul, "animal" and "rational."

- An age at least to every part,
 And the last age should show your heart.
 For, lady, you deserve this state;³
 20 Nor would I love at lower rate.
 But at my back I always hear Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near;
 And yonder all before us lie
 Deserts of vast eternity.
 25 Thy beauty shall no more be found,
 Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
 My echoing song; then worms shall try
 That long preserved virginity,
 And your quaint honor turn to dust,
 30 And into ashes all my lust:
 The grave's a fine and private place,
 But none, I think, do there embrace.
 Now therefore, while the youthful hue
 Sits on thy skin like morning dew,⁴
 35 And while thy willing soul transpires⁵
 At every pore with instant fires,
 Now let us sport us while we may,
 And now, like am'rous birds of prey,
 Rather at once our time devour
 40 Than languish in his slow-chapped⁶ pow'r.
 Let us roll all our strength and all
 Our sweetness up into one ball,
 And tear our pleasures with rough strife
 Thorough⁷ the iron gates of life.
 45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
 Stand still,⁸ yet we will make him run.⁹

1681

- How does each stanza develop the speaker's argument? Is it persuasive?

THE AUBADE

An aubade, broadly defined, is any poem set in and focusing on morning. (Aubade comes from the French term for “dawn”.) Although morning suggests fresh beginnings and hope, an aubade often expresses sadness because the new day means that two lovers must part—time has moved on. Indeed, aubade, narrowly defined, indicates a poem that deals with this specific situation—two lovers waking up to a dawn that spells an end to a night of joyous union. (The aubade thus shares with the carpe diem poem and even the sonnet, with which it is also historically linked, an interest in the relationship between love, sex, time, and mortality.)

3. Dignity. 4. The text reads “glew.” “Lew” (warmth) has also been suggested as an emendation.

5. Breathes forth.

6. Slow-jawed. Chronos (Time), ruler of the world in early Greek myth, devoured all of his children except Zeus, who was hidden. Later, Zeus seized power (see line 46 and note).

7. Through. 8. To lengthen his night of love with Alcmene, Zeus made the sun stand still.

9. Each sex act was believed to shorten life by one day.

Below you will find two aubades ripe for study and comparison: The first is among the best-known and most influential examples in the English-language tradition. As such, it helped to establish the conventions with which the second example plays by featuring an elderly speaker whose lover isn't an actual woman but "Life" itself. We can, in other words, fully appreciate this LATE AUBADE, its peculiar situation, its humor and poignancy, only if we know something about how earlier aubades work.

JOHN DONNE

The Sun Rising

Busy old fool, unruly sun,
 Why dost thou thus,
 Through windows, and through curtains, call on us?
 Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
 5 Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
 Late schoolboys, and sour prentices,¹
 Go tell court-huntsmen that the king will ride,
 Call country ants² to harvest offices;
 Love, all alike, no season knows, nor clime,
 10 Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.
 Thy beams, so reverend and strong why shouldst thou think?
 I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
 But that I would not lose her sight so long:
 15 If her eyes have not blinded thine,
 Look, and tomorrow late, tell me
 Whether both the Indias³ of spice and mine
 Be where thou left'st them, or lie here with me.
 Ask for those kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
 20 And thou shalt hear, all here in one bed lay.

 She is all states, and all princes I,
 Nothing else is.
 Princes do but play us; compared to this,
 All honor's mimic,⁴ all wealth alchemy.
 25 Thou, sun, art half as happy as we,
 In that the world's contracted thus;
 Thine age asks⁵ ease, and since thy duties be
 To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
 Shine here to us, and thou art every where;
 30 This bed thy center⁶ is, these walls thy sphere.

1633

- What cues in the poem alert you to the specific situation and setting? What is the speaker feeling? How does he communicate his feelings about his lover by addressing the sun rather than the lover? What is the speaker arguing in each stanza? How does one argument build on, or relate to, the last?

1. Apprentices. 2. Farmworkers. 3. The East and West Indies, commercial sources of spices and gold. 4. Mimicry. 5. Requires. 6. Of orbit.

JAMES RICHARDSON

Late Aubade

*after Hardy*⁷

So what do you think, Life, it seemed pretty good to me, though quiet, I guess, and unspectacular.
 It's been so long, I don't know any more how these things go.
 I don't know what it means that we've had this time together.

- 5 I get that the coffee, the sunlight on glassware, the Sunday paper and our studious lightness, not hearing the phone, are iconic of living regretless in the Now. A Cool that's beyond me:
 I'm having some trouble acting suitably poised and ironic.

- It's sensible to be calm, not to make too much of a little thing 10 and just see what happens, as I think you are saying with your amused look, sipping and letting me monologue, and young as you are, Life, you would know: you have done it all.

- If I get up a little reluctantly, tapping my wallet, keys, tickets,
 I'm giving you time to say Stay, it's a dream
 15 that you're old—no one notices—years never happened— but I see you have already given me all that you can.

- Those clear eyes are ancient; you've done this with billions of others, but you are my first life, Life. I feel helplessly young.
 I'm a kid checking mail, a kid on his cell with his questions:
 20 are we in love, Life, are we exclusive, are we forever?

2014

- In what various ways and senses is this a “late” aubade? Is “late aubade” an oxymoron? How might that relate to the speaker's characterization of himself and of Life? How do they each manage to be both young and old at the same time? How might the poem literalize the notion of being “in love” with life?

where men-size children loiter like shadows draped in outsize denim, jerseys, braids, and boots that mean I am no longer young;
 5 after I have made my way to the New Orleans Parish Jail down the block,
 where the black prison guard wearing the same weariness my prison guard father wears buzzes me in. I follow his pistol and shield along each corridor trying not to look at the black men boxed and bunked around me until I reach the tiny classroom
 10 where two dozen black boys are dressed in jumpsuits orange as the carp
 I saw in a pond once in Japan, so many fat, snaggletoothed fish ganged in and lurching for food that a lightweight tourist could have crossed the water on their backs so long as he had tiny rice balls or bread to drop into the mouths below his footsteps, which I'm thinking 15 is how Jesus must have walked on the lake that day, the crackers and crumbs falling from the folds of his robe, and how maybe it was the one fish so hungry it leaped up his sleeve that he later miraculously changed into a narrow loaf of bread, something that could stick to a believer's ribs, and don't get me wrong, I'm a believer too, in the power of food at least, 20 having seen a footbridge of carp packed gill to gill, packed tighter than a room of boy prisoners waiting to talk poetry with a young black poet, packed so close they'd have eaten each other had there been nothing else to eat.

Pilgrimage

*Vicksburg, Mississippi*⁹

Here, the Mississippi carved its mud-dark path, a graveyard

9. On July 4, 1863, the city surrendered to Union forces under Ulysses S. Grant after a forty-day siege; coming just a day after the Confederate defeat at Gettysburg, Vicksburg's surrender is regarded as a major turning point in the Civil War.

for skeletons of sunken riverboats.
 Here, the river changed its course,
 5 turning away from the city as one turns, forgetting, from the past—the abandoned bluffs, land sloping up above the river's bend—where now the Yazoo fills the Mississippi's empty bed.
 10 Here, the dead stand up in stone, white marble, on Confederate Avenue. I stand on ground once hollowed by a web of caves;
 they must have seemed like catacombs,
 in 1863, to the woman sitting in her parlor, 15 candlelit, underground. I can see her listening to shells explode, writing herself into history, asking what is to become of all the living things in this place?
 This whole city is a grave. Every spring—
 20 Pilgrimage—the living come to mingle with the dead, brush against their cold shoulders in the long hallways, listen all night to their silence and indifference, relive their dying on the green battlefield.
 25 At the museum, we marvel at their clothes—preserved under glass—so much smaller than our own, as if those who wore them were only children. We sleep in their beds, the old mansions hunkered on the bluffs, draped 30 in flowers—funereal—a blur of petals against the river's gray.
 The brochure in my room calls this living history. The brass plate on the door reads Prissy's¹ Room. A window frames
 35 the river's crawl toward the Gulf. In my dream, the ghost of history lies down beside me,
 rolls over, pins me beneath a heavy arm.

On Yom Kippur in 1967 . . .⁴

On Yom Kippur in 1967, the Year of Forgetting,⁵ I put on my dark holiday clothes and walked to the Old City of Jerusalem. For a long time I stood in front of an Arab's hole-in-the-wall shop, not far from the Damascus Gate,⁶ a shop with

 A rare light and many colors, like an open Ark.

I told him in my heart that my father too had a shop like this, with thread and buttons.
 10 I explained to him in my heart about all the decades and the causes and the events, why I am now here and my father's shop was burned there and he is buried here.⁷

5. In the so-called Six Day War of June 1967, Israel waged a highly successful campaign against Syria, Jordan, and Egypt, capturing the mainly Arab-occupied West Bank, along with the Sinai and Golan Heights. According to the translator, “the date 1967 (=5728) is expressed in Hebrew letters that also form the word for ‘forget.’”

 He too lowered the shutters and locked the gate

- Why does the speaker seem to receive the reception he does in the first Tu Do Street bar he enters? How does he compare the way white and black American soldiers and Vietnamese women interact in this situation and setting and in others—in Bogalusa, Louisiana (lines 11–14) or “in the boonies” and “the bush at Dak To / & Khe Sahn” (22–25, 36–39), for example? What does he seem to discover or conclude?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

From “Still Negotiating with the Images: An Interview with William Baer” (1998)*

[INTERVIEWER:] No poem shows the interrelatedness of human beings in war-time more effectively than “Tu Do Street” [. . .]. Th[e end of the poem offers] an amazing image of our connected humanity, but is the connection with “the underworld” just a harsh reminder of death that should stir us to behave with more kindness, or is it a pessimistic reflection of the human propensity to divide and destroy ourselves?

[KOMUNYAKAA:] It was one of those endings that, once I’d written down, just stopped where it was. There were many symbolic underworlds in Vietnam, the underground tunnel systems, some of the bars, and the whole psychic space of the GI—a kind of underworld populated by ghosts and indefinable images. It was a place of emotional and psychological flux where one was trying to make sense out of the world and one’s place in that world. And there was, relentlessly, a going back and forth between that internal space and external world. It was an effort to deal with oneself, and with the other GIs, the Vietnamese, and even the ghosts that we'd managed to create ourselves. So, for me, this is a very complex picture of the situation of the GI—going back and forth, condemned in a way to trek back and forth between those emotional demarcations while trying to make sense out of things. SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Matthew Arnold's DOVER BEACH and Natasha Trethewey's PILGRIMAGE are meditations on history and human destiny derived from the poets' close observation of particular places and times. Write an essay in which you examine one poem's descriptive language and the way it creates a suitable setting for the speaker's philosophical musings.
2. Write an essay either comparing the two carpe diem poems in this chapter or comparing one of these poems to Donne's THE SUN RISING. If you choose the former option, concentrate on how each poem differently handles the same basic situation: How does each speaker go about convincing his auditor to "seize the day"? If you choose the latter option, explore how Donne's aubade might work as a sort of sequel to the carpe diem poem: In what ways are the two poems alike, and what difference do their different situations make?
3. Martín Espada claims that his occasional poem is about Frederick Douglass rather than President Obama. Write an essay exploring whether and why that seems to be the case. Why, according to the poem, was the election of Obama both an especially good occasion for remembering Douglass and itself an occasion worth commemorating in a poem? What and whom exactly are commemorated here? Alternatively, compare Espada's poem to Natasha Trethewey's. What might each poem suggest about history and memory, time and place?
4. Wildly different as they and their handling of setting are, Etheridge Knight's HARD ROCK RETURNS TO PRISON FROM THE HOSPITAL FOR THE CRIMINAL INSANE and Terrence Hayes's CARP POEM both take place in a prison. Write an essay comparing the two poems' characterization of prison life and the role that descriptions of setting—both time and place—play in each poem. Or compare any other two poems in this book that depict similar settings and/or situations.
5. Choose any poem in this anthology in which you think setting is especially key to the poem's effect and meaning or in which you think the meaningfulness of setting depends on the associations of particular times and/or places. Write an essay explaining why and how so.
6. Write your own occasional poem about a recent event that you believe others in your community should see as having major significance. What community are you writing about and to? What exactly makes this event so meaningful? Alternatively, write a response—in verse or prose—to any poem in this chapter: Like Walter Raleigh's THE NYMPH'S REPLY TO THE SHEPHERD, your response should depict the same situation and setting as the original poem does, but viewed from another speaker's point of view and in his or her distinctive voice. How, for example, might the shepherd respond to the nymph's reply?

Homelands

AN ALBUM

One of the most ancient literary motifs is the quest or journey away from home. Sacred literature, including the Bible, tells of exile and a long period of suffering before arrival at or return to a homeland. Epics and romances may concern the hero's wanderings or adventures to reach or to defend a realm closely associated with his birth, inheritance, or fate. Since the 1500s, global exploration, colonialism, slavery, mass migration, and economic transformation have meant that many of the world's populations have experienced dislocation and deracination (loss of roots). Those who find themselves displaced try to remember where they came from; they may seek to honor their heritage or yearn for a sense of belonging.

The poems in this album were written at different times in different places and cultural contexts. Each speaker suggests some kind of double vision on the past and present, on a more modern or recent location and a former, perhaps ancestral home. What is the role of dislocation or altered identity in these poems? How do these poems represent the speaker's divided loyalties or distance from home? How do they indicate the passage of time, whether in history, over generations, or within one person's life?

Over the white seas
10 rime white and cold brigands ungentled icicle bold took her young daughters sold her strong sons
15 churched her with Jesus
bled her with guns.
Thus she has lain.

Now she is rising
remember her pain

- 20 remember the losses
 her screams loud and vain remember her riches
 her history slain
 now she is striding
 25 although she had lain.

- What is the effect of the way the phrases describing Africa's action—"had lain" (line 1), "is rising" (18), and so forth—repeat with variations throughout the poem?

MAYA ANGELOU (1928–2014)

From "Maya Angelou, The Art of Fiction No. 119" (1990)*

I never agreed, even as a young person, with the Thomas Wolfe title You Can't Go Home Again. Instinctively I didn't. But the truth is, you can never leave home. You take it with you; it's under your fingernails; it's in the hair follicles; it's in the way you smile; it's in the ride of your hips, in the passage of your breasts; it's all there, no matter where you go. You can take on the affectations and the postures of other places and even learn to speak their ways. But the truth is, home is between your teeth. Everybody's always looking for it: Jews go to Israel; black Americans and Africans in the Diaspora go to Africa; Europeans, Anglo-Saxons go to England and Ireland; people of Germanic background go to Germany. It's a very queer quest. We can kid ourselves; we can tell ourselves, Oh yes, honey, I live in Tel Aviv, actually. . . . The truth is a stubborn fact.

A Far Cry from Africa

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt
 Of Africa. Kikuyu,¹ quick as flies,
 Batten upon the bloodstreams of the veldt.²
 Corpses are scattered through a paradise.

1. East African tribe whose members, as Mau Mau fighters, conducted an eight-year insurrection against British colonists in Kenya.

2. Open plains, neither cultivated nor thickly forested (Afrikaans).

- 5 Only the worm, colonel of carrion, cries:
 "Waste no compassion on these separate dead!"
 Statistics justify and scholars seize
 The salients of colonial policy.
 What is that to the white child hacked in bed?
- 10 To savages, expendable as Jews?
 Threshed out by beaters,³ the long rushes break
 In a white dust of ibises whose cries
 Have wheeled since civilization's dawn
 From the parched river or beast-teeming plain.
- 15 The violence of beast on beast is read
 As natural law, but upright man
 Seeks his divinity by inflicting pain.
 Delirious as these worried beasts, his wars
 Dance to the tightened carcass of a drum,
- 20 While he calls courage still that native dread
 Of the white peace contracted by the dead.
 Again brutish necessity wipes its hands
 Upon the napkin of a dirty cause, again
 A waste of our compassion, as with Spain,⁴
- 25 The gorilla wrestles with the superman.
 I who am poisoned with the blood of both,
 Where shall I turn, divided to the vein?
 I who have cursed
 The drunken officer of British rule, how choose
- 30 Between this Africa and the English tongue I love?
 Betray them both, or give back what they give?
 How can I face such slaughter and be cool?
 How can I turn from Africa and live?

1962

- How does the speaker express his divided loyalties in the questions that conclude the poem? What various meanings might the poem's title accrue by the end?

3. In big-game hunting, natives are hired to beat the brush, driving birds—such as ibises—and other animals into the open.

4. Spanish Civil War (1936–39), in which Republican loyalists supported politically by liberals in the West and militarily by Soviet Communists fought Nationalist rebels aided by Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

DEREK WALCOTT (1930–2017)

From “An Interview with Derek Walcott” (1979)

[QUESTION:] Do you want to talk about the Caribbean writer’s special relationship to Africa?

[ANSWER: . . .] I have been British; I have been a citizen of the Caribbean federation; now I’m supposed to be either a Trinidadian or a St. Lucian but with a British passport. I find that I am able to make a living in America (and I owe America a great deal for its recognition and the fact that I can work here); and there is the same danger, the same seduction in saying I really am African and should be in Africa, or that my whole experience is African. This can be simply another longing, even a slave longing, for another master. There is no West Indian who is black, or even one who is not black, who is not aware of the existence of Africa in all of us. [. . .] The fact is that every West Indian has been severed from a continent, whether he be Indian, Chinese, Portuguese, or black. To have the population induced into a mass nostalgia to be somewhere else seemed to me about as ennobling as wishing that the whole population was in Brooklyn, or Brickston. [. . .] It would be equally abhorrent to me to say “I wish we were English again” as to say “I wish we were African again.” The reality is that one has to build in the West Indies. But that is not to say one doesn’t know who one is: our music, our speech—all the things that are organic in the way we live—are African.

I [. . .] felt that it was a privilege to grow up as an English colonial child [in the West Indies] because politically and culturally the British heritage was supposed to be mine. It was no problem for me to feel that since I was writing in English, I was in tune with the growth of the language. I was the contemporary of anyone writing in English anywhere in the world. What is more important, however—and I’m still working on this—was to find a voice that was not inflected by influences. One didn’t develop an English accent in speech; one kept as close as possible to an inflection that was West Indian. The aim was that a West Indian or an Englishman could read a single poem, each with his own accent, without either one feeling that it was written in dialect.

CATHY SONG

Heaven

- He thinks when we die we'll go to China.
 Think of it—a Chinese heaven
 where, except for his blond hair,
 the part that belongs to his father,
 5 everyone will look like him.
 China, that blue flower on the map,
 bluer than the sea
 his hand must span like a bridge to reach it.
 10 An octave away.
- I've never seen it.
 It's as if I can't sing that far.
 But look—
 on the map, this black dot.
- 15 Here is where we live,
 on the pancake plains
 just east of the Rockies,
 on the other side of the clouds.
 A mile above the sea,
 20 the air is so thin, you can starve on it.
 No bamboo trees
 but the alpine equivalent,
 reedy aspen with light, fluttering leaves.
 Did a boy in Guangzhou¹ dream of this 25 as his last stop?
 I've heard the trains at night
 whistling past our yards,
 what we've come to own,
 the broken fences, the whiny dog, the rattletrap cars.
- 30 It's still the wild west,
 mean and grubby,
 the shootouts and fistfights in the back alley.
 With my son the dreamer and my daughter, who is too young to walk,
- 35 I've sat in this spot
 and wondered why here?
 Why in this short life,
 this town, this creek they call a river?
- He had never planned to stay,
 40 the boy who helped to build

1. Usually called Canton, a seaport city in southeastern China.

the railroads for a dollar a day.
 He had always meant to go back.
 When did he finally know that each mile of track led him further away, 45 that he would die in his sleep,
 dispossessed,
 having seen Gold Mountain,
 the icy wind tunneling through it,
 these landlocked, makeshift ghost towns?
 50 It must be in the blood,
 this notion of returning.
 It skipped two generations, lay fallow,
 the garden an unmarked grave.
 On a spring sweater day
 55 it's as if we remember him.
 I call to the children.
 We can see the mountains shimmering blue above the air.
 If you look really hard 60 says my son the dreamer, leaning out from the laundry's rigging,
 the work shirts fluttering like sails,
 you can see all the way to heaven.

1988

- Who is "He" in this poem's first line? What family history is recounted in the poem? How does the poem make use of contrast?

AGHA SHAHID ALI Postcard from Kashmir

Kashmir shrinks into my mailbox, my home a neat four by six inches.

I always loved neatness. Now I hold the half-inch Himalayas in my hand.

5 This is home. And this the closest I'll ever be to home. When I return, the colors won't be so brilliant,
 the Jhelum's² waters so clean,
 so ultramarine. My love
 10 so overexposed.
 And my memory will be a little out of focus, in it

- What words characterize the speaker's dreams of home in this poem? What words reveal a more realistic attitude?

ADRIENNE SU

Escape from the Old Country

I never had to make one,
no sickening weeks by ocean,
no waiting for the aerogrammes³ that gradually ceased to come.

- 5 Spent the babysitting money on novels, shoes, and movies,
yet the neighborhood stayed empty.
It had nothing to do with a journey not undertaken, nor with dialect, 10 nor with a land that waited to be rediscovered, then rejected.
As acid rain collected above the suburban hills, I tried to imagine being nothing, tried

- 15 to be able to claim, "I have no culture," and be believed.

Yet the land occupies the person even as the semblance of freedom invites a kind of recklessness.

- 20 Tradition, unobserved, unasked, hangs on tight; ancestors roam into reverie, interfering at the most awkward moments, first flirtations, in doorways and dressing rooms—

- 25 But of course. Here in America, no one escapes. In the end, each traveler returns to the town where, everyone knew, she hadn't even been born.

2006

3. Airmail letters, especially those on specially designed stationery.

- To what does “one” refer, in line one? In the context of the rest of the poem, what are the various possible meanings of the sentence “Here in America, / no one escapes” (lines 25–26)?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write a response paper or essay exploring how Africa and the speaker’s relationship to it are characterized in at least one or two poems in this album.
2. Multiple poems in this album explore the way we tend to idealize the place we or our forebears have left. Write an essay comparing what at least two poems suggest about how and why we do so. Which, if any, poems seem to see such idealization as a problem? Why and how so?
3. Look closely at the three stanzas of A FAR CRY FROM AFRICA by Derek Walcott. Be sure to note any changes—rhyme patterns or meter, subject matter or attitude—across the three stanzas. Where does the speaker clarify who he is and where his loyalties lie? Why is the last part of the poem a series of questions? Write an essay in which you interpret the form and theme of the poem as itself a kind of “far cry from Africa,” in every sense: far from that homeland, part of a non-African tradition, “crying” for connection.
4. In the interview excerpted earlier in this chapter, Maya Angelou claims that “the truth is, you can never leave home. You take it with you [. . .].” Write an essay in which you use Angelou’s arguments to analyze Adrienne Su’s ESCAPE FROM THE OLD COUNTRY. According to Angelou, how and why exactly do we always take our ancestral “home” with us? Does the speaker or implied author of Su’s poem seem to agree with Angelou? How and why so, or not?
5. Imagine receiving in your mailbox a postcard from the place where you or your parents were born. (Alternatively, imagine receiving digital pictures or messages in other formats.) Write a poem or a short prose description in which you express a response similar to the speaker’s in Agha Shahid Ali’s POSTCARD FROM KASHMIR: How would the place be changed if you could visit, and how would it differ from the way you or your family think about it now?

14 | THEME AND TONE

Poetry is full of surprises. Poems express anger or outrage just as effectively as love or sadness, and good poems can be written about going to a rock concert or having lunch or mowing the lawn, as well as about making love or smelling flowers. Even poems on “predictable” subjects can surprise us with unpredicted attitudes or sudden twists. Knowing that a poem is about some particular subject or topic—love, for example, or death—may give us a general idea of what to expect, but it never tells us exactly what we will find in a particular poem. Labeling a poem a “love poem” or a “death poem” is a convenient way to speak of its topic. But poems that may be loosely called “love poems” or “death poems” may have little else in common, may express utterly different attitudes or ideas, and may concentrate on very different aspects of the subject. Letting a poem speak to us means more than merely figuring out its topic; it means listening to how the poem says what it says. What a poem says about its topic is its theme. How a poem makes that statement involves its tone—the poem’s attitude or feelings toward its topic. No two poems on the same subject affect us in exactly the same way; their themes and tones vary, and even similar themes may be expressed in various ways, creating different tones and effects.

THE TONE

Tone, a term borrowed from acoustics and music, refers to the qualities of the language a speaker uses in social situations or in a poem, and it also refers to a speaker’s intended effect. Tone is closely related to style and diction; it is an effect of the speaker’s expressions, as if showing a real person’s feelings, manner, and attitude or relationship to a listener and to the particular subject or situation. Thus, the speaker may use angry or mocking words, may address the listener intimately or distantly, may sincerely confess or coolly observe, may paint a grand picture or narrate a legend.

The following poem describes a romantic encounter of sorts, but its tone may surprise you. As you read the poem, work first to identify its speaker, situation, and setting. Then try both to capture its tone in a single word or two and to figure out which features of the poem most help to create that tone.

Leaving the Motel

Outside, the last kids holler
 Near the pool: they'll stay the night.
 Pick up the towels; fold your collar
 Out of sight.

- 5 Check: is the second bed
 Unrumped, as agreed?
 Landlords have to think ahead
 In case of need,
 Too. Keep things straight: don't take 10 The matches, the wrong keyrings—
 We've nowhere we could keep a keepsake—
 Ashtrays, combs, things
 That sooner or later others
 Would accidentally find.
 15 Check: take nothing of one another's
 And leave behind
 Your license number only,
 Which they won't care to trace;
 We've paid. Still, should such things get lonely,
 20 Leave in their vase
 An aspirin to preserve
 Our lilacs, the wayside flowers
 We've gathered and must leave to serve
 A few more hours;
 25 That's all. We can't tell when
 We'll come back, can't press claims,
 We would no doubt have other rooms then,
 Or other names.

The title and details of LEAVING THE MOTEL indicate the situation and setting: Two secret lovers are at the end of an afternoon sexual encounter in a motel room (perhaps one is speaking for both of them), reminding themselves not to leave or take with them any clues for "others" (line 13)—their spouses?—to find.

Whereas many poems on the topic of love confirm an enduring attachment or express desire or suggest erotic experience, this poem focuses on the effort to erase a stolen encounter. The two lovers have no names; indeed, they have registered under false ones. They have already paid for this temporary shelter, can't stay the night like other guests or build a home with children of their own, and are running through a checklist of their agreements and duties ("Check," "Keep things straight," "Check" [5, 9, 15]). Other than the "wayside" lilacs (22), the objects mentioned are trivial, from matches and keyrings to license numbers. The matter-of-fact but hurried tone suggests that they wish to hide any deep feelings (hinted at in the last two stanzas in the wish to make “claims” or preserve flowers [26]). The failure to express love—or guilt—enhances the effect when the tone shifts, at the word “still” (19), to the second thoughts about leaving something behind. The poem’s short rhyming lines, sounding brisk and somewhat impersonal, contrast with the situation and add to the tone of subdued regret that nothing lasts.

THEME

Our response to the tone of a poem, however it surprises or jars or stirs us, guides us to understand its theme (or themes): what the poem expresses about its topic. A theme is not simply a work’s subject or topic; it is a statement about that topic. Although we can usually agree on a poem’s topic without much difficulty, it is harder to determine how to state a poem’s theme. A single theme may be expressed in several different ways, and a single poem may also have more than one theme. Sometimes the poet explicitly states a poem’s theme, and such a statement may clarify why the author chose a particular mode of presentation and how the poem fits into the author’s own patterns of thinking and growing. However, the author’s words may give a misleading view of how most people read the poem, just as a person’s self-assessment may not be all we need in order to understand his or her character. Further study of the poem is necessary to understand how it fulfills—or fails to fulfill—the author’s intentions. Despite the difficulty of identifying and expressing themes, doing so is an important step in understanding and writing about poetry.

Topic Versus Tone and Theme: A Comparative Exercise

Reading two or more poems with similar topics side by side may suggest how each is distinctive in what it has to say and how it does so—its theme and tone. The following two poems are about animals, although both of them place their final emphasis on human beings: The animal in each case is only the means to the end of exploring human nature. The poems share the assumption that animal behavior may appear to reflect human habits and conduct and that it may reveal much about us; in each case the character central to the poem is revealed to be surprisingly unlike the way she thinks of herself. But the poems differ in their tones, in the specific relationship between the woman and the animals, and in their themes.

How would you describe the tone of the following poem? its topic and theme?

MAXINE KUMIN Woodchucks

Gassing the woodchucks didn’t turn out right.
The knockout bomb from the Feed and Grain Exchange was featured as merciful, quick at the bone and the case we had against them was airtight,

- 5 both exits shoehorned shut with puddingstone,¹ but they had a sub-sub-basement out of range.
- Next morning they turned up again, no worse for the cyanide than we for our cigarettes and state-store Scotch, all of us up to scratch.
- 10 They brought down the marigolds as a matter of course and then took over the vegetable patch nipping the broccoli shoots, beheading the carrots.
- The food from our mouths, I said, righteously thrilling to the feel of the .22, the bullets' neat noses.
- 15 I, a lapsed pacifist fallen from grace puffed with Darwinian pieties for killing,
now drew a bead on the littlest woodchuck's face.
He died down in the everbearing roses.
- Ten minutes later I dropped the mother. She 20 flipfopped in the air and fell, her needle teeth still hooked in a leaf of early Swiss chard.
- Another baby next. O one-two-three the murderer inside me rose up hard,
the hawkeye killer came on stage forthwith.
- 25 There's one chuck left. Old wily fellow, he keeps me cocked and ready day after day after day.
All night I hunt his humped-up form. I dream
I sight along the barrel in my sleep.
If only they'd all consented to die unseen
- 30 gassed underground the quiet Nazi way.

1972

As you read WOODCHUCKS aloud, how does your tone of voice change from beginning to end? What tone do you use to read the ending? How does the hunter feel about her increasing attraction to violence? Why does the poem begin by calling the gassing of the woodchucks "merciful" (line 3) and end by describing it as "the quiet Nazi way" (30)? What names does the hunter call herself? How does the name-calling affect your feelings about her? Exactly when does the hunter begin to enjoy the feel of the gun and the idea of killing? How does the poet make that clear? What, ultimately, might the poem as a whole say or show us about ourselves—especially, perhaps, our relation to animals? to violence?

ADRIENNE RICH

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers

Aunt Jennifer's tigers prance across a screen,
Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.

1. Mixture of cement, pebbles, and gravel.

They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.

- 5 Aunt Jennifer's fingers fluttering through her wool
Find even the ivory needle hard to pull.
The massive weight of Uncle's wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer's hand.

- When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
10 Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
The tigers in the panel that she made
Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

1951

In this poem, why are tigers a particularly appropriate animal? What words describing the tigers seem especially significant? Why are Aunt Jennifer's hands described as "terrified" (line 9)? What clues does the poem give about why Aunt Jennifer is so afraid? How does the poem make you feel about Aunt Jennifer's life and death? How would you describe the tone of the poem? Why does the poem begin and end with the tigers? Might the poem's theme be a universal one (about all or most people)? Or is the theme more specific (about, say, women versus men or about married people)?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

From "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision" (1971)*

In writing this poem, composed and apparently cool as it is, I thought I was creating a portrait of an imaginary woman. But this woman suffers from the opposition of her imagination, worked out in tapestry, and her lifestyle, "ringed with ordeals she was mastered by." It was important to me that Aunt Jennifer was a person as distinct from myself as possible—distanced by the formalism of the poem, by its objective, observant tone—even by putting the woman in a different generation.

*"When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision." Women's Forum of the MLA, Dec. 1971, Chicago. Address.

THEME AND CONFLICT

Since a theme is an idea implied by all of the elements of the poem working together, identifying theme—as opposed to topic and tone—can sometimes be a tough and tricky business. In reading and writing about poetry, then, it often helps to focus first—and most—on conflict. Though we usually think of conflict as an aspect of plot, even perfectly plotless poems are almost always organized around and devoted to exploring conflicts and tensions. To begin to identify these, look for contrasts and think about the conflict they imply.

Take, for example, AUNT JENNIFER'S TIGERS. Though it might be hard to say at first just what the theme of Rich's poem might be, it's hard to miss the contrast at its center. Where the tigers Aunt Jennifer embroiders "prance" and "pace" freely, "proud and unafraid," through a world as colorful and as lasting as they are (lines 1, 4, 12), Aunt Jennifer and her world seem just the opposite: Nothing but her fingers and hands move in the poem, and even they are "terrified" and tentative, "fluttering through her wool," "weight[ed]" down by a heavy "wedding band" in life and stilled permanently by death (9, 5, 7). We have, then, not just a contrast but a multifaceted conflict—between imaginary and real worlds, between individual vision and social obligation. What the poem concludes about this conflict is its theme, but starting with questions about conflict often provides not only an easier way into the poem but also a much richer, more textured experience and understanding of it. And very good essays can be written about a poem or poems' conflicts.

The following poem is all about this issue—the role of conflict in poetry. As you read the poem, try to identify the contrasts it sets up, the underlying conflict those contrasts point to, and the theme that ultimately emerges. Then test your own interpretation of the poem against the author's comments about how the poem came to be and what, for her, it's all about.

On Writing

A love poem risks becoming a ruin, public, irretrievable, a form of tattooing,

while loss, being permanent,
can sustain a thousand documents.

- 5 Loss predominates in history, smorgasbord of death, betrayal, heresy,
crime, contagion, deployment, divorce.
A writer could remain aboard

- the ship of grief and thrive, never 10 approaching the shores of rapture.

What can be said about elation that the elated, seeking consolation from their joy, will go to books for?
It's wiser and quicker to look for

- 15 a poem in the dentist's chair than in the luxury suite where eternal love, declared, turns out to be eternal. Who cares about a stranger's bliss? Thus the juncture 20 where I'm stalled, unaccustomed to integrity, despite your presence, our tranquility, and every confidence.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ADRIENNE SU (b. 1967)

From The Best American Poetry 2013 (2013)*

When I started assembling my newest manuscript, The House Unburned, I found it to be suffering from structural gaps and an excess of grief and regret. [. . .]

To round it out, I needed to come up with some poems of happiness, or at least the absence of unhappiness. This presented a problem, since, as I'm always telling students, successful poems are born of uncertainty, interior conflict, the modes of struggle that lack clear solutions. I went back and forth between two selves: the editor, whose vision for the collection required some happier poems, and the poet, who raged against the affront of an assignment so lacking in ambiguity. How, argued the poet, can happiness, gratification, or success be complex enough to give life to a poem?

Eventually, the answer came with a shift in setting. If the poem could be about writing, conflict would be inherent in the question. So I gave myself permission to write about writing. Now that I had a conflict, the road to the poem appeared. (198)

Sympathy

I know what the caged bird feels, alas!
 When the sun is bright on the upland slopes;
 When the wind stirs soft through the springing grass,
 And the river flows like a stream of glass;
 5 When the first bird sings and the first bud opens,
 And the faint perfume from its chalice steals—
 I know what the caged bird feels!

I know why the caged bird beats his wing
 Till its blood is red on the cruel bars;

- 10 For he must fly back to his perch and cling
 When he fain² would be on the bough a-swing;
 And a pain still throbs in the old, old scars
 And they pulse again with a keener sting—
 I know why he beats his wing!
- 15 I know why the caged bird sings, ah me,
 When his wing is bruised and his bosom sore,—
 When he beats his bars and he would be free;
 It is not a carol of joy or glee,
 But a prayer that he sends from his heart's deep core,
 20 But a plea, that upward to Heaven he flings—
 I know why the caged bird sings!

Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone

- Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone,
 Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone,
 Silence the pianos and with muffled drum
 Bring out the coffin, let the mourners come.
- 5 Let aeroplanes circle moaning overhead
 Scribbling on the sky the message He Is Dead,
 Put crêpe bows round the white necks of the public doves,
 Let the traffic policemen wear black cotton gloves.
- He was my North, my South, my East and West,
 10 My working week and my Sunday rest,
 My noon, my midnight, my talk, my song;
 I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong.
- The stars are not wanted now: put out every one;
 Pack up the moon and dismantle the sun;
 15 Pour away the ocean and sweep up the wood;
 For nothing now can ever come to any good.

Repulsive Theory

Little has been made of the soft, skirting action
 of magnets reversed,
 while much has been
 5 made of attraction.
 But is it not this pillowy principle of repulsion that produces the
 doily edges of oceans
 10 or the arabesques of thought?
 And do these cutout coasts and incurved rhetorical beaches not baffle the onslaught of the sea or objectionable people 15 and give private life what small protection it's got?
 Praise then the oiled motions of avoidance, the pearly convolutions of all that 20 slides off or takes a wide berth; praise every eddying vacancy of Earth,
 all the dimpled depths of pooling space, the whole 25 swirl set up by fending-off—extending far beyond the personal,
 I'm convinced—immense and good
 in a cosmological sense:
 30 unpressing us against each other, lending the necessary never to never-ending.

Still I Rise

You may write me down in history
 With your bitter, twisted lies,
 You may trod me in the very dirt
 But still, like dust, I'll rise.

- 5 Does my sassiness upset you?
 Why are you beset with gloom?
 'Cause I walk like I've got oil wells
 Pumping in my living room.
 Just like moons and like suns,
 10 With the certainty of tides,
 Just like hopes springing high,
 Still I'll rise.
 Did you want to see me broken?
 Bowed head and lowered eyes?
 15 Shoulders falling down like teardrops,
 Weakened by my soulful cries.
 Does my haughtiness offend you?
 Don't you take it awful hard
 'Cause I laugh like I've got gold mines
 20 Diggin' in my own back yard.
 You may shoot me with your words,
 You may cut me with your eyes,
 You may kill me with your hatefulness,
 But still, like air, I'll rise.
 25 Does my sexiness upset you?
 Does it come as a surprise
 That I dance like I've got diamonds
 At the meeting of my thighs?
 Out of the huts of history's shame
 30 I rise
 Up from a past that's rooted in pain
 I rise
 I'm a black ocean, leaping and wide,
 Welling and swelling I bear in the tide.
 35 Leaving behind nights of terror and fear
 I rise
 Into a daybreak that's wondrously clear
 I rise
 Bringing the gifts that my ancestors gave,
 40 I am the dream and the hope of the slave.
 I rise
 I rise
 I rise.

- Who seems to be the “you” addressed in the poem? How would you describe the poem's tone, and which features of the poem seem most key to determining the tone? What's the effect, for example, of the use of questions? Does the tone remain consistent or change over the course of the poem?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose any two poems in this chapter that express positive and negative feelings about their topics. How do the tones of the poems combine or contrast the feelings? Is there a shift in tone in each poem? If so, where? How is the shift revealed through language? Write an essay in which you compare the way each poet accomplishes this shifting of tone.
2. Write an essay in which you consider the use of language to create tone in any two or more poems on the same subject. How do the tones suit the themes of these poems?
3. Write an essay on Maxine Kumin's WOODCHUCKS in which you show that the speaker's conflict between sympathy and murderous instinct is reflected in the mixed tone and varied vocabulary. Focus on formal and informal diction, noting phrases from law or religion—"the case we had against them"; "fallen from grace" (4, 15)—or from everyday speech—"up to scratch," "food from our mouths" (9, 13). How does the diction, or word choice, of the poem affect its tone?
4. Reimagine W. D. Snodgrass's LEAVING THE MOTEL as a poem in which the speaker and lover are happy and delighted with each other and certain that the relationship will last forever. What details and phrases would need to be changed for the poem to express a positive feeling about the relationship? Write an essay in which you relate the tone of the poem to the subject of secret and short-lived sexual relationships.

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

In the response paper below, Stephen Bordland works through W. H. Auden's STOP ALL THE CLOCKS, CUT OFF THE TELEPHONE more or less line by line, writing down whatever ideas come to him—a technique sometimes called exposition. The form of this paper is less important than the process of thinking carefully about the poem's music, emotions, and meanings. As you can see, by the time Stephen reaches the end of his response, he has decided on a topic for the more formal essay that he will write later.

Response Paper on Auden's "Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone"

I first heard this poem read aloud when I saw the movie Four Weddings and a Funeral on cable. The character who read the poem was reading it at the funeral of his lover. It was perfectly suited to the story and was very moving. I was struck by the actor's reading because the poem seemed to have a steady rhythm for several lines and then suddenly hit what sounded like a dead end—"I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong" (line 12). Hearing the actor's reading of this poem made me want to read it myself, to see if the poem would still affect me if I read/heard it outside of the context of an emotional scene in a movie. It did, and I think that the "I was wrong" line is the key—a turning point, I guess.

In the anthology, the poem seems to have no actual title, but I did some searching on the Internet and found that this poem was once called "Funeral Blues." If I were reading the poem for the first time under that title, I would at least know that the poem has something to do with death right from the start. But this title makes the poem sound irreverent rather than sincerely painful. I wonder if that would have been true in the 1930s, when Auden wrote the poem. There were lots of blues and jazz songs of that era whose titles ended in "Blues" (like Robert Johnson's "Kind Hearted Woman Blues"), so maybe the title wasn't meant to be read the way that I'm reading it. Anyway, I don't know if Auden himself changed the title, or if there's another story there, but I think it's a better poem without the title.

The poem starts with a request to an unknown person (everyone?) to make some common aspects of daily life go away: "Stop all the clocks" (1) presumably because time seems to be standing still; "cut off the telephone" (1) presumably because the speaker wants to be alone and undisturbed, cut off from human contact. I'm not sure what's implied by "Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone" (2) mainly because I'm confused about the literal meaning: Are we supposed to prevent the dog from barking by giving him a juicy bone (one way to interpret "with a juicy bone"), or are we supposed to prevent the dog with a juicy bone in his mouth (another way of interpreting "with a juicy bone") from barking at all? I don't think I really have a handle on what this line means in relation to the other ones, but I'll leave it for now. In the next line, "Silence the pianos" clearly means that the speaker wants no music now that his lover is dead, except for the "muffled drum" (3) that will accompany the coffin and mourners in the fourth line. It's interesting that all of these things so far are sounds—the tick-tock of the clock, the ring of the telephone, a barking dog, music. They all seem to stand in for something, too—for the passing of time, contact with other people (and with pets?), joy as expressed by music.

The image of "aeroplanes" (5) circling overhead (and "moaning" [5]—that's a really good choice of words) writing "He Is Dead" (6) is very strong and would have been a very modern reference at the time of this poem (c. 1936). A Christian Science Monitor article about a "skywriting" pilot says that "[s]kywriting's heyday was from the 1930s to the early 1950s when Pepsi Cola used skywriting as its main way of advertising" (Hartill), so the reference here is to a commercial medium being used to make as many people as possible aware of the speaker's loss. If a poet tried to make a reference to something equivalent today, it would have to be a television advertisement or a blog, maybe. I wonder if a modern poet could really pull off a reference to a TV ad and still make it sound sincerely sad.

I'm not sure what the "crêpe bows round the white necks of the public doves" (7) means. Would the bows even be visible? Does "crêpe" imply a color, or is it just a type of fabric? And what is a public dove? I'm not sure I like the repetition in this line of three adjective/noun pairs: "crepe bows," "white necks," "public doves." It seems too precious or "poetic." The "traffic policemen" (8) that I've seen all wear white gloves so that their hand movements can be seen clearly. The speaker wants them all to wear "black cotton gloves," the appropriate color for mourning, but that would probably create real problems for the drivers trying to see what the policemen are directing them to do. So, I wonder if the bows on doves and black gloves on cops are both there to show us that the speaker is feeling not just the sort of grief that moves him to write poetry, but also the sort of intense pain that makes him want to throw the rest of the world into the same confusion and chaos he's experiencing. Or at least, he's not only asking to be alone, but also wanting the rest of the world to share his grief.

In the next four lines, the speaker turns to himself and his lover: "He was my North, my South, my East and West / My working week and my Sunday rest" (9-10). These lines flow so smoothly, with a soothing, regular rhythm; they're almost singsongy. But they don't seem sappy or wrong in this poem; they seem painfully sincere. The author uses place (as described by the compass) and time (the whole week, the reference to noon and midnight) to make very clear, in case we hadn't figured it out from the preceding lines, that his lover was everything to him. In the fourth line of this section, this regular rhythm is interrupted, or even stopped dead: "I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong" (12). This is a very true and moving conclusion to reach, but it also seems ironic, once we read to the end of the poem. If the speaker was wrong to believe (before the death of his lover) that love would last forever, isn't it possible that he's wrong about the conclusion "nothing now can ever come to any good" (16)—that grief will last forever?

I think that Auden probably intended us to be aware of this irony. It seems to me that the poem is broken into three major parts. First, we sympathize with the speaker's grief and sense of loss. Then we're supposed to stop at the point where the speaker makes a judgment about his understanding of the world prior to that loss ("I thought that love would last for ever: I was wrong" [12]) and to spend a moment absorbing the meaning of that judgment. Finally, as we read the most extreme expression of the speaker's loss ("Pack up the moon and dismantle the sun" [14]), we can see that although we sympathize and understand, we also know something that the speaker doesn't know at the moment. Just as his love apparently blinded the speaker to love's inevitable end, so his profound grief is probably blinding him to grief's inevitable end. Also, it may just be me, but it seems that this last part is almost too dramatic or theatrical, as if maybe the speaker has made some sort of transition from being unself-consciously mournful to being self-consciously aware that the way he's expressing himself is poetic.

Back to the idea about the irony: The poem itself seems to be arguing against the notion that love cannot last forever (or, okay, a very long time). After all, people are still reading this poem, and I bet people will continue to read it for as long as people read poetry. That's about as close to forever as we get on this earth, so even though the lovers of this poem are long dead, their love lives on, in a way. Auden must have been aware of this when he was writing the poem. I wonder if he ever said anything in letters, essays, or speeches about art and immortality? If so, I think I'll write a paper on that topic as addressed in this poem.

Family

AN ALBUM

Families are the groundwork of society, and most people's earliest memories involve family members. Families may be nuclear or extended, biological or adoptive, emotionally demonstrative or distant. Families may pass down traditions that younger generations may choose to abandon, embrace, or simply tolerate. Adults who have left home may dwell on memories, good or bad, of their mothers, fathers, brothers, or sisters. Each renewed contact with family can spark conflicting thoughts and feelings. Hope, disappointment, or grief for one's child can find expression as a concentrated moment in a poem. A spouse or a child can remind the speaker of the passage of time and mortality.

Because the family is such a basic unit of social interaction, many poems explore family relations. The following poems are all, in different ways, about family. What do these poems have in common? How do they differ? Which best capture your feelings and ideas about family relationships? Can you find two poems that express the same theme—in other words, can you accurately state their themes in the same way? How do any two poems compare in tone? Which poems have surprising shifts in tone? Do any poems express surprising or disturbing attitudes toward loved ones?

SIMON J. ORTIZ

My Father's Song

Wanting to say things,
I miss my father tonight.
His voice, the slight catch,
the depth from his thin chest,
5 the tremble of emotion in something he has just said
to his son, his song:

We planted corn one Spring at Acu¹—
we planted several times
10 but this one particular time
I remember the soft damp sand in my hand.

My father had stopped at one point to show me an overturned furrow;
15 the plowshare had unearthed the burrow nest of a mouse in the soft moist sand.

1. Alternative name for Acoma village and/or pueblo, about sixty miles west of Albuquerque, New Mexico. Sometimes translated as "the place that always was," Acu is the oldest continuously inhabited community in the United States.

Very gently, he scooped tiny pink animals into the palm of his hand
 20 and told me to touch them.
 We took them to the edge of the field and put them in the shade of a sand moist clod.

I remember the very softness
 25 of cool and warm sand and tiny alive mice and my father saying things.

1976

- What are the “things” that the speaker wants to say (line 1)? Are they the same “things” he remembers his father saying (26)? Does the poem itself say these things?

ROBERT HAYDEN

Those Winter Sundays

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made
 5 banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him.

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
 When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
 and slowly I would rise and dress,
 fearing the chronic angers of that house,

10 Speaking indifferently to him, who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
 What did I know, what did I know of love's austere and lonely offices?

1966

- Why might the poem begin with the words “Sundays too” (rather than, say, “On Sundays”)? What are the “austere and lonely offices” to which the poem's final line refers?

- How might this poem's form, especially its lack of punctuation and capitalization, contribute to tone? to its characterization of the speaker's mother?

2. See the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5.15–16): "Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. / Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

3. Thoughtful and unhappy, given to brooding or worrying.

4. See Matthew 19.14: "But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

MARTÍN ESPADA

Of the Threads That Connect the Stars

Did you ever see stars? asked my father with a cackle. He was not speaking of the heavens, but the white flash in his head when a fist burst between his eyes. In Brooklyn, this would cause men and boys to slap the table with glee; this might be the only heavenly light we'd ever see.

- 5 I never saw stars. The sky in Brooklyn was a tide of smoke rolling over us from the factory across the avenue, the mattresses burning in the junkyard, the ruins where squatters would sleep, the riots of 1966⁵ that kept me locked in my room like a suspect. My father talked truce on the streets.

My son can see the stars through the tall barrel of a telescope.

- 10 He names the galaxies with the numbers and letters of astronomy.
I cannot see what he sees in the telescope, no matter how many eyes I shut.

I understand a smoking mattress better than the language of galaxies.

My father saw stars. My son sees stars. The earth rolls beneath our feet. We lurch ahead, and one day we have walked this far.

2013

- How does the poem differentiate and connect three generations of one family by describing the stars that each did or didn't, do or don't, see?

EMILY GROSHOLZ

Eden

In lurid cartoon colors, the big baby dinosaur steps backwards under the shadow of an approaching tyrannosaurus rex.

- "His mommy going to fix it," you remark,
5 serenely anxious, hoping for the best.

- After the big explosion, after the lights go down inside the house and up the street, we rush outdoors to find a squirrel stopped in straws of half-gnawed cable. I explain,
10 trying to fit the facts, "The squirrel is dead."

No, you explain it otherwise to me.

"He's sleeping. And his mommy going to come."

Later, when the squirrel has been removed,

- "His mommy fix him," you insist, insisting 15 on the right to know what you believe.

5. In July 1966, violent conflict repeatedly erupted between blacks and Puerto Ricans in Brooklyn's troubled Bedford-Stuyvesant neighborhood.

The world is truly full of fabulous great and curious small inhabitants, and you're the freshly minted, unashamed
 Adam in this garden. You preside,
 20 appreciate, and judge our proper names.
 Like God, I brought you here.
 Like God, I seem to be omnipotent, mostly helpful, sometimes angry as hell.
 I fix whatever minor faults arise
 25 with band-aids, batteries, masking tape, and pills.
 But I am powerless, as you must know,
 to chase the serpent sliding in the grass,
 or the tall angel with the flaming sword who scares you when he rises suddenly 30 behind the gates of sunset.

1992

- How does Grosholz use language to elevate the poem's subject matter from the trivial and childish to the biblical and profound?

PHILIP LARKIN

This Be the Verse

They fuck you up, your mum and dad.
 They may not mean to, but they do.
 They fill you with the faults they had
 And add some extra, just for you.
 5 But they were fucked up in their turn
 By fools in old-style hats and coats,
 Who half the time were soppy-stern
 And half at one another's throats.
 Man hands on misery to man.
 10 It deepens like a coastal shelf.⁶
 Get out as early as you can,
 And don't have any kids yourself.

1971

- This poem opens with one of the most (in)famous lines in all of English-language poetry. What tone does that line establish, and how so? How does the rest of the poem either maintain or complicate that tone? How might the poem's sound qualities—especially its rhyme and/or meter—contribute to tone? Is the poem's first line an adequate statement of its theme?

6. Part of a continent that lies under the ocean and typically ends in a steep slope down to the ocean floor.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

From “An Interview with John Haffenden”
(1981)*

Was it your intention, in using bad language in one or two poems, to provide a shock tactic?

Yes. I mean, these words are part of the palette. You use them when you want to shock. I don't think I've ever shocked for the sake of shocking. “They fuck you up” is funny because it's ambiguous. Parents bring about your conception and also bugger you up once you are born. Professional parents in particular don't like that poem. (61)

Green Chile

- I prefer red chile over my eggs and potatoes for breakfast.
Red chile *ristras*⁷ decorate my door,
dry on my roof, and hang from eaves.
5 They lend open-air vegetable stands historical grandeur, and gently swing with an air of festive welcome.
I can hear them talking in the wind,
haggard, yellowing, crisp, rasping
10 tongues of old men, licking the breeze.
- But grandmother loves green chile.
When I visit her,
she holds the green chile pepper
in her wrinkled hands.
15 Ah, voluptuous, masculine,
an air of authority and youth simmers from its swan-neck stem, tapering to a flowery collar, fermenting resinous spice.
A well-dressed gentleman at the door
20 my grandmother takes sensuously in her hand, rubbing its firm glossed sides,
caressing the oily rubbery serpent,
with mouth-watering fulfillment,

fondling its curves with gentle fingers.
 25 Its bearing magnificent and taut as flanks of a tiger in mid-leap, she thrusts her blade into as cuts it open, with lust on her hot mouth, sweating over the stove, 30 bandanna round her forehead, mysterious passion on her face and she serves me green chile con carne between soft warm leaves of corn tortillas, with beans and rice—her sacrifice
 35 to her little prince.
 I slurp from my plate with last bit of tortilla, my mouth burns and I hiss and drink a tall glass of cold water.

All over New Mexico, sunburned men and women 40 drive rickety trucks stuffed with gunny-sacks of green chile, from Belen, Veguita, Willard, Estancia, San Antonio y⁸ Socorro, from fields to roadside stands, you see them roasting green chile in screen-sided homemade barrels, and for a dollar a bag, 45 we relive this old, beautiful ritual again and again.

- What different qualities do the red and green chiles have? Which words in the poem help personify the chiles? How fully do these words reflect the differences between the speaker and the grandmother?

- How does this poem play on the expectations potentially created by its title?
 What does the poem ultimately seem to suggest about those expectations?

CHARLIE SMITH

The Business

My father and his brother didn't get along;
 for years they kept at it, sniping, digging out the ground under each other's feet;
 it was a life work more important
 5 than family, than community. My grandfather set them to it, yoked them into his business, struck one against the other to make sparks, raise a fire that would warm him.

My grandfather was a brilliant man;
 10 he knew what a son will do for a father's love,
 how success is a knife driven into the brother's chest, how one must pay with another's life for his own; he knew what a sure thing it was, this jealousy, 15 like a magic bread
 that doesn't run out,
 that will feed a man as long as he lives.

3. An actual brand, but meaning "miracles" (Spanish).

4. Literally, Middle America (Spanish), a region extending roughly from central Mexico to Nicaragua.

- What different meanings might the words “business” (line 7) and “work” (4) take on over the course of the poem, and how do these meanings interrelate?

ANDREW HUDGINS

Begotten

I've never, as some children do, looked at my folks and thought, I must have come from someone else—rich parents who'd misplaced me, but 5 who would, as in a myth or novel, return and claim me. Hell, no. I saw my face in cousins' faces, heard my voice in their high drawls. And Sundays, after the dinner plates were cleared,
 10 I lingered, elbow propped on red oilcloth, and studied great-uncles, aunts, and cousins new to me. They squirmed.
 I stared till I discerned the features they'd gotten from the family larder:
 15 eyes, nose, lips, hair? I stared until, uncomfortable, they'd snap, “Hey, boy—what are you looking at? At me?”
 “No, sir,” I'd lie. “No, ma'am.” I'd count ten and then continue staring at them.
 20 I never had to ask, What am I?
 I stared at my blood-kin, and thought,
 So this, dear God, is what I am.

1994

- What can you infer from the language in this poem about the speaker's attitude toward his life and his family? What does the poem's title evoke?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Compare the portrayal of the parent-child relationship in any two poems in this album, focusing especially on the poems' tones and themes.
2. What words in Robert Hayden's THOSE WINTER SUNDAYS suggest the son's feelings toward his father and his home? What words indicate that his attitudes have changed since the time depicted in the poem? Write an essay in which you compare the speaker's feelings, as a youth and then later as a man, about his father and his home.
3. Write an essay comparing the way grandmothers and their relationship to food and family are portrayed in Jimmy Santiago Baca's GREEN CHILE and Paul Martínez Pompa's THE ABUELITA POEM. How might Pompa's poem respond to and comment on Baca's?
4. Pick the poem in this album that you like most and the one you like least. Write an informal response paper or essay comparing your reactions to the two poems and exploring why and how the poems provoke those disparate reactions. What role do the poem's tones and themes play here? What role is played by your own experiences of, and feelings and ideas about, family?

15 | LANGUAGE: WORD CHOICE AND ORDER

Fiction and drama depend on language just as poetry does, but in a poem almost everything comes down to the particular meanings and implications, as well as sound and shape, of individual words. When we read stories and plays, we generally focus our attention on character and plot, and although words determine how we imagine those characters and how we respond to what happens to them, we are not as likely to pause over any one word as we may need to when reading a poem, even one with characters and a plot. Because poems are often short and because even long poems are broken up into relatively short lines, much depends on every word in them. Sometimes, as though they were distilled prose, poems contain only the essential words. They say just barely enough to communicate in the most basic way, using elemental signs—each of which is chosen for exactly the right shade of meaning or feeling or both. But elemental does not necessarily mean simple, and these signs may be very rich in their meanings and complex in their effects. The poet's word choice—the diction of a poem—determines not only meaning but also just about every effect the poem produces.

PRECISION AND AMBIGUITY

Let's look first at poems that create some of their effects by examining—or playing with—a single word. Here, multiple meanings or the shiftiness, ambiguity, and uncertainty of a word are at issue. The following short poem, for example, depends almost entirely on the ways we use the word “play.”

SARAH CLEGHORN

The golf links lie so near the mill

The golf links lie so near the mill
That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
And see the men at play.

1915

While traveling in the American South, Cleghorn had seen, right next to a golf course, a textile mill that employed quite young children. Her poem doesn't say that we expect men to work and children to play; it just assumes our expectation and builds an effect of dramatic irony—an incongruity between what we expect and what actually occurs—out of the observation. The poem saves almost all of its devastating effect for the final word, after the situation has been carefully described and the irony set up.

In the following poem, a word used over and over acquires multiple meanings and refuses to be limited to a single one. Here, the importance of a word involves its ambiguity (that is, its having more than one possible meaning) rather than its precision or exactness. How many different meanings of the words lie and lay can you distinguish in the poem?

MARTHA COLLINS

Lies

Anyone can get it wrong, laying low when she ought to lie, but is it a lie for her to say she laid him when we know he wouldn't lie still long enough to let 5 her do it? A good lay is not a song, not anymore; a good lie is something else: lyrics, lines, what if you say dear sister
 when you have no sister, what if you say guns
 when you saw no guns, though you know
 10 they're there? She laid down her arms; she lay down, her arms by her sides. If we don't know, do we lie if we say? If we don't say, do we lie down on the job? To arms! in any case
 dear friends. If we must lie, let's not lie around.

DENOTATION AND CONNOTATION

Although the unambiguous or “dictionary” meaning of words—that is, their denotation—is important, words are more than hard blocks of meaning on whose sense everyone agrees. They also carry emotional force and shades of suggestion. The words we use indicate not only what we mean but also how we feel about it and want to encourage others to feel. A person who holds office is, quite literally (and unemotionally), an officeholder—the word denotes what he or she does in a relatively neutral way. But if we want to imply that a particular officeholder is wise, trustworthy, and deserving of political support, we may call that person a public servant, a political leader, or an elected official, whereas if we want to promote distrust or contempt of the same officeholder we might say politician or bureaucrat or political hack. These terms have clear connotations—suggestions of emotional coloration that imply our attitude and invite a similar one from our hearers. In poems, as in life, what words connote can be just as important as what they denote.

The following epitaph, for example, which describes one person's mixed feelings about another, depends heavily on the connotations of fairly common words.

WALTER DE LA MARE

Slim Cunning Hands

Slim cunning hands at rest, and cozening eyes—
 Under this stone one loved too wildly lies;
 How false she was, no granite could declare;
 Nor all earth's flowers, how fair.

What the speaker in SLIM CUNNING HANDS remembers about the dead woman—her hands, her eyes—tells part of the story; her physical presence was clearly important to him. The poem's other nouns—stone, granite, flowers—all remind us of her death and its finality. All these words denote objects central to the rituals that memorialize a departed life. Granite and stone connote finality as well, while flowers connote fragility and suggest the brevity of life (which is why they have become the symbolic language of funerals). The way the speaker talks about the woman expresses, in just a few words, the complexity of his love for her. She was loved, he says, too “wildly”—by him perhaps, and apparently by others. The excitement she offered is suggested by the word, as is the lack of control. The words cunning and cozening imply her falsity; they suggest her calculation, cleverness, and untrustworthiness, as well as her skill, persuasiveness, and ability to please. Moreover, coming at the end of the second line, the word lies has more than one meaning. The body “lies” under the stone, but falsity has by now become too prominent to ignore as a second meaning. And the word fair, a simple yet very inclusive word, suggests how totally attractive the speaker finds her: Her beauty can no more be expressed by flowers than her fickleness can be expressed by something as permanent as words in stone. But the word fair, in the emphatic position as the final word, also implies two other meanings that seem to resonate, ironically, with what we have already learned about her from the speaker: “impartial” and “just.” “Impartial” she may be in her preferences (as the word false suggests), but to the speaker she is hardly “just,” and the final defining word speaks both to her appearance and (ironically) to her character. Simple words here tell us perhaps all we need to know of a long story—or at least the speaker's version of it.

Words like fair and cozening are clearly loaded. They imply more emotionally than they mean literally. They have strong, clear connotations; they tell us what to think, what evaluation to make; and they suggest the basis for the evaluation. Sometimes word choice in poems is less dramatic and less obviously significant. But it is always important. Often simple appropriateness makes the words in a poem work, and words that do not call special attention to themselves can nonetheless be the most effective. Precision of denotation may be just as impressive and productive of specific effects as the resonance or ambiguous suggestiveness of connotation. Often poems achieve their power by a combination of verbal effects, setting off elaborate figures of speech or other complicated strategies with simple words chosen to indicate exact actions, moments, or states of mind.

Words are the starting point for all poetry, of course, and almost every word is likely to be significant, either denotatively or connotatively or both. Poets who know their craft pick each word with care to express exactly what needs to be expressed and to suggest every emotional shade that the poem is calculated to evoke in us.

Word Choice: An Example and an Exercise

Before you read the following poem, notice the three words in the title. What do they lead you to expect? What questions do they raise? Jot down your thoughts on a piece of paper. Then, as you read the poem, take note of key words and try to be conscious of the emotional effects and impressions they create.

THEODORE ROETHKE

My Papa's Waltz

The whiskey on your breath
 Could make a small boy dizzy;
 But I hung on like death:
 Such waltzing was not easy.

- 5 We romped until the pans
 Slid from the kitchen shelf;
 My mother's countenance
 Could not unfrown itself.

- The hand that held my wrist
 10 Was battered on one knuckle;
 At every step you missed
 My right ear scraped a buckle.

- You beat time on my head
 With a palm caked hard by dirt,
 15 Then waltzed me off to bed
 Still clinging to your shirt.

1948

Exactly how does the situation in MY PAPA'S WALTZ and the poem itself fulfill or defy the expectations created by the title? How does the poem answer your questions? How does it characterize the waltz and the speaker's feelings about it? Which words are most suggestive in these terms? What clues are there in the word choice that an adult is remembering a childhood experience? How scared was the boy at the time? How does the grown adult now evaluate the emotions he felt when he was a boy?

WORD ORDER AND PLACEMENT

Individual words qualify and amplify one another—suggestions clarify other suggestions, and meanings grow upon meanings—and thus how words are put together and where individual words are located matters. Notice, for example, that in “Slim Cunning Hands” the final emphasis is on how fair in appearance the woman was; the speaker's last word describes the quality he can't forget despite her lack of a different kind of fairness and his distrust of her. Even though it doesn't justify everything else, her beauty mitigates all the disappointment and hurt. Putting the word fair at the end of the line and of the poem gives it special emphasis and meaning.

That one word, fair, does not stand all by itself, however, any more than any other word in a poem does. Every word exists within larger units of meaning—sentences, patterns of comparison and contrast, the whole poem—and where the word is and how it is used are important. The final word or words may be especially emphatic (as in “Slim Cunning Hands”), and words that are repeated take on a special intensity, as lie does in LIES. Certain words may stand out because they are unusual or used in an unusual way (like unfrown or waltzing in “My Papa’s Waltz” (lines 8, 4) or because they are given an artificial prominence—through unusual sentence structure, for example, or because the title calls special attention to them. In a poem, as opposed to a prose work, moreover, the number and placement of words in a line and the spacing of the words and lines stays the same in every printed version. Where words come—in a line, in a stanza—and how they are spatially and visually related to other words also helps to determine their force and meaning.

The subtlety and force of word choice are sometimes strongly affected by syntax—the way the sentences are put together. When you find unusual syntax or spacing, you can be pretty sure that something there merits special attention. Notice the odd sentence constructions in the second and third stanzas of “My Papa’s Waltz”—the way the speaker talks about the abrasion of buckle on ear in line 12, for example. He does not say that the buckle scraped his ear, as we would expect, but rather “My right ear scraped a buckle.” Reversing the expected word order makes a big difference in the effect created; the speaker avoids placing blame and refuses to specify any unpleasant effect. Had he said that the buckle scraped his ear, we would have to worry about the fragile ear. The syntax channels our feeling and helps control what we think of the “waltz.”

In the most curious part of the poem, the second stanza, the silent mother appears, and the syntax on both sides of the semicolon is peculiar. In lines 5–6, the connection between the romping and the pans falling is stated oddly: “We romped until the pans / Slid from the kitchen shelf” (emphasis added). The speaker does not say that they knocked down the pans or imply awkwardness, but he does suggest energetic activity and duration. He implies intensity, almost intention—as though the romping would not be complete until the pans fell. And the clause about the mother—odd but effective—makes her position clear. A silent bystander in this male ritual, she doesn’t seem frightened or angry. She seems to be holding a frown, or to have it molded on her face, as though it were part of her own ritual, and perhaps a facet of her stern character as well. The syntax implies that she has to maintain the frown, and the falling of the pans almost seems to be for her benefit. She disapproves, but she remains their audience.

Sometimes poems create, as well, a powerful sense of the way minds and emotions work by varying normal syntactical order in special ways. Listen for and watch, for example, what happens a few lines into the following poem. What does it suggest about what is happening inside the speaker?

SHARON OLDS

Sex without Love

- How do they do it, the ones who make love without love? Beautiful as dancers, gliding over each other like ice-skaters over the ice, fingers hooked
 5 inside each other's bodies, faces red as steak, wine, wet as the children at birth whose mothers are going to give them away. How do they come to the come to the come to the God come to the 10 still waters, and not love the one who came there with them, light rising slowly as steam off their joined skin? These are the true religious, the purists, the pros, the ones who will not 15 accept a false Messiah, love the priest instead of the God. They do not mistake the lover for their own pleasure, they are like great runners: they know they are alone with the road surface, the cold, the wind, 20 the fit of their shoes, their over-all cardiovascular health—just factors, like the partner in the bed, and not the truth, which is the single body alone in the universe against its own best time.

The poem starts calmly enough, with a simple rhetorical question implying that the speaker just cannot understand sex without love. Lines 2–4 carefully compare such sexual activity with two other artful activities, and the speaker—although plainly disapproving—seems coolly in control of the analysis and evaluation. But by the end of the fourth line, something begins to seem odd: “[H]ooked” seems too ugly and extreme a way to characterize the lovers’ fingers, however much the speaker may disapprove, and by line 6 the syntax seems to break down. How does “wine” fit the syntax of the line? Is it parallel with “steak,” another example of redness? Or is it somehow related to the last part of the sentence, parallel with “faces”? Neither of these possibilities quite works. At best, the punctuation is inadequate; at worst, the speaker’s mind is working too fast for the language it generates, scrambling its images. We can’t yet be sure what is going on, but by the ninth line the lack of control is manifest with the compulsive repeating (three times) of “come to the” and the interjected “God.”

Such verbal behavior—here concretized by the way the poem orders its words and spaces them on the page—invites us to reevaluate the speaker’s moralizing relative to her emotional involvement with the issues and with her representation of sexuality itself. The speaker’s own values, as well as those who have sex without love, become a subject for evaluation.

SHARON OLDS (b. 1942)

From “Sharon Olds” (1996)*

I don't think that sex has been written about a lot in poetry. And I want to be able to write about any subject. There [...] are subjects that are probably a lot harder to write about than others. I think that love is almost the hardest thing to write about. Not a general state of being in love, but a particular love for a particular person. Just one's taste for that one. And if you look at all the love poetry in our tradition, there isn't much that helps us know why that one. I'm just interested in human stuff like hate, love, sexual love, and sex. I don't see why not. It just seems to me if writers can assemble, in language, something that bears any relation to experience—especially important experience, experience we care about, moving and powerful experience—then it is worth trying.

Words, the basic materials of poetry, come in many varieties and can be used in many different ways and in myriad—sometimes surprising—combinations. They are seldom simple or transparent, even when we know their meanings and recognize their syntactical combinations as ordinary and conventional. Carefully examining them, individually and collectively, is a crucial part of reading poems, and being able to ask good questions about the words that poems use and the way they use them is one of the most basic, rewarding, and useful skills a reader of poetry can develop.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WILLIAM BLAKE

London

I wander through each chartered¹ street,
Near where the chartered Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

5 In every cry of every man,
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,²
The mind-forged manacles I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
10 Every black'ning Church appalls;

1. “Given liberty,” but also, ironically, “licensed,” “controlled,” “preempted as private property.”

2. Prohibition, curse, or public condemnation, but also suggesting *ban*ns, official proclamation of an intended marriage.

And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
15 Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

- Does the tone of this poem seem sad, angry, or both? Why and how so? How might the repeated word “chartered” (lines 1, 2) suggest a theme?

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

Pied Beauty³

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple-color as a brindled⁴ cow;
For rose-moles all in stipple⁵ upon trout that swim;
Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls;⁶ finches' wings;
5 Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plow;
And all trades, their gear and tackle and trim.
All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
10 He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change;
Praise him.

- How many ways of expressing mixed color can you find in this poem? How does Hopkins expand the meaning of “pied beauty”?

From reading and commentary at Princeton University (1952)*

I’ve [. . .] gotten some fame, but I should probably say notoriety, from a very brief little poem called “The Red Wheelbarrow.” [. . .] I had a letter from a lady in Boston [. . .] that said, “I love it. It’s perfectly wonderful. But what does it mean?” [audience laughs] In the first place, I say modestly it’s a perfect poem [laughs] [. . .] It means just the same as the opening lines of [John Keats’s] Endymion, “A thing of beauty is a joy forever.” And so much depends upon it. But instead of saying “A thing of beauty,” I say, “a red wheel / barrow // glazed with rain / water // beside the white / chickens.” Isn’t that beautiful?

From Interview with John W. Gerber (1950)

WILLIAMS: It actually took place just as it [. . .] says here [in “This Is Just to Say”]. And my wife being out, I left a note for her just that way, and she replied very beautifully. Unfortunately, I lost it. [. . .] I think what she wrote was quite as good as this, a little more complex, but quite as good. Perhaps the virtue of this is its simplicity.

INTERVIEWER: Now, what I want to ask you about that [is], What makes that a poem?

WILLIAMS: In the first place, it's metrically absolutely regular. [. . . reads poem] So, dogmatically speaking, it has to be a poem because it goes that way, don't you see?

INTERVIEWER: Well, this goes against so many preconceived ideas of the poem, though, because it's the kind of thing that almost anybody might say.

WILLIAMS: Yes, because no one believes that poetry can exist in its own light. That's one of our immediate fallacies. [. . .] Imagine reading a poem in the American dialects, how impossible! That's the first hazard, that's the first hurdle. We have to get over that. [. . .] It can't be that we poor colonials, as we have been ever since the Revolution, we poor people who are not living in the centers of Europe can have anything happen in our lives important enough to be put down in words and given a form. But everything in our lives, if it's sufficiently authentic to our lives and touches us deeply enough, with a certain amount of feeling, is capable of being organized into a form which can be a poem. [. . .] Your wife, [. . .] the woman who's there with whom you are supposed to be in love and sometimes are [. . .] had these things saved for supper, and here you come along and raid it. Why, it's practically rape of the icebox, and there you are. So I think that's material for a poem. [laughs] That's a definite poem—without even writing it. But then if you can give it conventional metrical form, why [. . .] you're just simply superb, that's all. [laughs] You've done a great deed.

white paper #24⁸

The Irish were not, the Germans were not, the Jews Italians Slavs and others were not, or were not exactly or not quite at various times in American history.

5 Before us the Greeks themselves were not (though the weaker enemy Persians⁹ were), the next-up Romans themselves were not either.

And later the Europeans were not 10 until Linnaeus¹ named by color, red white yellow and black.

Even the English settlers were only vaguely at first to contrast with natives, but then with Africans, more and more 15 of them slaves to be irreversibly, totally different from, they were.

Then others were not, then were,
 or were not, but gradually became,
 leaving only, for a time, black 20 and yellow to be not.

Then there were other words for those who were still or newly (see immigrant, Arab) somehow not the same and therefore not.

25 Thus history leaves us nothing but not: like children playing at being something, we made, we keep making our whiteness up.

- What is the effect of Collins's choice not to refer to the color white or to whiteness until the poem's very last line? of her frequent use of the word not? of her sometimes odd syntax?

- How does this poem end up playing on the various meanings of the words “mood” and “tense” (line 1)? What exactly about the attitude of the woman described in the poem makes her male counterpart first “tense,” then “sad” and “livid” (1, 12)?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose one poem in this book in which a single word seems to be especially crucial. Write an essay in which you work out carefully why and how that's the case.
2. Choose one poem in this book in which syntax (the order of words in sentences) or the placement of words on the page seems especially key to the poem's overall effect and meaning. Write an essay explaining how and why considering word order, in either or both of these senses, might change or deepen a reader's understanding of the poem.
3. Language is a topic of (as well as a tool used in) Martha Collins's LIES, A. E. Stallings's SHOULDA, WOULD, COULDA, and even Kay Ryan's BLANDEUR. Write an essay exploring what any of these poems has to say about poetry or language and how word choice, order, and placement help the poem express or illustrate it.
4. Look up the words charter and ban, as well as banms, in a good online dictionary. Then write an essay explaining how they contribute to the tone and theme of Blake's LONDON. How do all of the varied, even contradictory, meanings of these words matter?
2. In grammar, verb mood or tense used in expressing what might happen given the right conditions, as in “She would eat if he made her a sandwich.”
3. Leather strap or similar device used to sharpen a razor.
4. In phonetics, consonant sound, such as the English f or v.
5. In grammar, mood of verbs expressing a simple statement of fact.
6. Pregnant, distended with or full of.
7. In grammar, of or relating to a verb tense used to designate a continuing state or incomplete action, especially in the past, as in “We used to speak regularly” and “I was eating.”

16 | VISUAL IMAGERY AND FIGURES OF SPEECH

The language of poetry is often visual and pictorial. Rather than depending primarily on abstract ideas and elaborate reasoning, poems depend more on concrete and specific words that create images in our minds. Poems thus help us see things afresh or feel them suggestively through our other physical senses, such as hearing or touch. Sound is, as we will see, a vital aspect of poetry. But most poems use the sense of sight to help us form, in our minds, visual impressions, images that communicate more directly than concepts. We “see” yellow leaves on a branch, a father and son waltzing precariously, or two lovers sitting together on the bank of a stream, so that our response begins from a vivid visual impression of exactly what is happening. Some people think that those media and arts that challenge the imagination of a hearer or reader—radio drama, for example, or poetry—allow us to respond more fully than those (such as television or theater) that actually show things, appealing to our physical senses. Certainly these media leave more to our imagination, to our mind’s eye.

Poems are sometimes quite abstract—they can even be about abstractions like grandeur or history. But usually they are quite concrete in what they ask us to see. One reason is that they often begin in a poet’s mind with a picture or an image: of a person, a place, an event, or any other object of observation. That image may be based on something the poet has actually seen, but it may also be totally imaginary and only based on the “real world” in the sense that it draws on the poet’s sense of what the world is like. Even when a poet begins with an idea that draws on visual experience, however, the reader still has to imagine (through the poem’s words) whatever the poem describes. The poet must rely on words to help the reader flesh out that mental image. In a sense, then, the reader becomes a visual artist, but the poet directs the visualization by evoking specific responses through words. How that happens can involve quite complicated verbal strategies—or even visual ones that draw on the possibilities of print (see ch. 20).

Seeing in the mind’s eye—the re-creation of visual experience—requires different skills from poets and readers. Poets use all the linguistic strategies they can think of to re-create for us something they have already “seen.” Poets depend on our having had a rich variety of visual experiences and try to draw on those experiences by using common, evocative words and then refining the process through more elaborate verbal devices. We as readers inhabit the process the other way around, trying to draw on our previous knowledge so that we can “see” by following verbal clues.

The languages of description are quite varied. The visual qualities of poetry result partly from the two aspects of poetic language described in chapter 15: on the one hand, the precision of individual words, and, on the other hand, precision’s opposite—the reach, richness, and ambiguity of suggestion that words sometimes accrue. Visualization can also derive from sophisticated rhetorical and literary devices (figures of speech, for example, as we will see later in this chapter). But often description begins simply with naming—providing the word (noun, verb, adjective, or adverb) that will trigger images familiar from a reader's own experience. A reader can readily imagine a dog or cat or house or flower when each word is named, but not all readers will envision the same kind of dog or flower until the word is qualified in some way. So the poet may specify that the dog is a greyhound or poodle, or that the flower is a daffodil or a lilac; or the poet may indicate colors, sizes, specific movements, or particular identifying features. Such description can involve either narrowing by category (daffodil versus flower) or expanding through detail (“golden daffodils;/Beside the lake, beneath the trees,”). And often comparisons are either explicitly or implicitly involved. Notice how this works in the three poems below, which move from the least to the most elaborate in their descriptive techniques. As you read each, look for instances of narrowing by category, expanding by detail, and implicit or explicit comparing, and consider how these help to create a vivid, cohesive visual picture of a specific person (in the first two poems) or color and mood (in the third).

 And watched her perfect, half-clothed body sway;
 Her voice was like the sound of blended flutes
 Blown by black players upon a picnic day.

More than just a matter of naming, using precise words, and providing basic information, description involves qualification and comparison. Sometimes, as in Lynn Powell's KIND OF BLUE, the poet needs to tell us what not to picture, dissociating what the poem describes from other possible images we may have in mind. Different features in the language of description add up to something that describes a whole—a picture or scene—as well as a series of individualized objects.

SIMILE AND ANALOGY

As we've seen, the vividness of the picture writers create in our minds often depends on comparisons. Such comparisons are often made through figures of speech. What we are trying to imagine is pictured in terms of something else familiar to us, and we are asked to think of one thing as if it were something else. Many such comparisons, in which something is pictured or figured forth in terms of something already familiar to us, are taken for granted in daily life. Things we can't see or that aren't familiar to us are imaged as things we already know; for example, God is said to be like a father; Italy is said to be shaped like a boot; life is compared to a forest, a journey, or a sea.

Sometimes, comparisons are made explicitly, as when, in THE HARLEM DANCER, the dancer's "voice" is said to be "like the sound of blended flutes / Blown by black players upon a picnic day" (lines 3–4). Such explicit comparisons are called similes, and usually (as here) the comparison involves the word like or the word as. Usually similes are made passingly; they make a quick comparison and usually do not elaborate. Similes sometimes develop into more elaborate comparisons, however, and occasionally, as in the poem below, even govern a poem (in which case they are called analogies).

METAPHOR

When a comparison is implicit, describing something as if it were something else, it is called a metaphor. In the poem that follows, the poet helps us visualize old age and approaching death through metaphors comparing these with familiar things—the coming of winter, the approach of sunset, and the dying embers of a fire.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

That time of year thou mayst in me behold

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
5 In me thou see'st the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west;
Which by and by⁹ black night doth take away,
Death's second self,¹ that seals up all in rest.
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire,
10 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

The first four lines of THAT TIME OF YEAR evoke images of the late autumn, but notice that the poet does not have the speaker say directly that his physical condition and age make him resemble autumn. He draws the comparison without stating it as a comparison: You can see my own state, he says, in the coming of winter, when almost all the leaves have fallen from the trees. The speaker portrays himself indirectly by talking about the passing of the year. Again, then, one thing is pictured as if it were something else. “That time of year” goes on to another metaphor in lines 5–8 and still another in lines 9–12, and each metaphor contributes to our understanding of the speaker’s sense of his old age and approaching death. More important, however, is the way the metaphors give us feelings, an emotional sense of the speaker’s age and of his own attitude toward aging. Through the metaphors we come to understand, appreciate, and to some extent share the increasing sense of urgency that the poem expresses. Our emotional sense of the poem depends largely on the way each metaphor is developed and by the way each metaphor leads, with its own kind of internal logic, to another, even as later metaphors build on earlier ones. Look back at the poem. What does each metaphor contribute? How does each build on the last?

“That time of year” represents an unusually intricate use of images to organize a poem and focus its emotional impact. Not all poems depend on such a full and varied use of metaphor. Sometimes rather than accumulating metaphors, a poet presents a single metaphor that extends over a section of a poem (in which case it is called an extended metaphor) or even over the whole poem (in which case it is called a controlling metaphor). The following poem depends from the beginning—even from its title—on a single controlling metaphor.

LINDA PASTAN

Marks

- My husband gives me an A for last night's supper,
an incomplete for my ironing,
a B plus in bed.
5 My son says I am average, an average mother, but if
I put my mind to it
I could improve.
My daughter believes
10 in Pass/Fail and tells me
I pass. Wait 'til they learn
I'm dropping out.

1978

The speaker in MARKS is obviously less than pleased with the idea of continually being judged, and the metaphor of marks (or grades) as a way of talking about her performance of family duties suggests her irritation. The list of the roles implies the many things expected of her, and the three different systems of marking (letter grades, categories to be checked off on a chart, and pass/fail) detail the difficulties of multiple standards. The poem retains the language of school days all the way to the end (“learn,” line 11; “dropping out,” 12), and the major effect of the poem depends on the irony of the speaker's surrendering to the metaphor the family has thrust upon her; if she is to be judged as if she were a student, she retains the right to leave the system. Ironically, she joins the system (adopts the metaphor for herself) in order to defeat it.

PERSONIFICATION

Another figure of speech, personification, involves treating an abstraction, such as death or justice or beauty, as if it were a person. When “That time of year” talks about the coming of night and of sleep, for example, Sleep is personified as the “second self” of Death (that is, as a kind of “double” for death [line 8]). If personification in this poem is a brief gesture, it proves much more obvious and central in the following poem, though in this case, too, it is death that the poet personifies. How so, and with what implications and effects?

EMILY DICKINSON

Because I could not stop for Death—

Because I could not stop for Death—
 He kindly stopped for me—
 The Carriage held but just Ourselves—
 And Immortality.

- 5 We slowly drove—He knew no haste
 And I had put away
 My labor and my leisure too,
 For His Civility—
- We passed the School, where Children strove
 10 At Recess—in the Ring—
 We passed the Fields of Gazing Grain—
 We passed the Setting Sun—
- Or rather—He passed Us—
 The Dews drew quivering and chill—
 15 For only Gossamer,² my Gown—
 My Tippet—only Tulle³—
- We paused before a House that seemed
 A Swelling of the Ground—
 The Roof was scarcely visible—
 20 The Cornice—in the Ground—
- Since then—'tis Centuries—and yet
 Feels shorter than the Day
 I first surmised the Horses' Heads
 Were toward Eternity—

METONOMY AND SYNECDOCHE

Simile, analogy, metaphor, and personification all insist on the similarity between two ostensibly unlike things, things we might normally never think of putting together—a dancer and a palm tree swaying in the wind, dying and being driven away in a carriage. Metonymy instead relies on the fact that we already associate one thing with another, since it entails referring to a thing by instead naming something else associated with it. Though this sounds complicated, it's not: When you say, "The White House issued a press release," "Harry and Sally are walking down the aisle this summer," or "The suits disapproved," you aren't speaking literally. Instead you're using White House as a metonym for the people who work in that building (the U.S. president and his administration); walking down the aisle as a metonym for getting married; and suits to mean people in authority. The most common type of metonymy—so common that it is treated as a figure of speech in its own right—is synecdoche, which involves referring to a thing by naming only a part of it, as when we either say that someone has “a lot of mouths to feed” or demand “all hands on deck.”

2. Soft, sheer fabric. 3. Fine net fabric. Tippet: shawl.

What metonyms can you identify in the following sonnet? What other figures of speech? What does the poet gain from each?

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

London, 1802

- Milton!⁴ thou should'st be living at this hour:
 England hath need of thee: she is a fen
 Of stagnant waters: altar, sword and pen,
 Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
 5 Have forfeited their ancient English dower⁵
 Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
 Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
 And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
 Thy soul was like a Star and dwelt apart:
 10 Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea;
 Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
 So didst thou travel on life's common way,
 In chearful godliness; and yet thy heart
 The lowliest duties on itself did lay.

Figurative Language: A Comparative Exercise

Indulging in metaphors, personification, and other figures of speech is not the exclusive pastime of poets but something we all do, every day, usually without thinking about it: We “fall head over heels in love” and hope the stock market doesn’t “take a dive.” Our chairs have “arms” and “legs.” We say that the body “houses” the soul. A physician might tell a woman (as one physician did tell a poet whose work appears below) that it’s unlikely her “womb could viably house a fetus.” Then we look at the house across the street and see a human face staring back at us—with windows for eyes, a door mouth, and so on. One thing poetry can do is to reawaken us to the figures of speech buried in everyday language—to make us see again the visual images they should but often no longer do conjure up—and to consider, even feel, their implications.

The two poems below do just that. And both do so by taking as their ostensible subject houses—or rather “house” in general. Yet the two poems are in some ways polar opposites, especially in their use of, and attitude toward, figures of speech. In the first, Tracy K. Smith’s ASH, “house” functions as part of a controlling metaphor, something to which the poem is implicitly comparing another thing that's never named. Identifying that other thing is key to fully experiencing and understanding this riddle-like poem. And doing so will require paying close attention to the specific features, qualities, and actions the poem attributes to “house,” in part through yet more figures of speech. The second poem, Emma Bolden’s HOUSE IS AN ENIGMA, instead seems to take aim at this very tendency to speak—and even think and see—“house” figuratively. What, according to this poem, might be the negative effects of doing so? How does the poem use figures of speech to point out the potential problems with figures of speech—at least or especially those involving “house”?

ALLUSION

Like many poems, Todd Boss's humorous MY LOVE FOR YOU IS SO EMBARRASSINGLY depends on multiple figures of speech: By comparing his love to the Hindenburg and, in turn, the Hindenburg (line 2) to the Titanic (4), the speaker makes use not only of analogy and metaphor but also of allusion, a brief reference to a fictitious or actual person, place, or thing and, usually, to the stories or myth surrounding it. Like metaphor and simile, allusion allows poets to economically suggest a wealth of sometimes complex images, feelings, and ideas by relying on widely shared literary and cultural knowledge. In this particular case, knowing something about both what happened to the Hindenburg and the Titanic and what “dream[s]” of human ingenuity and power were destroyed along with them gives us a more specific, vivid picture of how something might be simultaneously “vulnerable” and “elephantine,” exhilarating and terrifying, transcendent and potentially disastrous (4, 3).

Sometimes “getting” an allusion or even recognizing one requires us to learn something new. Many of the footnotes in this book aim to help you with that. But whenever you come across a name or other reference in a poem that you don't understand or a phrase that seems oddly familiar, it's well worth your while to consult a reference book or to Google up a reliable source. Allusions are one of the ways poems engage with the larger world, participating in a vast conversation they invite and even expect you, too, to be a part of.

Below are two poems that rely on an array of allusions—to everything from historical events, myths, and poems to rock stars. As you read the poems, try not only to spot all the allusions but also to tease out what specifically each contributes to the poem in which it appears.

AMIT MAJMUDAR Dothead

Well yes, I said, my mother wears a dot.
I know they said “third eye” in class, but it's not an eye eye, not like that. It's not some freak third eye that opens on your forehead like 5 on some Chernobyl baby.⁷ What it means is, what it's showing is, there's this unseen eye, on the inside. And she's marking it.

 It's how the X that says where treasure's at is not the treasure, but as good as treasure.—
 10 All right. What I said wasn't half so measured.
 In fact, I didn't say a thing. Their laughter had made my mouth go dry. Lunch was after World History; that week was India—myths, caste system, suttee,⁸ all the Greatest Hits.
 15 The white kids I was sitting with were friends, at least as I defined a friend back then.
 So wait, said Nick, does your mom wear a dot?
 I nodded, and I caught a smirk on Todd—
 She wear it to the shower? And to bed?—
 20 while Jesse sucked his chocolate milk and Brad was getting ready for another stab.
 I said, Hand me that ketchup packet there.
 And Nick said, What? I snatched it, twitched the tear, and squeezed a dollop on my thumb and worked 25 circles till the red planet entered the house of war and on my forehead for the world to see my third eye burned those schoolboys in their seats, their flesh in little puddles underneath,
 pale pools where Nataraja⁹ cooled his feet.

What Is the Zoo for What

The word “zoo” is a zoo for the zoo.

A fountain is a zoo for water, the song is a zoo for sound, the harmonica is a zoo for the hot breath of Neil Young,¹ vagina is a zoo for baby.

5 Baby, girl baby, is a zoo for vagina.

7. That is, a baby born with birth defects as a result of the explosion that occurred in April 1986 at the Chernobyl Nuclear Power Plant in Ukraine.

8. Custom of a Hindu widow voluntarily being cremated on her husband's funeral pyre.

9. The Lord of Dancers, an avatar of the Hindu god Shiva, whose ecstatic twirling expresses the cyclic energy of the universe.

The rose is a zoo for the smell of the rose,
the smell of the rose rattles its cage,
the zookeeper throws something bleeding to it, the something bleeding is not enough, 10 a toddler fell into the cage of the rose,
the toddler was entirely eaten. His name was Rilke,² it was in all the papers.
A Little Pine Box is a zoo for him now,
it said in all the papers.

Then all the kids started doing it. Falling 15 into the violet's cage, approaching the cave where the smell of violets slept, getting their whole head clawed off by it.
Neil Young did it to a buttercup and his face got absolutely mauled.

20 The music that was piped into the zoo let all the longing escape from it and it ran riot over the earth, full of the sight of the smell of a buttercup rearranging the face of Neil Young, 25 attacking pets at random, attacking me in my bed as I slept, attacking the happy wagging ends of my poems.

Can I put Neil Young in a poem.
Will he get trapped in there forever.

30 My voice is a zoo right now for this,
and this paces very much inside it,
it would like very much to escape and eat hot blood again and go home, and right down to the restless way
35 I walk I am an argument against zoos.

Zoo is very cruel. Let everything out and live in the wild. Let it hunt for itself again. Get the stink of human hand off it.

But the hand is a zoo for hold.

2. Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926), influential German-language poet, known especially for lyrics relying on intensely physical imagery and symbolism. According to one biographer (E. M. Butler), “There is no doubt that roses,” in particular, “cast a spell upon Rilke,” whose “roses were always explicitly in enclosed spaces: in death-bed chambers, in his study at night, in rose-bowls, bringing summer into a room.”

All figurative language involves an attempt to clarify something and to prompt readers to feel a certain way about it. Saying that one's love is like a rose implies a delicate and fragile beauty and invites our senses into play so that we can share sensuously a response to appealing fragrance and soft touch, just as the shivering boughs and dying embers in "That time of year" suggest separation and loss at the same time that they invite us to share both the cold sense of loneliness and the warmth of old friendship.

Once you start looking for them, you will find figures of speech in poem after poem; they are among the most common devices through which poets share their visions with us, helping us to see our world and our language anew.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?

- Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
 Thou art more lovely and more temperate.
 Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
 And summer's lease hath all too short a date.
 5 Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
 And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
 And every fair from fair sometime declines,
 By chance or nature's changing course untrimmed.
 But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
 10 Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st,
 Nor shall Death brag thou wand'rest in his shade,
 When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.
 So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
 So long lives this,³ and this gives life to thee.

1609

- What sort of promise does the speaker make with this poem? Why can he boast that "thy eternal summer shall not fade" (line 9)?

ANONYMOUS

The Twenty-Third Psalm⁴

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.
 He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.

3. This poem.

4. Traditionally attributed to King David. This English translation is from the King James Version of the Bible (1611).

- Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
 I will fear no evil: for thou art with me;
 thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.
 5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies:
 thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.
 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life:
 and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

- What is the controlling metaphor in this poem? At what point in the psalm does the controlling metaphor shift?

JOHN DONNE

Batter my heart, three-personed God⁵

- Batter my heart, three-personed God; for You
 As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
 That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
 Your force, to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
 5 I, like an usurped town, to another due,
 Labor to admit You, but Oh, to no end!
 Reason, Your viceroy⁶ in me, me should defend,
 But is captured, and proves weak or untrue.
 Yet dearly I love You, and would be loved fain,⁷
 10 But am betrothed unto Your enemy:
 Divorce me, untie or break that knot again,
 Take me to You, imprison me, for I,
 Except You enthrall me, never shall be free,
 Nor ever chaste, except You ravish me.

1633

- In the poem's controlling metaphor, who is the speaker? Who, or what, is God? To whom is the speaker "betrothed" (line 10)?

 And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
 Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,

5. From the sequence Holy Sonnets.

6. One who rules as the representative of someone of higher rank. 7. Gladly.

8. A ball turret was a Plexiglas sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24 [airplane] and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine-guns and one man, a short small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine-guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside-down in his little sphere, he looked like the foetus in the womb. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose [Jarrell's note].

JOY HARJO

The Woman Hanging from the Thirteenth Floor Window

She is the woman hanging from the 13th floor window. Her hands are pressed white against the concrete moulding of the tenement building. She hangs from the 13th floor window in east Chicago, 5 with a swirl of birds over her head. They could be a halo, or a storm of glass waiting to crush her.

She thinks she will be set free.

The woman hanging from the 13th floor window on the east side of Chicago is not alone.
 10 She is a woman of children, of the baby, Carlos and of Margaret, and of Jimmy who is the oldest. She is her mother’s daughter and her father’s son.

She is several pieces between the two husbands
 she has had. She is all the women of the apartment 15 building who stand watching her, watching themselves.

When she was young she ate wild rice on scraped down plates in warm wood rooms. It was in the farther north and she was the baby then. They rocked her.

She sees Lake Michigan lapping at the shores of 20 herself. It is a dizzy hole of water and the rich live in tall glass houses at the edge of it. In some places Lake Michigan speaks softly, here, it just sputters and butts itself against the asphalt. She sees other buildings just like hers. She sees other 25 women hanging from many-floored windows counting their lives in the palms of their hands and in the palms of their children's hands.

She is the woman hanging from the 13th floor window on the Indian side of town. Her belly is soft from 30 her children's births, her worn Levi's swing down below her waist, and then her feet, and then her heart.
 She is dangling.

The woman hanging from the 13th floor hears voices.
 They come to her in the night when the lights have gone 35 dim. Sometimes they are little cats mewling and scratching at the door; sometimes they are her grandmother's voice, and sometimes they are gigantic men of light whispering to her to get up, to get up, to get up. That's when she wants to have another child to hold onto in the night, to be able 40 to fall back into dreams.

And the woman hanging from the 13th floor window hears other voices. Some of them scream out from below for her to jump, they would push her over. Others cry softly from the sidewalks, pull their children up like flowers and gather 45 them into their arms. They would help her, like themselves.
 But she is the woman hanging from the 13th floor window, and she knows she is hanging by her own fingers, her own skin, her own thread of indecision.

She thinks of Carlos, of Margaret, of Jimmy.
 50 She thinks of her father, and of her mother
 She thinks of all the women she has been, of all the men. She thinks of the color of her skin, and of Chicago streets, and of waterfalls and pines.
 She thinks of moonlight nights, and of cool spring storms.
 55 Her mind chatters like neon and northside bars.
 She thinks of the 4 A.M. lonelines that have folded her up like death, discordant, without logical and beautiful conclusion. Her teeth break off at the edges. She would speak.

- 60 The woman hangs from the 13th floor crying for the lost beauty of her own life. She sees the sun falling west over the gray plane of Chicago. She thinks she remembers listening to her own life break loose, as she falls from the 13th floor 65 window on the east side of Chicago, or as she climbs back up to claim herself again.

- What visual details and figures of speech stand out most in this poem? How do they help to characterize the woman, her situation, and her feelings?

Sea of Faith

- Once when I was teaching “Dover Beach”⁹ to a class of freshmen, a young woman raised her hand and said “I’m confused about this ‘Sea of Faith.’” “Well,” I said, 5 “let’s talk about it. We probably need to talk a bit about figurative language.
What confuses you about it?”
“I mean, is it a real sea?” she asked.
“You mean, is it a real body of water
10 that you could point to on a map or visit on a vacation?”
“Yes,” she said. “Is it a real sea?”
Oh Christ, I thought, is this where we are?
Next year I’ll be teaching them the alphabet
15 and how to sound words out.
I’ll have to teach them geography, apparently,
before we can move on to poetry.
I’ll have to teach them history, too—
a few weeks on the Dark Ages might be instructive.
20 “Yes,” I wanted to say, “it is.
It is a real sea. In fact it flows right into the Sea of Ignorance
IN WHICH YOU ARE DROWNING.
Let me throw you a Rope of Salvation
25 before the Sharks of Desire gobble you up.
Let me hoist you back up onto this Ship of Fools
so that we might continue our search for the Fountain of Youth. Here, take a drink

- of this. It's fresh from the River of Forgetfulness."
- 30 But of course I didn't say any of that.
I tried to explain in such a way as to protect her from humiliation, tried to explain that poets often speak of things that don't exist.
- 35 It was only much later that I wished
I could have answered differently, only after I'd betrayed myself and been betrayed that I wished it was true, wished there really was a Sea of Faith
- 40 that you could wade out into,
dive under its blue and magic waters,
hold your breath, swim like a fish down to the bottom, and then emerge again able to believe in everything, faithful
- 45 and unafraid to ask even the simplest of questions, happy to have them simply answered.

- When and how does the speaker's attitude toward the student and her question seem to change? What role does figurative language play in the initial conflict and its resolution?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Choose any poem in this chapter and explore the meaning and effect of its metaphor(s). Does the poem make use of an extended or controlling metaphor or of multiple metaphors? If the latter, how do the metaphors relate to and build on each other?
2. Choose any poem in this book that uses personification and write an essay exploring how this figure of speech contributes both to the emotional effect of the poem and its theme(s). (In addition to the Emily Dickinson poem in this chapter, other good options include Jimmy Santiago Baca's GREEN CHILE, John Keats's TO AUTUMN, and John Donne's DEATH, BE NOT PROUD.)
3. Research the design of World War II bombers like the B-17 and the B-24. Try to find a picture of the gunner in the ball turret of such an airplane, and note carefully his body position. Write an essay in which you explain how Randall Jarrell's THE DEATH OF THE BALL TURRET GUNNER uses visual details to create its fetal and birth metaphors.
4. Choose any poem in this book that relies on at least one allusion to something or someone initially unfamiliar to you. After researching whatever the poem alludes to, write an informal response paper or essay exploring how the poem works and means differently to an informed reader.
5. Look online for the lyrics to some of your favorite songs and identify the figures of speech used in each. Write an essay explaining which of these figures seem the most creative and effective, and why.

17 | SYMBOL

Properly used, the term symbol suggests one of the most basic things about poems—their ability to get beyond what words signify and to make larger claims about meanings in the verbal world. All words go beyond themselves. They are not simply a collection of sounds: They signify something beyond their sounds, often things or actions or ideas. Words describe not only a verbal universe but also a world in which actions occur, acts have implications, and events have meaning. Sometimes words signify something beyond themselves, say, rock or tree or cloud, and symbolize something as well, such as solidity or life or dreams. Words can—when their implications are agreed on by tradition, convention, or habit—stand for things beyond their most immediate meanings or significations and become symbols, and even simple words that have accumulated no special power from previous use may be given special significance in special circumstances—in poetry as in life itself.

A symbol is, put simply, something that stands for something else. The everyday world is full of examples; a flag, a logo, a trademark, or a skull and crossbones all suggest things beyond themselves, and everyone likely understands what their display indicates, whether or not each viewer shares a commitment to what is thus represented. In common usage a prison symbolizes confinement, constriction, and loss of freedom, and in specialized traditional usage a cross may symbolize oppression, cruelty, suffering, death, resurrection, triumph, or an intersection of some kind (as in crossroads and crosscurrents). The specific symbolic significance depends on the context; for example, a reader might determine significance by looking at contiguous details in a poem and by examining the poem's attitude toward a particular tradition or body of beliefs. A star means one thing to a Jewish poet and something else to a Christian poet, still something else to a sailor or an actor. In a very literal sense, words themselves are all symbols (they stand for objects, actions, or qualities, not just for letters or sounds), but symbols in poetry are those words and phrases that have a range of reference beyond their literal signification or denotation.

THE INVENTED SYMBOL

Poems sometimes create a symbol out of a thing, action, or event that has no previously agreed-upon symbolic significance. Such a symbol is sometimes called an invented symbol. The following poem, for example, gives an action symbolic significance.

JAMES DICKEY

The Leap

- The only thing I have of Jane MacNaughton
 Is one instant of a dancing-class dance.
 She was the fastest runner in the seventh grade,
 My scrapbook says, even when boys were beginning
 5 To be as big as the girls,
 But I do not have her running in my mind,
 Though Frances Lane is there, Agnes Fraser,
 Fat Betty Lou Black in the boys-against-girls
 Relays we ran at recess: she must have run
 10 Like the other girls, with her skirts tucked up
 So they would be like bloomers,
 But I cannot tell; that part of her is gone.
 What I do have is when she came,
 With the hem of her skirt where it should be 15 For a young lady, into the annual dance
 Of the dancing class we all hated, and with a light
 Grave leap, jumped up and touched the end
 Of one of the paper-ring decorations
 To see if she could reach it. She could,
 20 And reached me now as well, hanging in my mind
 From a brown chain of brittle paper, thin
 And muscular, wide-mouthed, eager to prove Whatever it proves when you leap
 In a new dress, a new womanhood, among the boys
 25 Whom you easily left in the dust
 Of the passionless playground. If I said I saw
 In the paper where Jane MacNaughton Hill,
 Mother of four, leapt to her death from a window
 Of a downtown hotel, and that her body crushed-in 30 The top of a parked taxi, and that I held Without trembling a picture of her lying cradled
 In that papery steel as though lying in the grass,
 One shoe idly off, arms folded across her breast,
 I would not believe myself. I would say
 35 The convenient thing, that it was a bad dream
 Of maturity, to see that eternal process
 Most obsessively wrong with the world
 Come out of her light, earth-spurning feet
 Grown heavy: would say that in the dusty heels
 40 Of the playground some boy who did not depend
 On speed of foot, caught and betrayed her.
 Jane, stay where you are in my first mind:
 It was odd in that school, at that dance.

I and the other slow-footed yokels sat in corners
 45 Cutting rings out of drawing paper

Before you leapt in your new dress
 And touched the end of something I began,
 Above the couples struggling on the floor,
 New men and women clutching at each other 50 And prancing foolishly as bears: hold on
 To that ring I made for you, Jane—
 My feet are nailed to the ground
 By dust I swallowed thirty years ago—
 While I examine my hands.

1967

Memory is crucial to THE LEAP. The fact that Jane MacNaughton's graceful leap in dancing class has stuck in the speaker's mind all these years means that this leap was important to him, meant something to him, stood for something in his mind. For the speaker, the leap is an "instant" and the "only thing" he has of Jane (lines 2, 1). He remembers its grace and ease, and he struggles at several points to articulate its meaning (16–26, 44–50), but even without articulation or explanation it remains in his head as a visual memory, a symbol of something beyond himself, something he cannot do, something he wanted to be. What that leap stood for, or symbolized, was boldness, confidence, accomplishment, maturity, Jane's ability to go beyond her fellow students in dancing class—the transcending of childhood by someone entering adulthood. Her feet now seem "earth-spurning" (38) in that original leap, and they separate her from everyone else. Jane MacNaughton was beyond the speaker's abilities and any attempt he could make to articulate his hopes, but she was not beyond his dreams. And even before he could say so, she symbolized a dream.

The leap to her death seems cruelly wrong and ironic after the grace of her earlier leap. In memory she is suspended in air, as if there were no gravity, no coming back to earth, as if life could exist as dream. And so the photograph, re-created in precise detail, is a cruel dashing of the speaker's dream—a detailed record of the ending of a leap, a denial of the suspension in which his memory had held her. His dream is grounded; her mortality is insistent. But the speaker still wants to hang on to that symbolic moment (42), which he confronts in a more mature context but will never altogether replace or surrender.

The leap is ultimately symbolic in the poem, too, not just in the speaker's mind. In the poem (and for us as readers) its symbolism is double: The first leap symbolizes aspiration, and the second symbolizes the frustration and grounding of high hopes; the two are complementary, one impossible to imagine without the other. The poem is horrifying in some ways, a dramatic reminder that human beings don't ultimately transcend their mortality, their limits, no matter how heroic or unencumbered by gravity they may once have seemed. But the poem is not altogether sad and despairing, partly because it still affirms the validity of the original leap and partly because it creates and elaborates another symbol: the paper chain.

The chain connects Jane to the speaker both literally and figuratively. It is, in part, his paper chain that she had leaped to touch in dancing class (18–19), and he thinks of her first leap as "touch[ing] the end of something I began" (47). He and the other earthbound, “slow-footed yokels” (44) made the chain, and it connects them to her original leap, just as a photograph glimpsed in the newspaper connects the speaker to her second leap. And so the paper chain becomes the poem’s symbol of linkage, connecting lower accomplishment to higher possibility, the artisan to the artist, material substance to the act of imagination. At the end the speaker examines the hands that made the chain because those hands certify his connection to her and to the imaginative leap she had made for him. The chain thus symbolizes not only the lower capabilities of those who cannot leap like the budding Jane could, but also (later) the connection with her leap as both transcendence and mortality.

Like the leap, the chain is elevated to special meaning, given symbolic significance, only by the poet’s treatment of it. A leap and a chain have no necessary significance in themselves—at least no significance that we have all agreed upon—but the poet here makes them significant, symbolic.

THE TRADITIONAL SYMBOL

Some objects and acts have a built-in significance because of past usage in literature, or tradition, or the stories a culture develops to explain itself and its beliefs. Such things have acquired an agreed-upon significance, an accepted value in our minds. They already stand for something before the poet cites them; they are traditional symbols. Poets assume that their readers will recognize the traditional meanings of these symbols. Birds, for example, traditionally symbolize flight, freedom from confinement, detachment from earthbound limits, the ability to soar beyond rationality and transcend mortal limits. Traditionally, birds have also been linked with the soul and with imagination, especially poetic imagination, and poets often identify with them as pure and ideal singers of songs.

One traditional symbol, the rose, may be a simple and fairly plentiful flower in its season, but it has so long stood for particular qualities that merely to name it creates predictable expectations. Its beauty, delicacy, fragrance, shortness of life, and depth of color have made it a symbol of the transitoriness of beauty, and countless poets have relied on its accepted symbolism—sometimes to compliment a friend, sometimes to make a point about the nature of symbolism. The following poem draws, in quite a traditional way, on the traditional meanings.

EDMUND WALLER

Song

- Go, lovely rose!
 Tell her that wastes her time and me
 That now she knows,
 When I resemble¹ her to thee,
 5 How sweet and fair she seems to be.

 Tell her that’s young,
 And shuns to have her graces spied,

1. Compare.

That hadst thou sprung
 In deserts, where no men abide,
 10 Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
 Of beauty from the light retired;
 Bid her come forth,
 Suffer herself to be desired,
 15 And not blush so to be admired.

Then die! that she
 The common fate of all things rare
 May read in thee;
 How small a part of time they share
 20 That are so wondrous sweet and fair!

The speaker in SONG sends the rose to his love in order to have it speak its traditional meanings of beauty and transitoriness. He counts on accepted symbolism to make his point and hurry her into accepting his advances. The poet does not elaborate or argue these things because he does not need to; he relies on the familiarity of the tradition (though, of course, readers unfamiliar with the tradition will not respond in the same way—that is one reason it is difficult to fully appreciate texts from another linguistic or cultural tradition).

Poets may use traditional symbols to invoke predictable responses—in effect using shortcuts to meaning by repeating acts of signification sanctioned by time and cultural habit. But often poets examine the tradition even as they employ it, and sometimes they revise or reverse traditional, expected meanings. Symbols do not necessarily stay the same over time, and poets often turn even the most traditional symbols to their own original uses. Knowing the traditions of poetry—reading a lot of poems and observing how they tend to use certain words, metaphors, and symbols—can be very useful in reading new poems, but traditions evolve, and individual poems do highly individual things. Knowing the past never means being able to interpret new texts with certainty. Symbolism makes things happen, but individual poets and texts determine what will happen and how. How does the following poem both draw and comment on the traditional symbolism of roses?

DOROTHY PARKER

One Perfect Rose

A single flow'r he sent me, since we met.
 All tenderly his messenger he chose;
 Deep-hearted, pure, with scented dew still wet—
 One perfect rose.

5 I knew the language of the floweret;
 "My fragile leaves," it said, "his heart enclose."
 Love long has taken for his amulet
 One perfect rose.

- Why is it no one ever sent me yet
 10 One perfect limousine, do you suppose?
 Ah no, it's always just my luck to get
 One perfect rose.

THE SYMBOLIC POEM

Sometimes symbols—traditional or not—become so insistent in the world of a poem that the larger referential world is left almost totally behind. In such cases the symbol is everything, and the poem does not just use symbols but becomes a symbolic poem, usually a highly individualized one dependent on a system introduced by the individual poet. Here is one such poem.

WILLIAM BLAKE

The Sick Rose²

- O rose, thou art sick.
 The invisible worm
 That flies in the night
 In the howling storm
 5 Has found out thy bed
 Of crimson joy,
 And his dark secret love
 Does thy life destroy.
 1794

William Blake's poem does not seem to be about or refer to a real rose. Rather the poem is about what the rose represents—not in this case something altogether understandable through the traditional meanings of rose.

We usually associate the rose with beauty and love, often with sex; and here several key terms have sexual connotations: "worm," "bed," and "crimson joy" (lines 2, 5, 6). The violation of the rose by the worm is the poem's main concern; the violation seems to have involved secrecy, deceit, and "dark" motives (7), and the result is sickness rather than the joy of love. The poem is sad; it involves a sense of hurt and tragedy, nearly of despair. The poem cries out against the misuse of the rose, against its desecration, implying that instead of a healthy joy in sensuality and sexuality, there has been in this case destruction and hurt, perhaps because of misunderstanding, repression, and lack of sensitivity.

But to say so much about this poem we have to extrapolate from other poems by Blake, and we have to introduce information from outside the poem. Fully symbolic poems often require that we thus go beyond the formal procedures of close reading that we have discussed so far. As presented in this poem, the rose is not part of the normal world that we ordinarily see, and it is symbolic in a special sense. The poet does not simply take an object from our everyday world and give it special significance, making it a symbol in the same way that James Dickey does with the leap. In Blake's poem the rose instead seems to belong to its own world, a world made entirely inside the poem or the poet's head. The rose is not referential, or not primarily so. The whole poem is symbolic; it lives in its own world. But what is the rose here a symbol of? In general terms, we can say from what the poem tells us; but we may not be as confident as we can be in the more nearly recognizable world of "The Leap" or ONE PERFECT ROSE. In THE SICK ROSE, it seems inappropriate to ask the standard questions: What rose? Where? Which worm? What are the particulars here? In the world of this poem worms can fly and may be invisible. We are altogether in a world of meanings that have been formulated according to a special system of knowledge and code of belief. We will feel comfortable and confident in that world only if we read many poems written by the poet (in this case, William Blake) within the same symbolic system.

Negotiation of meanings in symbolic poems can be very difficult indeed. Reading symbolic poems is an advanced skill that depends on knowledge of context, especially the lives and work of authors and the special literary and cultural traditions they draw from. But usually the symbols you will find in poems are referential of meanings we all share, and you can readily discover these meanings by carefully studying the poems themselves.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

JOHN KEATS

Ode to a Nightingale

I

- My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
 My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
 Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
 One minute past, and Lethe-wards³ had sunk:
 5 'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
 But being too happy in thine happiness,
 That thou, light-wingèd Dryad⁴ of the trees,
 In some melodious plot
 Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
 10 Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

II

- O, for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delvèd earth,
 Tasting of Flora⁵ and the country green,
 Dance, and Provençal song,⁶ and sunburnt mirth!
 15 O for a beaker full of the warm South,

3. Toward the river of forgetfulness (Lethe) in Hades, the underworld of classical myth. 4. Wood nymph.

5. Roman goddess of flowers.

6. The medieval troubadours of Provence were famous for their love songs.

Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,⁷
 With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
 And purple-stainèd mouth;
 That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
 20 And with thee fade away into the forest dim:

III

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
 What thou among the leaves hast never known,
 The weariness, the fever, and the fret
 Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
 25 Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
 Where youth grows pale, and specter-thin, and dies;
 Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
 And leaden-eyed despairs,
 Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
 30 Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow.

IV

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
 Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,⁸
 But on the viewless⁹ wings of Poesy,
 Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
 35 Already with thee! tender is the night,
 And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
 Clustered around by all her starry Fays;¹
 But here there is no light,
 Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown 40 Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

V

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
 Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
 But, in embalmèd² darkness, guess each sweet
 Wherewith the seasonable month endows
 45 The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild;
 White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;³
 Fast fading violets covered up in leaves;
 And mid-May's eldest child,
 The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
 50 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

VI

Darkling⁴ I listen; and, for many a time
 I have been half in love with easeful Death,
 Called him soft names in many a musèd rhyme,
 To take into the air my quiet breath;

7. Fountain of the Muses on Mt. Helicon, whose waters bring poetic inspiration.

8. The Roman god of wine was sometimes portrayed in a chariot drawn by leopards.

9. Invisible. 1. Fairies. 2. Fragrant, aromatic. 3. Sweetbriar or honeysuckle. 4. In the dark.

- 55 Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
 To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
 While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
 In such an ecstasy!
 Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
 60 To thy high requiem become a sod.

VII

- Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
 No hungry generations tread thee down;
 The voice I hear this passing night was heard
 In ancient days by emperor and clown:
 65 Perhaps the selfsame song that found a path
 Through the sad heart of Ruth,⁵ when, sick for home,
 She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
 The same that ofttimes hath
 Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
 70 Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

VIII

- Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
 To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
 Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
 As she is fabled to do, deceiving elf.
 75 Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
 Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
 Up the hillside; and now 'tis buried deep
 In the next valley-glades:
 Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
 80 Fled is that music:—Do I wake or sleep?

May 1819

- Since birds obviously die, just as humans do, what might the speaker mean when he declares, “Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!” (line 61)? That is, how, according to the poem, is the bird “immortal” in a way the speaker isn’t? How might this help you begin to understand what the bird comes to symbolize in the poem?

ROBERT FROST

The Road Not Taken

- Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
 And sorry I could not travel both
 And be one traveler, long I stood
 And looked down one as far as I could
 5 To where it bent in the undergrowth;

5. Virtuous Moabite widow who, according to the Old Testament book of Ruth, left her own country to accompany her mother-in-law, Naomi, back to Naomi’s native land. She supported herself as a gleaner.

Then took the other, as just as fair,
 And having perhaps the better claim,
 Because it was grassy and wanted wear;
 Though as for that the passing there
 10 Had worn them really about the same,

 And both that morning equally lay
 In leaves no step had trodden black.
 Oh, I kept the first for another day!
 Yet knowing how way leads on to way,
 15 I doubted if I should ever come back.

 I shall be telling this with a sigh
 Somewhere ages and ages hence:
 Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—
 I took the one less traveled by,
 20 And that has made all the difference.

1916

- What sort of choices might the fork in the road represent? In these terms, what seems most important about the description of the roads? Why and how might it matter that the poem's famous last lines (about the great "difference" [line 20] it made to take the road "less traveled by" [19]) are framed as something the speaker imagines saying "with a sigh" at some point in the distant future (16)?

HOWARD NEMEROV

The Vacuum

The house is so quiet now
 The vacuum cleaner sulks in the corner closet,
 Its bag limp as a stopped lung, its mouth
 Grinning into the floor, maybe at my 5 Slovenly life, my dog-dead youth.

 I've lived this way long enough,
 But when my old woman died her soul
 Went into that vacuum cleaner, and I can't bear
 To see the bag swell like a belly, eating the dust
 10 And the woolen mice, and begin to howl

 Because there is old filth everywhere
 She used to crawl, in the corner and under the stair.
 I know now how life is cheap as dirt,
 And still the hungry, angry heart
 15 Hangs on and howls, biting at air.

1955

- What does the vacuum come to symbolize? How might the poem play on the various meanings of the word "vacuum"?

ADRIENNE RICH

Diving into the Wreck

First having read the book of myths, and loaded the camera,
 and checked the edge of the knife-blade,
 I put on
 5 the body-armor of black rubber the absurd flippers
 the grave and awkward mask.
 I am having to do this not like Cousteau⁶ with his 10 assiduous team aboard the sun-flooded schooner but here alone.

There is a ladder.
 The ladder is always there
 15 hanging innocently close to the side of the schooner.
 We know what it is for,
 we who have used it.
 Otherwise
 20 it's a piece of maritime floss
 some sundry equipment.

I go down.
 Rung after rung and still the oxygen immerses me
 25 the blue light
 the clear atoms
 of our human air.
 I go down.
 My flippers cripple me,
 30 I crawl like an insect down the ladder and there is no one to tell me when the ocean will begin.

First the air is blue and then 35 it is bluer and then green and then black I am blacking out and yet my mask is powerful it pumps my blood with power
 the sea is another story
 40 the sea is not a question of power
 I have to learn alone to turn my body without force in the deep element.

6. Jacques-Yves Cousteau (1910–97), French writer and underwater explorer.

And now: it is easy to forget 45 what I came for among so many who have always lived here
 swaying their crenellated fans between the reefs
 50 and besides you breathe differently down here.

I came to explore the wreck.
 The words are purposes.
 The words are maps.
 55 I came to see the damage that was done and the treasures that prevail.
 I stroke the beam of my lamp slowly along the flank of something more permanent 60 than fish or weed

the thing I came for:
 the wreck and not the story of the wreck
 the thing itself and not the myth
 the drowned face always staring 65 toward the sun
 the evidence of damage worn by salt and sway into this threadbare beauty the ribs of the disaster curving their assertion
 70 among the tentative haunters.

This is the place.
 And I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair streams black, the merman in his armored body
 We circle silently
 75 about the wreck
 we dive into the hold.
 I am she: I am he whose drowned face sleeps with open eyes whose breasts still bear the stress 80 whose silver, copper, vermeil cargo lies obscurely inside barrels half-wedged and left to rot

 we are the half-destroyed instruments that once held to a course 85 the water-eaten log the fouled compass

We are, I am, you are by cowardice or courage
 the one who find our way 90 back to this scene carrying a knife, a camera

 a book of myths in which our names do not appear.

ROO BORSON

After a Death

Seeing that there's no other way,
 I turn his absence into a chair.
 I can sit in it,
 gaze out through the window.
 5 I can do what I do best and then go out into the world.
 And I can return then with my useless love,
 to rest,
 because the chair is there.

Jundee Ameriki⁷

*Many the healers of the body.
 Where the healers of the soul?*

—AHMAD SHAUQI

At the VA hospital in Long Beach, California,
 Dr. Sushruta scores open a thin layer of skin to reveal an object traveling up through muscle.
 It is a kind of weeping the body does, expelling

 Dr. Sushruta lifts slivers of shrapnel, bits

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

BRIAN TURNER (b. 1967)

From “War and Peace: An Interview with Poet Brian Turner” (2009)*

Iraq will never be finished in our lifetimes—for the veterans who have come back home, for many of them, and then also for the Iraqis, who we can easily forget because we don't have to deal with them. We don't see them, we don't meet them, we don't have to go visit them or help them with anything. They're clear across the horizon in some foreign country. But we are intimately connected.

• • •

I think people still very much want to talk about these things, but they don't have that avenue. And I do think poetry and art can offer some avenues in, towards the emotional content, not so much the geopolitical possibilities and discussions, but the human content. [. . .] It offers people a way into a moment, and into a world that maybe they've never been a part of or seen and that they can experience a small portion of it and then be reconnected or reengaged to a discussion. I definitely think it's useful.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Consider the poems about roses in this chapter, and write a paragraph about each poem showing how it establishes specific symbolism for the rose. What generalizations can you draw about the rose's traditional meanings in poetry? If you can, find other poems about roses outside of this anthology to determine if your generalizations still apply.
2. Is there a "correct" interpretation of Adrienne Rich's DIVING INTO THE WRECK or of Brian Turner's JUNDEE AMERIKA? If one interpretation seems to fit all the particulars of the poem, does that mean it's better than other possible interpretations? Write an essay in which you explore the poem's symbolism and argue for or against the idea that there is a single best way to understand its symbolism. Can ambiguity serve a poet's purpose, or does it ultimately undercut a poem's meaning and significance?
3. Choose any poem in this book in which an object or action seems to function as a symbol. Write an essay exploring that symbol's various possible meanings.

1. Form of lyric poem, often on the subject of love and longing, originating in Middle Eastern and East Indian traditions and consisting of autonomous but thematically related couplets each ending with the same internal rhyme and refrain words. (The first and second stanzas of one Heather McHugh ghazal, for example, end with the words "stirred person" and "absurd person.") Olds's poem does not adhere to this fixed form.

18 | THE SOUNDS OF POETRY

Much of what happens in a poem happens in your mind's eye, but some of it happens in your "mind's ear" and in your voice. Poems are full of meaningful sounds and silences as well as words and sentences. Besides choosing words for their meanings, poets choose words because they have certain sounds, and poems use sound effects to create a mood or establish a tone, just as films do.

Historically, poetry began as an oral phenomenon. Early bards in many cultures chanted or recited their verses, often accompanied by a musical instrument of some kind, and poetry remains a vocal art, dependent on the human voice. Often poems that seem very difficult when looked at silently come alive when read aloud, turned into sound. The music and rhythms become clearer, and saying the words or hearing them spoken is very good practice for learning to hear in your mind's ear when you read silently.

RHYME

Rhyme—repetition or correspondence of the terminal sounds of words—is perhaps the single most familiar sound device poets use, though of course not all poems use it. Early English poetry, in fact, used alliteration, instead of rhyming words at the end of the poetic lines, to balance the first and second half of each line, and much, if not most, modern poetry is written in free verse—that is, without rhyme or regular meter. From the later Middle Ages until the twentieth century, however, the music of rhyme was central to both the sound and the formal conception of most poems in the Western world. Because poetry was originally an oral art (many poems were only later written down, if at all), various kinds of memory devices (sometimes called mnemonic devices) were built into poems to help reciters remember them. Rhyme was one such device, and most people still find it easier to memorize poetry that rhymes. The simple pleasure of hearing familiar sounds repeated at regular intervals may help account for the traditional popularity of rhyme. Rhyme also gives poetry a special aural quality that distinguishes it from prose. According to the established taste in eras before our own, there was a decorum or proper behavior in poetry as in other things: A poem should not in any way be mistaken for prose, which was thought to be artistically inferior to poetry and primarily utilitarian.

Some English poets (especially in the Renaissance) did experiment—often very successfully—with unrhymed verse, but the cultural pressure for rhyme was almost constant. Why? Custom, combined with the sense of proper decorum, accounted in part for the assumption that rhyme was necessary to poetry, but there was probably more to it than that. Rather, the poets' sense that poetry was an imitation of larger relationships in the universe made it seem natural to use rhyme to represent or re-create a sense of pattern, harmony, correspondence, symmetry, and order. The sounds of poetry were thus, poets reasoned, reminders of cosmic harmony, of the music of the spheres that animated all creation. In a modern world increasingly perceived as fragmented and chaotic, there may be less of a tendency to assume or assert a sense of harmony and symmetry. It would be too simple to say that rhyme in a poem necessarily means that the poet has a firm sense of cosmic order, or that an unrhymed poem testifies to chaos. But the cultural assumptions of different times have influenced the expectations and practices of both poets and readers.

Rhyme also provides a kind of discipline for the poet, a way of harnessing poetic talents and keeping a rein on the imagination. Robert Frost declared writing free verse pointless, like playing tennis without a net. Frost speaks for many traditional (or so-called formalist or neo-formalist) poets in suggesting that writing good poetry requires discipline and great care with formal elements such as rhyme or rhythm. Other poets have chosen to play by new rules or to invent their own as they go along, preferring the sparer tones that unrhymed poetry provides. Such poets of course still care about the sounds of their poetry, but they may replace rhyme with other aural devices or mix regular rhyme and meter with more flexible lines, paying tribute to tradition as well as the unexpectedness of experience.

End Rhyme and Rhyme Scheme

When we think of rhyme in poetry, we likely think first of the most common type—end rhyme, which occurs when the last words in two or more lines of a poem rhyme with each other. When we speak of a poem's rhyme scheme, we refer to its particular pattern of end rhymes. To indicate rhyme scheme, we conventionally assign a different letter of the alphabet to each rhyme sound, reusing the same letter every time the same terminal sound repeats in later lines. Here, for example, are the first two stanzas of Thomas Hardy's THE RUINED MAID, which have a rhyme scheme of aabb, cccb thanks to the way each stanza ends with the very same (long e) sound:

"O 'Melia, my dear, this does everything crown!	a
Who could have supposed I should meet you in Town?	a
And whence such fair garments, such prosperi-ty?"—	b
"O didn't you know I'd been ruined?" said she.	b
—"You left us in tatters, without shoes or socks,	c
Tired of digging potatoes, and spudding up docks;	c
And now you've gay bracelets and bright feathers three!"—	b
"Yes: that's how we dress when we're ruined," said she.	b

Since any two adjacent lines that rhyme form a couplet, we could also or instead describe "The Ruined Maid" as a poem comprised entirely of rhyming couplets.

Internal, Slant, and Eye Rhyme

Though end rhyme alone determines a poem's rhyme scheme, it isn't the only kind: Internal rhyme occurs when a word within (and thus internal to) a line rhymes with another word in the same or adjacent lines, as in the following lines from Samuel Taylor Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" (internal rhyming words appear in italics):

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,
 It perched for vespers nine;
 Whiles all the night, through fog-smoke white,
 Glimmered the white moonshine.

Whether end or internal, rhymes differ, too, in type. Technically, rhyme (or what is sometimes called perfect, true, or full rhyme) requires that words share consonants and vowel sounds, as do “cloud” and “shroud,” “night” and “white.” When words share one but not the other, we have a version of what’s variously called off, half, near, or slant rhyme—that is, a rhyme slightly “off” or only approximate. (The words all and bowl, for example, share consonant sounds, but their vowel sounds differ, and the opposite is true of dark and heart.) Another device more common in poetry written since the later nineteenth century, and (like internal rhyme) ubiquitous in hip-hop lyrics, slant rhyme can produce a variety of effects, all deriving from the poem’s failure to provide the sounds our ears expect, whether our brains know it or not. Much the same in reverse is true of eye rhyme: As much a visual as an aural device, it occurs, as its name suggests, when words look like they should rhyme, but don’t, as with bear and ear, Yeats and Keats.

OTHER SOUND DEVICES

Sometimes the sounds in poems just provide special effects, rather like a musical score behind a film, setting the mood and getting us into an appropriate frame of mind. But often sound and meaning go hand in hand, and the poet finds words whose sounds echo the action or make a point by stressing the relationship among words and the things they signify.

A single word that captures or approximates the sound of what it describes, such as splash or squish or murmur, is an onomatopoeic word, and the device itself is onomatopoeia.

But poets can also turn sound into sense by choosing and ordering words so as to create distinctive, meaningful aural patterns. Rhyme is one such device, but four other important ones are

- alliteration—the repetition of usually initial consonant sounds through a sequence of words, as in “In lurid cartoon colors, the big baby / dinosaur steps backwards” (from Emily Grosholz’s EDEN) or “The Wicked Witch of the West”;
- consonance—the repetition of consonant sounds, especially at the end of words or syllables, without the correspondence of vowel sounds necessary to create rhyme, as in “Abstruser musings” (from Coleridge’s FROST AT MIDNIGHT) or “That was a stroke of luck”;
- assonance—the repetition of vowel sounds in a sequence of words with different endings, as in “The death of the poet was kept from his poems” (from W. H. Auden’s IN MEMORY OF W. B. YEATS); and
- anaphora—the repetition of the same word or series of words at or near the beginning of successive sentences or clauses, as in “It made him sad, it made him livid” (A. E. Stallings’s SHOULD, WOULD, COULD). Like the other sound devices here, this one is a favorite of speechwriters as well as poets, as demonstrated by Pat Buchanan’s address to the 1992 Republican National Convention: “That’s change, all right. But that’s not the kind of change America needs. It's not the kind of change America wants. And it's not the kind of change we can abide in a nation we still call 'God's country.'"

Used effectively, such devices are powerful tools, generating meaning, as well as creating mood or simply providing emphasis. A case in point is the following excerpt from the world's most famous mock epic, which describes a scene that may seem at once foreign and familiar to you: A young woman (or "nymph," line 125) sits at a mirrored dressing table (or "toilet," 123), littered with cosmetics and other accoutrements, and, with the help of her lady's maid, prepares herself for the day ahead—fixing her hair, applying makeup, and so on. Given the way these activities are characterized as a distinctly twisted religious ritual (in lines 123–30), what is the effect and significance of alliteration, particularly in line 140 (which here appears in bold)?

Each silver vase in mystic order laid.

With head uncover'd, the cosmetic pow'rs.
A heav'nly image in the glass appears,
To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears;

Unnumber'd treasures ope at once, and here
The various off'rings of the world appear;
From each she nicely culls with curious² toil,
And decks the goddess with the glitt'ring spoil.

And all Arabia breathes from yonder box.
The tortoise here and elephant unite,
Transform'd to combs, the speckled and the white.³
Here files of pins extend their shining rows,

Now awful⁵ beauty puts on all its arms;
The fair each moment rises in her charms,
Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face

SOUND POEMS

The following poems place especially heavy emphasis on sound and aural patterning. As you read them, try to identify which sound devices they use and with what effects.

ALEXANDER POPE

Sound and Sense⁶

337 But most by numbers⁷ judge a poet's song,
 And smooth or rough, with them, is right or wrong;
 In the bright muse though thousand charms conspire,⁸
 340 Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire,
 Who haunt Parnassus⁹ but to please their ear,
 Not mend their minds; as some to church repair,
 Not for the doctrine, but the music there.
 These, equal syllables¹ alone require,
 345 Though oft the ear the open vowels tire,
 While expletives² their feeble aid do join,
 And ten low words oft creep in one dull line,
 While they ring round the same unvaried chimes,

6. From An Essay on Criticism, Pope's poem on the art of poetry and the problems of literary criticism. The passage excerpted here follows a discussion of several common weaknesses of critics—failure to regard an author's intention, for example, or overemphasis on clever metaphors and ornate style.

7. Meter, rhythm, sound. 8. Unite.

9. Mountain in Greece, traditionally associated with the Muses and considered the seat of poetry and music. 1. Regular accents. 2. Filler words, such as "do."

- With sure returns of still expected rhymes.
 350 Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze,"
 In the next line, it "whispers through the trees";
 If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep,"
 The reader's threatened (not in vain) with "sleep."
 Then, at the last and only couplet fraught 355 With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,
 A needless Alexandrine³ ends the song,
 That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
 Leave such to tune their own dull rhymes, and know
 What's roundly smooth, or languishingly slow;
 360 And praise the easy vigor of a line,
 Where Denham's strength and Waller's⁴ sweetness join.
 True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
 As those move easiest who have learned to dance.
 'Tis not enough no harshness gives offense,
 365 The sound must seem an echo to the sense:
 Soft is the strain when Zephyr⁵ gently blows,
 And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
 But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,
 The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar.
 370 When Ajax⁶ strives, some rock's vast weight to throw,
 The line too labors, and the words move slow;
 Not so, when swift Camilla⁷ scours the plain,
 Flies o'er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.
 Hear how Timotheus⁸ varied lays surprise,
 375 And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
 While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove⁹
 Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;
 Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,
 Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow:
 380 Persians and Greeks like turns of nature¹ found,
 And the world's victor stood subdued by sound!
 The pow'r of music all our hearts allow,
 And what Timotheus was, is DRYDEN now.

1711

Helen Chasin's poem THE WORD PLUM savors the sounds of the word as well as the taste and feel of the fruit itself. It is almost as if the poem is tasting the sounds and rolling them slowly on the tongue. The alliterative second and third lines even replicate the p, l, uh, and m sounds of the word while imitating the squishy sounds of eating the fruit. Words like “delicious” and “luxury” sound juicy, and other words, such as “murmur,” imitate sounds of satisfaction and pleasure. Even the process of eating is in part re-created aurally. The tight, clipped sounds of “taut skin / pierced” (lines 6–7) suggest the way teeth sharply break the skin and slice quickly into the soft flesh of a plum, and the words describing the tartness (“provoked,” “question,” 7, 9) force the lips to pucker and the tongue and palate to meet and hold, as if the mouth were savoring a tart fruit. The poet is having fun here refashioning the sensual appeal of a plum, teasing the sounds and meanings out of available words. The words must mean something appropriate and describe something accurately first of all, of course, but when they also imitate the sounds and feel of the process they describe, they do double duty.

Written in a very different era and style, Pope’s SOUND AND SENSE uses a number of echoic or onomatopoeic words. In some lines pleasant and unpleasant consonant sounds underline a particular point or emphasize a mood. When the poet talks about a particular weakness in poetry, he illustrates it at the same time—by using open vowels (line 345), expletives (346), monosyllabic words (347), predictable rhymes (350–53), or long, slow lines (357). He similarly illustrates the good qualities of poetry as well (360, for example). But the main effects of the passage come from an interaction of several ingenious strategies at once. In lines 339 and 340, for example, Pope produces complex sound effects in addition to the harmony of a rhyming couplet (“conspire,” “admire”). Assonance echoes in the oo vowel sounds in “muse,” “tuneful,” and “fools”; alliteration repeats consonants in “right or wrong” and “tuneful fools.” Ironically, the muse-ical voice here is a bit out of tune to those who have good poetic taste: Pope intends the r and f sounds to feel both cute and awkward, as a comment on people who only want easy listening and miss poetry’s other “charms,” including its meaning (compared to the “doctrine” that is the real purpose of a church service, in line 343).

With a similar technique of demonstrating principles of poetic style and taste, the pace of lines 347, 357, and 359 is controlled by clashing consonant sounds as well as long vowels. Line 347 seems much longer than it is because almost every one-syllable word ends in a consonant that refuses to blend with the beginning of the next word, making the words hard to say without distinct, awkward pauses between them. In lines 357 and 359, long vowels such as those in “wounded,” “snake,” “slow,” “along,” “roundly,” and “smooth” slow down the pace, and awkward, hard-to-pronounce consonants are again juxtaposed. The commas also provide nearly full stops in the middle of these lines to slow us down still more. Similarly, the harsh lashing of the shore in lines 368–69 is accomplished partly by onomatopoeia and partly by the dominance of rough consonants in line 369. (In Pope’s time, the English r was still trilled gruffly so that it could be made to sound extremely rrrough and harrrrsh.) Almost every line in this passage demonstrates how to make sound echo sense.

POETIC METER

We can thank the ancient Greeks for systematizing an understanding of meter and providing a vocabulary (including the words rhythm and meter) that enables us to discuss the art of poetry. Meter comes from a Greek word meaning “measure”: What we measure in the English language are the patterns of stressed (or accented) syllables that occur naturally when we speak, and, just as when we measure length, the unit we use in measuring poetry is the foot. Most traditional poetry in English uses the accentual-syllabic form of meter—meaning that its rhythmic pattern is based on both a set number of syllables per line and a regular pattern of accents in each line. Not all poems have a regular metrical pattern, and not all metered poems follow only one pattern throughout. But like everyday speech, the language of poetry always has some accents (as in this italic emphasis on “some”), and poets arrange that rhythm for effect. Thus in nonmetrical as well as metrical poetry, a reader should “listen” for patterns of stress.

The Basic Metrical Feet of Poetry in English

iamb: an unstressed or unaccented syllable followed by a stressed or accented one (“she wént,” “believe”). This meter is called iambic.

trochee: a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed one (“méter,” “Hómer”). This meter is called trochaic.

anapest: two unstressed syllables followed by a stressed one (“comprehénd,” “after yóu”). This meter is called anapestic.

dactyl: a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed ones (“róundabout,” “dínnertime”). This meter is called dactylic.

rising or falling: the above feet either begin or end with the stressed syllable, as if they lose or gain momentum or “height.” Hence iambic and anapestic are called rising meters, and trochaic and dactylic are called falling meters.

Other Kinds of Feet

spondee: two stressed syllables. Spondaic feet vary or interrupt the prevailing rhythm, emphasizing a syllable that we would expect to be unstressed (“Lást cáll,” “Dón’t gó”).

pyrrhic: two unstressed syllables. Pyrrhic feet similarly interrupt the expected rising or falling beats, placing an unstressed syllable where we expect an emphasis (“űntő,” “is ă”).

Spondees and pyrrhic feet depend on prevailing meter and usually appear singly or only a few times in a row. It is difficult to imagine (or to write or speak) a line or sentence that either has no unstressed syllables—a constant strong beat (spondaic)—or lacks stressed syllables—a rippling monotone (pyrrhic).

Because the concept of meter derives from poetic traditions in Greek and Latin that counted syllables rather than accents, other possible combinations of syllables acquired names, for instance, amphibrach (unstressed, stressed, unstressed—noted by Coleridge in his demonstration of meter, METRICAL FEET, below). But since most meter in poetry in English depends on accents rather than the number of syllables, the terms above cover most of the variations that you will encounter.

Counting Feet, or Meter

A line of poetry is subdivided into feet in order to “measure” its meter. The terms are easy enough to understand if you recall geometry or other numeric terminology. Remember that this is a count not of the number of syllables but of stresses; thus, for example, monometer could have two or three syllables per line.

monometer:	one foot
dimeter:	two feet
trimeter:	three feet
tetrameter:	four feet
pentameter:	five feet
hexameter:	six feet
heptameter:	seven feet
octameter:	eight feet

Counting the number of feet—that is, the number of accents, stresses, or strong beats per line—helps you identify the kind of feet in the line. Thus the terms are combined: iambic pentameter has five iambs per line; trochaic tetrameter has four trochees per line, and so on.

Scansion

Scansion is the technique of listening to and marking stressed and unstressed syllables, counting the syllables and feet. Often, you will need to scan several lines before you can be sure of the “controlling” metrical pattern or “base meter” of a poem.

In the following poem, Samuel Taylor Coleridge playfully names and illustrates many types of meter. By marking syllables himself as stressed or unstressed, he also illustrates how scansion works.

Hearing a poem properly involves practice—listening to others read poetry and especially listening to yourself as you read poems aloud. Your dictionary will show you the stresses for every word of more than one syllable, and the governing stress of individual words will largely control the patterns in a line: If you read a line for its sense (almost as if it were prose), you will usually see the line’s basic pattern. But single-syllable words can be a challenge because they may or may not be stressed, depending on their syntactic function and the full meaning of the sentence. Normally, important functional words, such as one-syllable nouns and verbs, are stressed (as in normal conversation or in prose), while conjunctions (such as and or but), prepositions (such as on or with), and articles (such as an or the) are unstressed.

Here are the first two lines of Alexander Pope’s “Sound and Sense,” marked to show the stressed syllables:

But móst | by núm- | bers júdge | a pó- | et’s sówg,
 And smóoth | or róugh, | with thém, | is ríght | or wróng.

These lines, like so many in English literature, provide an example of iambic pentameter—that is, each line consists of five iambic feet. Notice that there is nothing forced or artificial in the sound of these lines; the words flow easily. In fact, linguists contend that English is naturally iambic, and even the most ordinary, “unpoetic” utterances often fall into this pattern: “Please tell me if you’ve heard this one before.” “They said she had a certain way with words.” “The baseball game was televised at nine.”

Here are a few more examples of various meters.

iambic pentameter: “In sé- | quent tóil | all fór- | wards dó | conténd” (William Shakespeare, LIKE AS THE WAVES . . .)

trochaic octameter: “Ónce u- | pón a | mídníght | dréary, | whíle I | póndered, | wéak and | wéary” (Edgar Allan Poe, THE RAVEN)

anapestic tetrameter: “There are mán- | y who sáy | that a dóg | has his dáy” (Dylan Thomas)

Although scanning lines of poetry by reading them aloud, marking syllables as unstressed or stressed, and adding up feet may seem like a counting game that has little to do with poetry’s meaning, it is an important way to understand the sound effects of a poem. Like different styles of music, different meters tend to express different moods or to suit different themes. When you know the basic meter of a poem, you are more alert to subtle variations in the pattern. Poets avoid the predictable or the lulling by using certain “change-ups” in the dominant meter or line length, such as substitution of a different foot (e.g., a trochee or spondee instead of an iamb); caesura, a short pause within a line often signaled by punctuation; or enjambment, extending the end of the grammatical sentence beyond the end of the poetic line.

Notice that the following example is perfectly regular dactylic hexameter until the final foot, a trochee. Also notice that Longfellow has placed a caesura within a long line.

“This is the | fórest pri- | méval. The | múrmuring | pínes and the | hémlocks” (Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Evangeline)

Substitution of one metrical foot for another—to accommodate idioms and conversational habits or to create a special effect—is quite common, especially in the first foot of a line. Shakespeare often begins an iambic line with a trochee:

Like as | the wáves | make towáreds | the péb- | bled shóre

Or consider this line from John Milton’s Paradise Lost, a poem written mainly in iambic pentameter:

Rócks, cáves, | lákes, féns, | bógs, déns, | and Shádes | of Déath

Here Milton substitutes three spondees for the first three iambs in a pentameter line. John Dryden’s “To the Memory of Mr. Oldham” arguably begins with two spondees, a pyrrhic, and an iamb before settling into a regular iambic pentameter:

Fárewéll, | tóo lít | tle, and | tóo láte | ly knówn

As Dryden’s poem shows, meter does leave room for discussion; some readers might read the line above as iambic throughout, and others might read the last three feet as iambic: The natural emphasis on the first word after the caesura, “and,” could make the predictable word “too” unstressed. The way you actually read a line, once you have “heard” the basic rhythm, is influenced by two factors: normal pronunciation and prose sense (on the one hand) and the predominant pattern of the poem (on the other). Since these two forces are constantly in tension and are sometimes contradictory, you can almost never fully predict the actual reading of a line, and good reading aloud (like every other art) depends less on formula than on subtlety and flexibility. And, again, very good readers sometimes disagree about whether or not to stress certain syllables. We have noted the use of substitution, and many poems since around 1900 have taken liberties with meter and rhyme. Some poets (such as Marianne Moore) have favored counting syllables rather than accents. Even more widespread is free verse, which does without any governing pattern of stresses or line lengths.

Scansion: An Exercise

Each of the following poems is written in a different meter. Using the terms defined in “Poetic Meter” (on pp. 905–7), as well as in Coleridge’s poem “Metrical Feet,” pair the following poems with their corresponding meters (e.g., iambic pentameter). (The answers are on p. 911.)

The Star

"Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you are!
Up above the world so high,
Like a diamond in the sky.

- 5 When the blazing sun is gone,
When he nothing shines upon,
Then you show your little light,
Twinkle, twinkle, all the night.

- Then the trav'ler in the dark,
10 Thanks you for your tiny spark;
He could not see which way to go,
If you did not twinkle so.

- In the dark blue sky you keep,
And often through my curtains peep,
15 For you never shut your eye
Till the sun is in the sky.

- As your bright and tiny spark Lights the trav'ler in the dark,
Though I know not what you are,
20 Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

To My Dear and Loving Husband

- If ever two were one, then surely we.
If ever man were loved by wife, then thee;
If ever wife was happy in a man,
Compare with me ye women if you can.
5 I prize thy love more than whole mines of gold,
Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
My love is such that rivers cannot quench,
Nor aught but love from thee give recompense.
Thy love is such I can no way repay;
10 The heavens reward thee manifold, I pray.
Then while we live, in love let's so persevere,
That when we live no more we may live ever.

Sound and Sense: A Comparative Exercise

To get a vivid sense of the difference sound can make to the tone and meaning of a poem—and just how you can use what you’ve learned about meter, rhyme, and other sound devices—try comparing the two following poems, both inspired by World War I (1914–18). The first is the most famous of several poems originally published in the British newspaper the Daily Mail by Jessie Pope (1868–1941), an English journalist famous, before the war, as a writer of light verse. The second poem is the work of Wilfred Owen (1893–1918), an aspiring English poet who voluntarily enlisted in 1915 (the same year Pope’s poem appeared) and, from January 1917, served as an officer on the French front. Begun some nine months later, during Owen’s hospitalization for shell shock, and originally entitled “To Jessie Pope,” his poem is in some ways as much about traditional poetic representations of war as it is about war itself.

As you read the two poems, pay careful attention to how each uses all of the various sound devices discussed in this chapter, particularly meter and rhyme. How precisely do such sound effects contribute to the poems’ very different tones and themes and their very different views of war?

JESSIE POPE

The Call

- Who’s for the trench—
 Are you, my laddie?
 Who’ll follow French⁶—
 Will you, my laddie?
 5 Who’s fretting to begin,
 Who’s going out to win?
 And who wants to save his skin—
 Do you, my laddie?
- Who’s for the khaki suit—
 10 Are you, my laddie?
 Who longs to charge and shoot—
 Do you, my laddie?
 Who’s keen on getting fit,
 Who means to show his grit,
 15 And who’d rather wait a bit—
 Would you, my laddie?
- Who’ll earn the Empire’s⁷ thanks—
 Will you, my laddie?

6. Field-Marshal John French (1852–1925), commander in chief of the British Expeditionary Force for the first two years of World War I (1914–16).

7. At the start of World War I, the British Empire was the largest in human history, covering over eleven million square miles of the earth’s surface; the desire to maintain or expand empire was one major cause of the war.

Who'll swell the victor's ranks—
 20 Will you, my laddie?
 When that procession comes,
 Banners and rolling drums—
 Who'll stand and bite his thumbs—
 Will you, my laddie?

WILFRED OWEN

*Dulce et Decorum Est*⁸

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
 Knock-kneed, coughing like hags, we cursed through sludge,
 Till on the haunting flares we turned our backs
 And towards our distant rest began to trudge.
 5 Men marched asleep. Many had lost their boots
 But limped on, blood-shod. All went lame; all blind;
 Drunk with fatigue; deaf even to the hoots
 Of disappointed shells that dropped behind.
 Gas! Gas! Quick, boys!—An ecstasy of fumbling,
 10 Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time;
 But someone still was yelling out and stumbling
 And floundering like a man in fire or lime.—
 Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light
 As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.
 15 In all my dreams, before my helpless sight,
 He plunges at me, guttering, choking, drowning.
 If in some smothering dreams you too could pace
 Behind the wagon that we flung him in,
 And watch the white eyes writhing in his face,
 20 His hanging face, like a devil's sick of sin;
 If you could hear, at every jolt, the blood
 Come gargling from the froth-corrupted lungs,
 Obscene as cancer, bitter as the cud
 Of vile, incurable sores on innocent tongues,—
 25 My friend, you would not tell with such high zest
 To children ardent for some desperate glory,
 The old Lie: Dulce et decorum est
Pro patria mori.

1917

8. Part of a phrase from Horace (Roman poet and satirist, 65–68 BCE), quoted in full in the last lines of Owen's poem: "It is sweet and proper to die for one's country" (Latin).

- How do sound effects contribute to the tone of ODE TO PORK? to the poem's characterization of the speaker's relationship to pork? How might they make the poem sound like a blues song?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Read Pope's SOUND AND SENSE carefully twice—once silently and once aloud—and then mark the stressed and unstressed syllables. Single out all the lines that have major variations from the basic iambic pentameter pattern. Pick out six lines with variations that seem to you worthy of comment, and write a paragraph on each in which you show how the variation contributes to the specific effects achieved in that line and the corresponding point Pope conveys about poetic style.
2. Try your hand at writing limericks in imitation of THERE WAS A YOUNG GIRL FROM ST. PAUL; study the rhythmic patterns and line lengths carefully, and imitate them exactly in your poem. Begin your limerick with "There once was a _____ from _____" (using a place for which you think you can find a comic rhyme).
3. Write an essay exploring how Wilfred Owen uses meter (including substitutions) and rhyme, as well as other sound devices, in DULCE ET DECORUM EST both to capture the experience of war and its effects and to respond critically to traditional war poetry, perhaps by comparing this poem to Jessie Pope's THE CALL. If you choose to draw on Pope's poem, however, you might also want to consider how the poem works and means differently when titled DULCE ET DECORUM EST rather than (as it originally was) "To Jessie Pope."
4. Pope's SOUND AND SENSE contains this advice for poets: "But when loud surges lash the sounding shore, / The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar" (lines 368–69). In other words, he counsels that the sound of the poet's description should match the sense of what the poem is describing. Write an essay in which you examine the sound and sense in Shakespeare's LIKE AS THE WAVES MAKE TOWARDS THE PEBBLED SHORE or any other poem in this chapter. How does the poem achieve a harmony of meaning and sound?
5. Drawing on the questions posed earlier about ODE TO A DRONE, write an essay analyzing the effect and significance of the way it echoes and alludes to THE WIND-HOVER. Do you see any validity in one reviewer's claim that the "juxtaposition of Hopkins's religious ecstasy and the dispassion of a 'joystick-blithe [gamer]' assassinating unsuspecting victims" is "irritating," even potentially "offensive"?
6. Write an essay in which you discuss any poem in this book in which sound seems a more important element than anything else, even the meaning of words. What is the point of writing and reading this kind of poetry? Can it achieve its effects through silent reading, or must it be experienced aloud?

Words and Music

AN ALBUM

People often associate poetry with music, for good reason. The word lyric derives from the ancient Greeks' practice of reciting certain poems to the accompaniment of a harplike instrument, the lyre. Throughout history, poems have often been set to music, and today we call the words of any song lyrics. Many poems, especially during the Renaissance, were simply called "Song" (or "Chanson" or "Lied" or similar terms in other languages), and some were constructed in hybrid musical-poetic forms such as the madrigal, the dirge, and the hymn. Another, even older and more common such form is the ballad: a type of narrative poem originally intended for singing and characterized by features such as stock imagery, a refrain, and simple diction, meter and rhyme scheme. (So common is one such pattern of rhyme and meter that it is called ballad stanza, even when used in other types of poems.)

The most fundamental link between poetry and music involves their almost equal dependence on the principles of rhythm. Both art forms have a basis in mathematics: A regular beat or syncopated sound pattern shapes their phrasing and formal movement. Performers of both arts must keep count and consider quantities as well as qualities of sounds. Just as good musicians learn to listen and count so easily that it seems "natural," so poets develop an ear for rhythm that makes their sound choices seem effortless. Readers, too, can develop such an ear.

Both poetry and music use representational or imitative strategies to create the illusion of sounds—bells, waves, motorcycles, for example—but words operate referentially in a way that sounds normally do not, and their syntax is of a different kind from that in musical composition. The referential fact of language almost always alters the "pure" effects of sound.

But what of the relation between poetry and song lyrics as opposed to music itself? Are song lyrics poetry? This remains a complex, open, sometimes hotly debated question, and one brought to the fore in recent years by two events: Yale University Press's publication of The Anthology of Rap (2010), edited by Adam Bradley and Andrew DuBois, with a foreword by literary scholar Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and an afterword by rappers Chuck D and Common; and the granting, in 2016, of the Nobel Prize in Literature to singer-songwriter Bob Dylan. Suffice it to say that some poets, even or especially those whose work most engages with—even resembles—rap or other musical styles and forms, think it nonetheless important to insist on the difference between their art and that of songwriters. As these poets point out, poetry—and thus the poet—must make music exclusively with words: A good poem has roughly the same rhythm and sound regardless of who reads it because it relies on normal patterns of stress or "beats," for example. But the same typically isn't true of song lyrics, which instead rely on musical accompaniment and are often sung so as to accommodate the rhythms it supplies. For this reason, even highly effective song lyrics don't always work as well on the page, especially if we haven't already heard the song they are really only one half of.

In the end, the real question isn't which form is superior but rather how these two equally valid art forms resemble and differ from each other. If, in debating the issue, poets occasionally seem to overstate the claims of their art and their right to Nobel Prizes, that's primarily because—let's face it—modern Western society doesn't tend to accord them anything approaching the public recognition and material rewards lavished on their fellow artists, the singer-songwriters.

This album invites you to think for yourself—and discuss with others—the complex relationships between poetry, music, and song. The poems in the album were all written for, in conjunction with, or to imitate music. They include one traditional and one more contemporary ballad, as well as song lyrics. (For another example of the latter, see Bruce Springsteen's NEBRASKA.) But we also invite you to consider as well as song lyrics by your favorite artists. Are the words as effective without the music? Do they make good poems? Can you, in the lyrics you know well, separate the actual musical implications from those of the words alone?

THOMAS CAMPION

When to Her Lute Corinna Sings

When to her lute Corinna sings,
 Her voice revives the leaden¹ strings,
 And doth in highest notes appear
 As any challenged² echo clear;
 5 But when she doth of mourning speak,
 Ev'n with her sighs the strings do break.

And as her lute doth live or die,
 Led by her passion, so must I:
 For when of pleasure she doth sing,
 10 My thoughts enjoy a sudden spring;
 But if she doth of sorrow speak,
 Ev'n from my heart the strings do break.

1. Heavy. 2. Aroused.

3. Town. 4. Bloodred.

- Often ballads' plots either involve extraordinary, even violent, events experienced by ordinary folk or center on a conflict between people of different social ranks. Is that true of SIR PATRICK SPENS? What might the ballad suggest about "nobles" (line 29) through its form, and especially its "music," as well as its content?

DUDLEY RANDALL

Ballad of Birmingham

*(On the bombing of a church in Birmingham, Alabama, 1963)*⁶

"Mother dear, may I go downtown
Instead of out to play,
And march the streets of Birmingham
In a Freedom March today?"

- 5 "No, baby, no, you may not go,
For the dogs are fierce and wild,
And clubs and hoses, guns and jails
Aren't good for a little child."

- "But, mother, I won't be alone.
10 Other children will go with me,
And march the streets of Birmingham
To make our country free."

- "No, baby, no, you may not go,
For I fear those guns will fire.
15 But you may go to church instead
And sing in the children's choir."

- She has combed and brushed her night-dark hair,
And bathed rose petal sweet,
And drawn white gloves on her small brown hands,
20 And white shoes on her feet.

The mother smiled to know her child
Was in the sacred place,
But that smile was the last smile
To come upon her face.

- 25 For when she heard the explosion,
Her eyes grew wet and wild.
She raced through the streets of Birmingham
Calling for her child.

She clawed through bits of glass and brick,

6. Just before Sunday services on September 15, 1963, a bomb exploded in Birmingham, Alabama's 16th Street Baptist Church, killing four girls, aged eleven to fourteen, and injuring at least twenty-one other members of the predominantly African American congregation.

 Cleanse me from its guilt and pow’r.

II

- Not the labors of my hands
 Can fulfill thy Law’s demands:
 Could my zeal no respite know,
 10 Could my tears for ever flow,
 All for sin could not atone;
 Thou must save, and Thou alone.

III

- Nothing in my hand I bring;
 Simply to thy Cross I cling;
 15 Naked, come to Thee for dress;
 Helpless, look to Thee for grace;
 Foul, I to the Fountain fly:
 Wash me, SAVIOR, or I die!

IV

- While I draw this fleeting breath—
 20 When my eye-strings break in death—
 When I soar to worlds unknown—
 See Thee on thy judgment-throne—
 ROCK of ages, cleft for me,
 Let me hide myself in Thee!

 It'll soon shake your windows and rattle your walls
 For the times they are a-changin'

 Come mothers and fathers
 Throughout the land
 30 And don't criticize
 What you can't understand
 Your sons and your daughters
 Are beyond your command
 Your old road is rapidly agin'
 35 Please get out of the new one if you can't lend your hand
 For the times they are a-changin'

 The line it is drawn
 The curse it is cast
 The slow one now

- What does this song suggest about the character, origin, and significance of hip-hop?

JOSE B. GONZALEZ

Elvis in the Inner City

- I was Elvis in the 70s, not swinging hips,
 Not wearing suede shoes, but just the same,
 In Canvas Chuck Taylors with my own svelte moves, Spinning rap, scratching vinyl to the tunes of
- 5 Kurtis Blow, the Sugarhill Gang, Grandmaster Flash³
 And the hip-hop of the hibity-hip-hip of other Rappers, making rap mine, rhyming to
 The boogie to the boom of the beat, beat, beat.
- Mom and Dad's charros, same as Lawrence Welk's⁴
- 10 Instrumentals were stuff of old country boleros,⁵
 But I had my rap, bebop and I'd rap, rap, rap.
- The other side of the city, like the flip side of
 A one-hit wonder, bopped heads to Van Morrison,
 Jim Morrison, and Van Halen,⁶ but I couldn't break
- 15 A pop to lyrics that weren't about me,

Inner city, inequality, in the record store
 I be.
 Boom boxes, size of refrigerators, walked up and Down projects giving concerts for free,
 20 And rap was made for me.
 Until I—a lone white square on a checkerboard,
 Reciting amidst Blacks of the block—
 Froze, could not get my lips to vibrate,
 Sync the refrain of the word

 I, rockless, rapless,
 Without a side A nor a side B,
 Stuttered, strutted, struggled,
 To find someone who would 30 Rhyme with me.

- How does Gonzalez use various sound effects, as well as the arrangement of words on the page (into lines and stanzas), to characterize the speaker's evolving relationship to hip hop?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Is there a meaningful difference between poetry and song lyrics? between poetry and rap? Is hip-hop a form of literature? Write an essay in which you explore the definitions of “poetry” and “lyrics.” Be sure to cite examples to illustrate your ideas.
2. Find on the Internet the lyrics of a song (of any genre) that in your opinion uses words well, and download or print out one or more versions. First, notice any variations between the text(s) you find and the words you hear when listening to the song. Using a correct version of the lyrics (as you determine it), scan the lines for meter and rhyme. Are any words or syllables used to keep the beat without adding to the meaning (like the word “do” in Pope's SOUND AND SENSE)? Are any rhymes dependent on vowel sounds rather than consonants (that is, do they not quite rhyme in print)? How does the refrain (if any) vary from the rest of the lyrics, and how does it relate to the title or theme of the song? Which lines or verses are most important to the “story” or the feeling relayed by the song? How would you describe the speaker's diction and tone, and how does it compare with the vocal style of the singer? Write a descriptive response paper on these words as a poem without music, and as lyrics within the song. Are they as successful in print as they are when performed with music?
3. Drawing on Mos Def's HIP HOP and the lyrics to at least two other songs, write an essay exploring the rhythm and sound devices peculiar to hip-hop or rap. How especially do its rhythmic patterns compare to those of metered poetry?
4. Write an essay comparing either Mos Def's HIP HOP to Jose B. Gonzalez's poem about hip-hop or Bob Dylan's THE TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGIN' to Linda Pastan's poem LISTENING TO BOB DYLAN, 2005. Be sure to consider content—or what the song and the poem say about music or their times—and form—how the poem and/versus the song say it, especially through sound.

19 | INTERNAL STRUCTURE

“Proper words in proper places”: That is how one great writer of English prose, Jonathan Swift, described good writing. A good poet finds appropriate words, and already we have looked at some implications for readers of the verbal choices a poet makes. But the poet must also decide where to put those words—how to arrange them for maximum semantic, as well as visual and aural, effect—because individual words, figures of speech, symbols, and sounds exist not only within phrases and sentences and rhythmic patterns, but also within the larger whole of the poem. How should the words be arranged and the poem organized? What comes first and what last? What principle or idea of organization will inform the poem? How do the parts combine into a whole? And what is the effect of that arrangement? Considering these questions from the poet’s point of view (What is my plan? Where shall I begin? Where do I want to go?) can help us notice the effects of structural choices.

DIVIDING POEMS INTO “PARTS”

It’s useful to think of most poems—whether narrative, dramatic, or lyric—as informally divisible into parts, distinguished from each other by shifts in subject matter or topic, in tone, in address, in tense, or in mode (from narration to reflection or description, for example), and so on. As you read a new poem, look out for such shifts, however subtle, to determine how many parts you think the poem has and how each part relates to, and builds on, the one before. The following lyric, for example, seems to have two parts. How does each part relate to the other? What differentiates and connects them?

PAT MORA

Sonrisas

I live in a doorway
between two rooms, I hear quiet clicks, cups of black coffee, click, click like facts
5 budgets, tenure, curriculum,
from careful women in crisp beige
suits, quick beige smiles
that seldom sneak into their eyes.

I peek
10 in the other room señoras

in faded dresses stir sweet milk coffee, laughter whirls
 with steam from fresh tamales
sh, sh, mucho ruido,¹ 15 they scold one another,
 press their lips, trap smiles
 in their dark, Mexican eyes.
 1986

This poem's two parts closely resemble each other in that each describes the women who inhabit one of the "two rooms" the speaker "live[s]" "between." Both descriptions include sights ("crisp beige / suits," "faded dresses"), sounds ("quiet clicks," "laughter"), and even the suggestion of tastes ("black / coffee," "sweet / milk coffee"). Yet the relation between the two parts and the two rooms is clearly one of contrast ("crisp [. . .] / suits" versus "faded dresses," "quiet clicks" versus "laughter," etc.). Here different languages, habits, sights, sounds, and values characterize the worlds symbolized by the two rooms, and the poem is organized around the contrast between them. The meaning of the poem (the difference between the two worlds and the experience of living between them) is very nearly the same as the structure.

To fully understand that meaning and the poem, we would need to tease out all those contrasts and their implications. We would also need to consider the significance of the author's choice not only to make the two parts essentially equal in length, but also to order them as she does. How would the poem and our sense of the speaker's feelings about the two rooms be different if we simply rearranged its stanzas, as follows?

I live in a doorway
 between two rooms, I hear señoras
 in faded dresses stir sweet
 milk coffee, laughter whirls
 with steam from fresh tamales
sh, sh, mucho ruido,
 they scold one another,
 press their lips, trap smiles
 in their dark, Mexican eyes.

I peek
 in the other room, I hear quiet clicks, cups of black coffee, click, click like facts
 budgets, tenure, curriculum,
 from careful women in crisp beige
 suits, quick beige smiles
 that seldom sneak into their eyes.

1. A lot of noise (Spanish).

INTERNAL VERSUS EXTERNAL OR FORMAL “PARTS”

In SONRISAS, the internal division created by the speaker’s shift in focus (from one room and world to another) corresponds to the poem’s formal or “external” division into two stanzas and two sentences. Internal and external or formal divisions need not always coincide with each other, however. Major shifts in a poem can and do occur in the middle of a stanza, a line, even a sentence. Take the following poem. Only one sentence and one stanza long, it has no formal divisions at all. Yet it, too, arguably divides into two parts. As you read the poem, consider whether you agree and, if so, where you think the shift occurs.

GALWAY KINNELL

Blackberry Eating

- I love to go out in late September
 among the fat, overripe, icy, black blackberries to eat blackberries for breakfast, the stalks very prickly, a penalty
 5 they earn for knowing the black art of blackberry-making; and as I stand among them lifting the stalks to my mouth, the ripest berries fall almost unbidden to my tongue, as words sometimes do, certain peculiar words 10 like strengths or squinted, many-lettered, one-syllabled lumps,
 which I squeeze, squinch open, and splurge well in the silent, startled, icy, black language of blackberry-eating in late September.

1980

The poem’s first eight lines relate the speaker’s experience of just what the title leads us to expect—blackberry eating. But notice what happens in line 9: The speaker’s focus shifts from the topic of blackberries to the topic of words, with the word “as” signaling that we’re entering the second phase of an analogy (or extended simile) comparing the experience we’ve just read about (eating blackberries) to the one we now begin to read about (forming words), with both berries and words “fall[ing] almost unbidden to [the] tongue” (line 8). Here, then, the relation between the poem’s two parts and the two objects and experiences they describe is one of likeness rather than contrast (as in “Sonrisas”). Fittingly enough for a poem about connection and comparison, as well as vaguely round “lumps” of things (11), the poem’s final line ends with the same words as its first (“in late September”). In a sense, then, the poem might be described as having a circular, as well as two-part (or “bipartite”), structure.

LYRICS AS INTERNAL DRAMAS

Obviously, not all poems consist of only two parts, as do those above. The following poem, for example, arguably divides into three parts. Just as important, in this poem the relationship between the parts seems to be one of development, tracing a change of outlook or attitude within the speaker.

SEAMUS HEANEY

Punishment²

I can feel the tug
 of the halter at the nape
 of her neck, the wind
 on her naked front.

- 5 It blows her nipples
 to amber beads,
 it shakes the frail rigging of her ribs.

- I can see her drowned
 10 body in the bog,
 the weighing stone,
 the floating rods and boughs.

- Under which at first
 she was a barked sapling 15 that is dug up
 oak-bone, brain-firkin:
 her shaved head
 like a stubble of black corn, her blindfold a soiled bandage,
 20 her noose a ring

to store
 the memories of love.
 Little adulteress,
 before they punished you

- 25 you were flaxen-haired, undernourished, and your tar-black face was beautiful.
 My poor scapegoat,

- I almost love you
 30 but would have cast, I know,
 the stones of silence.
 I am the artful voyeur

- of your brain's exposed and darkened combs,
 35 your muscles' webbing
 and all your numbered bones:

2. According to the Roman historian Tacitus (c. 56–120 CE), Germanic peoples punished adulterous women by first shaving their heads and then banishing or killing them. In 1951, in Windeby, Germany, the naked body of a young girl from the first century CE was pulled from the bog where she had been murdered. In modern Ireland, “betraying sisters” (line 38) were sometimes punished by the Irish Republican Army (I.R.A.) for associating with British soldiers.

I who have stood dumb
 when your betraying sisters, cauled³ in tar,
 40 wept by the railings,
 who would connive
 in civilized outrage
 yet understand the exact and tribal, intimate revenge.
 1975

In PUNISHMENT, the first shift seems to come in line 23 (again, in the middle of a stanza rather than its beginning): Up to this point, the speaker has described the long-dead girl in the third person (e.g., “her neck,” “her nipples,” lines 3, 5; emphasis added). And despite his twice-repeated emphasis on his own perceptions and responses (“I can feel,” “I can see,” 1, 9; emphasis added), the girl herself gets most of the attention. Starting in line 23, however, the speaker begins to speak to the girl directly, addressing her in the second person (“you”) and through epithets (“Little adulteress,” “poor scapegoat,” 23, 28). Verb tense shifts, too (“were,” 25), as the speaker begins to imagine the girl’s life “before they punished” her (24). In at least two ways, then, the speaker seems to be coming closer to the girl, now seeing and addressing her as a human being with a history rather than as a thing to be looked at and talked about. At the same time, the speaker focuses more on himself as well, expressing his emotions (“I almost love you,” 29) and reflecting somewhat critically on the way he looked at the girl’s body—and allowed us to—earlier in the poem (“I am the artful voyeur,” 32).

Subject matter and tense shift again, however, in line 37: The poem’s final two stanzas consider the speaker’s behavior toward the “betraying sisters” (38) in an indeterminate past (“I [. . .] have,” 37), as if here he describes not one specific experience, but rather a composite of many. Aside from the “your,” in line 38, the girl herself seems to have disappeared from the poem (so much so that even that “your” now seems potentially ambiguous: Might it now also refer to someone else?). Though in this poem, unlike BLACKBERRY EATING, we don’t have the word as to signal an analogy, it seems clear that Heaney’s speaker has, over the course of the poem, come to see a similarity between his attitude toward the long-dead girl and the “betraying sisters,” the behavior of those responsible for these women’s punishments, and even between writing a poem about such women and punishing them. How and why so?

Though “Punishment” is by no means a dramatic poem in the literal sense, it does—like some other lyrics—relate an internal drama of sorts, tracing the process through which its speaker comes to see or accept, as well as share with us, some truth about or insight into the world or himself that he didn’t see or accept previously, somewhat as a fictional character might in a dramatic or narrative poem or in a short story. In reading and writing about such poems, a good topic to explore might be what insight the speaker comes to over the course of the poem, and when and why so.

3. Wrapped or enclosed as if in a caul (the inner fetal membrane of higher vertebrates that sometimes covers the head at birth).

Analyzing Internal Structure: An Exercise

Like “Punishment,” both of the following poems trace a development in their speakers’ perceptions of themselves or the world around them, even if the realizations to which the speakers come and the processes by which they get there differ. As you read each poem, think about where and why the shifts come both in the poem and in the speaker’s outlook. In which poem does the change within the speaker seem to happen during the poem itself (as in “Punishment”), and which poem might instead depict the change as one that happened at some earlier, unspecified point in time?

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Frost at Midnight

- The frost performs its secret ministry,
 Unhelped by any wind. The owlet’s cry
 Came loud—and hark, again! loud as before.
 The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,
 5 Have left me to that solitude, which suits
 Abstruser musings: save that at my side
 My cradled infant slumbers peacefully.
 ’Tis calm indeed! so calm, that it disturbs
 And vexes meditation with its strange
 10 And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood,
 This populous village! Sea, and hill, and wood,
 With all the numberless goings on of life,
 Inaudible as dreams! the thin blue flame
 Lies on my low burnt fire, and quivers not;
 15 Only that film,⁴ which fluttered on the grate,
 Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
 Methinks, its motion in this hush of nature
 Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
 Making it a companionable form,
 20 Whose puny flaps and freaks the idling Spirit
 By its own moods interprets, every where
 Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
 And makes a toy of Thought.

- But O! how oft,
 How oft, at school, with most believing mind,
 25 Presageful, have I gazed upon the bars,
 To watch that fluttering stranger! and as oft
 With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt

4. In all parts of the kingdom these films are called strangers and supposed to portend the arrival of some absent friend [Coleridge’s note]. The “film” is a piece of soot fluttering on the bar of the grate.

Of my sweet birth-place, and the old church-tower,
 Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang
 30 From morn to evening, all the hot Fair-day,
 So sweetly, that they stirred and haunted me
 With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
 Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
 So gazed I, till the soothing things I dreamt
 35 Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams!
 And so I brooded all the following morn,
 Awed by the stern preceptor's face, mine eye
 Fixed with mock study on my swimming book:
 Save if the door half opened, and I snatched
 40 A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up,
 For still I hoped to see the stranger's face,
 Townsman, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
 My play-mate when we both were clothed alike!⁵

Dear Babe, that sleepest cradled by my side,
 45 Whose gentle breathings, heard in this deep calm,
 Fill up the interspersed vacancies
 And momentary pauses of the thought!
 My babe so beautiful! it thrills my heart
 With tender gladness, thus to look at thee,
 50 And think that thou shalt learn far other lore
 And in far other scenes! For I was reared
 In the great city, pent 'mid cloisters dim,
 And saw nought lovely but the sky and stars.
 But thou, my babe! shalt wander like a breeze
 55 By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags
 Of ancient mountain, and beneath the clouds,
 Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
 And mountain crags: so shalt thou see and hear
 The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
 60 Of that eternal language, which thy God
 Utters, who from eternity doth teach
 Himself in all, and all things in himself.
 Great universal Teacher! he shall mould
 Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.
 65 Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee,
 Whether the summer clothe the general earth
 With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
 Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
 Of mossy apple-tree, while the nigh thatch
 70 Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall
 Heard only in the trances of the blast,

5. Late-eighteenth-century custom called for all infants to wear dresses, regardless of gender.

Or if the secret ministry of frost
 Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
 Quietly shining to the quiet Moon.

1798

- Coleridge described some of his poems, including FROST AT MIDNIGHT, as having a circular structure. How and why might this poem seem circular, or in what way does its end resemble its beginning? In what way are the two different? How might the resemblance and difference help us recognize the change in the speaker's outlook?

SHARON OLDS

The Victims

When Mother divorced you, we were glad. She took it and took it, in silence, all those years and then kicked you out, suddenly, and her kids loved it. Then you were fired, and we 5 grinned inside, the way people grinned when Nixon's helicopter lifted off the South
 Lawn for the last time.⁶ We were tickled to think of your office taken away, your secretaries taken away,
 10 your lunches with three double bourbons, your pencils, your reams of paper. Would they take your suits back, too, those dark carcasses hung in your closet, and the black noses of your shoes with their large pores?
 15 She had taught us to take it, to hate you and take it until we pricked with her for your annihilation, Father. Now I pass the bums in doorways, the white slugs of their bodies gleaming through slits in their 20 suits of compressed silt, the stained flippers of their hands, the underwater fire of their eyes, ships gone down with the lanterns lit, and I wonder who took it and took it from them in silence until they had 25 given it all away and had nothing left but this.

1984

- How are the speaker's shifting attitudes toward her father (and the poem's parts) both related and differentiated by repetition of the word "took"?

6. When Richard Nixon resigned the U.S. presidency on August 8, 1974, his exit from the White House (by helicopter from the lawn) was televised live.

MAKING ARGUMENTS ABOUT STRUCTURE

Dividing a poem into parts and analyzing its internal structure as we have here isn't an exact science: Different readers might well come to slightly different conclusions about the nature, timing, and significance of key shifts and thus about how many parts a poem might be said to have, how one part relates to another, and what sort of whole those parts create. It seems quite possible, for example, to argue that THE VICTIMS has either two parts or three, depending on what you make of lines 15–17 (up to the word “Now”), or that FROST AT MIDNIGHT has three, four, even five parts. In these cases, as in many others, there is no single correct answer. Indeed, ample room for disagreement is in a way precisely the point: Formulating your own ideas about where important shifts come in a poem and why they're important, identifying good evidence to support your conclusions, and considering alternative ways of understanding the poem's structure may take you far down the path to developing your own argument about how the poem as a whole works and means.

POEMS WITHOUT “PARTS”

As we've seen, too, dividing a poem into parts is simply a useful way to begin to explore and analyze its structure rather than the entire point or end of such analysis. And this is all the more obviously true with those poems that contain no major shifts and thus no distinct “parts” at all. Such poems nonetheless have a distinct structure; their authors, too, must figure out how to organize their material so as to create something like a beginning, middle, and end. And here, too, such structural choices determine how the poem moves and means. The following poem is a case in point: One sentence and one stanza long, with no major shifts, how does it nonetheless manage both to cohere and to develop? What picture of America results both from its particular details and from the way they are organized?

WALT WHITMAN

I Hear America Singing

I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear,
 Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,
 The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,
 The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work,
 5 The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deckhand singing on the steamboat deck,
 The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,
 The wood-cutter's song, the ploughboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,
 The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,
 Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,

- 10 The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows,
robust, friendly,
Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

1860

By limiting himself to a single sentence and a single stanza, which nonetheless refers to a multitude of people and “songs,” Whitman produces a poem that structurally embodies the motto on the U.S. seal—e pluribus unum, “Out of many, one.” The “many ones” with whom the poem begins are all ordinary men who work with their hands: From “mechanics” (line 2) to a “boatman” (5) and “ploughboy” (7), they work on land and shore, in city and country. Though line 8 doesn’t constitute a major shift, it does subtly broaden the poem’s picture of America: Women enter the poem; and though they, too, are depicted “at work,” the fact that they are identified specifically as a “mother,” “young wife,” and “girl” introduces, too, the idea both of generations and of family, two important social groups that intervene between many individuals, on the one hand, and an entire country, on the other. Finally, at the poem’s end, we move from “day” to “night” and from labor to leisure, in a way that makes clear that these oppositions and time itself have also been structuring principles all along: Line 4, after all, describes the mason as singing “as he makes ready for [. . .] or leaves off work,” line 7 the ploughboy and wood-cutter each making “his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown.” By its close, then, the poem has shown us a full day of life in Whitman’s version of America and in the lives of those whose various, unique “carols” (1) combine to create a single American song.

POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

As you read each of the following poems, consider the following questions: Does the poem seem to divide into internal “parts”? If so, where and why? What are the major shifts? How does each part build on the last? How do the parts combine into a meaningful whole? If the poem doesn’t seem divisible into parts, what are its organizing principles? How does the poem build and develop, and what overall picture or even theme results?

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame

- Th' expense of spirit in a waste⁷ of shame
Is lust in action; and, till action, lust
Is perjured, murderous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;
5 Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight:
Past reason hunted; and no sooner had,
Past reason hated, as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad:
Mad in pursuit, and in possession so;
10 Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
A bliss in proof,⁸ and proved, a very woe;

7. Using up; also, desert. Expense: expending.

Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.
 All this the world well knows; yet none knows well
 To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

1609

- Paraphrase this poem. What emotional stages accompany the carrying out of a violent or lustful act? Is Shakespeare an insightful psychologist? What is his major insight about how lust works?

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

Ode to the West Wind

I

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
 Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
 Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

- Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,
 5 Pestilence-stricken multitudes: O thou,
 Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The wingèd seeds, where they lie cold and low,
 Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow

- 10 Her clarion⁹ o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
 With living hues and odors plain and hill:

Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
 Destroyer and preserver; hear, oh, hear!

II

- 15 Thou on whose stream, mid the steep sky's commotion,
 Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,
 Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean,

Angels¹ of rain and lightning: there are spread
 On the blue surface of thine aëry surge,

- 20 Like the bright hair uplifted from the head

Of some fierce Maenad,² even from the dim verge
 Of the horizon to the zenith's height,
 The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night

- 25 Will be the dome of a vast sepulcher,
 Vaulted with all thy congregated might

8. In the act. 9. Trumpet call. 1. Messengers. 2. Frenzied female votary of Dionysus, the Greek god of vegetation and fertility who was supposed to die in the fall and rise again each spring.

Of vapors, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst: oh, hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
30 The blue Mediterranean, where he lay,
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,
Beside a pumice isle in Baiae's bay,³
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,
35 All overgrown with azure moss and flowers
So sweet, the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers
Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
40 The sapless foliage of the ocean, know
Thy voice, and suddenly grow gray with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves:⁴ oh, hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
45 A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share
The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be
The comrade of thy wanderings over Heaven,
50 As then, when to outstrip thy skyey speed
Scarce seemed a vision; I would ne'er have striven
As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need.
Oh, lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!
55 A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed
One too like thee: tameless, and swift, and proud.

V

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is:
What if my leaves are falling like its own!
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies
60 Will take from both a deep, autumnal tone,
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, Spirit fierce,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

3. Where Roman emperors had erected villas, west of Naples.

4. The vegetation at the bottom of the sea [. . .] sympathizes with that of the land in the change of seasons [Shelley's note].

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
 Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!
 65 And, by the incantation of this verse,
 Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth
 Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!
 Be through my lips to unawakened earth
 The trumpet of a prophecy! O Wind, 70 If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

- What attributes of the West Wind does the speaker want his poetry to embody? In what ways is this poem like the wind it describes? What is the effect of its structure?

PHILIP LARKIN

Church Going

Once I am sure there's nothing going on
 I step inside, letting the door thud shut.
 Another church: matting, seats, and stone,
 And little books; sprawlings of flowers, cut
 5 For Sunday, brownish now; some brass and stuff
 Up at the holy end; the small neat organ;
 And a tense, musty, unignorable silence,
 Brewed God knows how long. Hatless, I take off
 My cycle-clips in awkward reverence,
 10 Move forward, run my hand around the font.
 From where I stand, the roof looks almost new—Cleaned, or restored? Someone would know: I don't.
 Mounting the lectern, I peruse a few
 Hectoring large-scale verses, and pronounce 15 "Here endeth" much more loudly than I'd meant.
 The echoes snigger briefly. Back at the door
 I sign the book, donate an Irish sixpence,
 Reflect the place was not worth stopping for.
 Yet stop I did: in fact I often do,
 20 And always end much at a loss like this,
 Wondering what to look for; wondering, too,
 When churches fall completely out of use
 What we shall turn them into, if we shall keep
 A few cathedrals chronically on show,
 25 Their parchment, plate and pyx in locked cases,
 And let the rest rent-free to rain and sheep.
 Shall we avoid them as unlucky places?
 Or, after dark, will dubious women come
 To make their children touch a particular stone;

- 30 Pick simples⁵ for a cancer; or on some Advised night see walking a dead one?
 Power of some sort or other will go on
 In games, in riddles, seemingly at random;
 But superstition, like belief, must die,
 35 And what remains when disbelief has gone?
 Grass, weedy pavement, brambles, buttress, sky,

 A shape less recognizable each week,
 A purpose more obscure. I wonder who Will be the last, the very last, to seek 40 This place for what it was; one of the crew
 That tap and jot and know what rood-lofts⁶ were?
 Some ruin-bibber,⁷ randy for antique,
 Or Christmas-addict, counting on a whiff
 Of gown-and-bands and organ-pipes and myrrh?
 45 Or will he be my representative,

 Bored, uninformed, knowing the ghostly silt
 Dispersed, yet tending to this cross of ground
 Through suburb scrub because it held unspilt
 So long and equably what since is found
 50 Only in separation—marriage, and birth,
 And death, and thoughts of these—for whom was built
 This special shell? For, though I've no idea
 What this accoutered frowsty barn is worth,
 It pleases me to stand in silence here;

 55 A serious house on serious earth it is,
 In whose blent⁸ air all our compulsions meet,
 Are recognized, and robed as destinies.
 And that much never can be obsolete,
 Since someone will forever be surprising
 60 A hunger in himself to be more serious,
 And gravitating with it to this ground,
 Which, he once heard, was proper to grow wise in,
 If only that so many dead lie round.

- Describe the parts of this poem. How do the first two stanzas differ from the rest of the poem? Where and how does the poem shift from the personal to the general?

5. Medicinal herbs.

6. Galleries atop the screens (on which crosses ["roods"] are mounted) that divide the naves or main bodies of churches from the choirs or chancels.

7. Literally, ruin-drinker: someone extremely attracted to antiquarian objects.

8. Blended.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

From “A Conversation with Ian Hamilton” (1964)*

It [“Church Going”] is of course an entirely secular poem. I was a bit irritated by an American who insisted to me it was a religious poem. It isn’t religious at all. Religion surely means that the affairs of this world are under divine surveillance, and so on, and I go to some pains to point out that I don’t bother about that kind of thing. [. . .]

[. . .] the poem is about going to church, not religion—I tried to suggest this by the title—and the union of the important stages of human life—birth, marriage and death—that going to church represents; and my own feeling that when they are dispersed into the registry office and the crematorium chapel life will become thinner in consequence. (22)

From “An Interview with John Haffenden” (1981)

It [“Church Going”] came from the first time I saw a ruined church in Northern Ireland, and I’d never seen a ruined church before—discarded. It shocked me. Now of course it’s commonplace: churches are not so much ruined as turned into bingo-halls, warehouses for refrigerators or split-level houses for architects.

It’s not clear in the poem that you began with a ruined church.

No, it wasn’t in the poem, but when you go into a church there’s a feeling of something . . . well . . . over, derelict.

Some critics have discerned in it a yearning for a latter-day Christian or religious sanction. Is that so?

I suppose so. I’m not someone who’s lost faith: I never had it. I was baptized [. . .] but not confirmed. Aren’t religions shaped in terms of what people want? No one could help hoping Christianity was true, or at least the happy ending—rising from the dead and our sins forgiven. One longs for these miracles, and so in a sense one longs for religion. But “Church Going” isn’t that kind of poem: it’s a humanist poem, a celebration of the dignity of . . . well, you know what it says. (56–57)

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. What words and patterns are repeated in the different stanzas of Shelley's ODE TO THE WEST WIND? What differences are there from stanza to stanza? What "progress" does the poem make? Write an essay in which you discuss the ways that meaning and structure are intertwined in Shelley's poem.
2. Write an essay that explores the use of contrast in Pat Mora's SONRISAS. How is each of the two rooms in the poem characterized by way of contrast with the other? What do they individually and jointly symbolize? What does the poem show through this contrast? Alternatively, write an essay about BLACKBERRY EATING, focusing on the comparison it makes.
3. Pick out any poem you have read in this book that seems particularly effective in the way it is put together. Write an essay in which you consider how the poem is organized—that is, what structural principles it employs. What do the choices of speaker, situation, and setting have to do with the poem's structure? What other artistic decisions contribute to its structure?

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY IN PROGRESS

The following piece of writing by student Lindsay Gibson was originally just one section of a longer essay on multiple poems by Philip Larkin. Though the beginning and middle of the piece work fine out of that context, you'll notice that we haven't supplied either the title or the real conclusion that the piece needs to have in order to be a complete, effective essay. What should the piece be titled? How might it be brought to a more satisfying conclusion?

You will notice, too, that the essay focuses only partly and somewhat unevenly on issues related to internal structure. How might the essay make more of the poem's structure? More generally, what are the essay's weakest and strongest moments and aspects? How might its argument be improved or expanded? Answering such questions for yourself or discussing them with your classmates can be a useful way to better understand the qualities of a good argument, a good title, and a good conclusion.

Philip Larkin's "Church Going"

Philip Larkin is one of the semester's most fascinating poets. His use of colloquial language, regular meter, and rhyme sets him slightly apart from other poets of his day, many of whom write in varying forms of verse, use nearly indecipherable language, and rarely, if ever, make use of rhyme at all. Many of his poems are fraught with existential crises, the nature of which only someone living in the postmodern world could understand; consequently, his poems contain a lot of meaning for the contemporary reader.

Larkin's most fascinating poem, "Church Going," embodies many of his best attributes as a poet: it uses everyday, standard English and is therefore easy to read and understand, yet its stanzas contain a real search for meaning that its simple language might not immediately invite the reader to ponder. The poem also addresses one of Larkin's main preoccupations: religion, and specifically the role of religion in a postmodern world. Even with all of this, the most engaging aspect of the poem is the duality reflected in its structure: at first and on the one hand, the speaker makes quiet fun of religion; later and on the other hand, he reveals to us his own search for meaning and the answers that he realizes religion may or may not be able to give him.

The first two stanzas of "Church Going" contain a narrative of a seemingly secular man entering a church he has passed along his way. The speaker observes the layout of the building, the various accoutrements common to a church, and views it all with a mild sense of sarcasm or awkward reverence. His language almost insists on his self-proclaimed ignorance: "Someone would know; I don't" (line 12). And he foreshadows the rest of the poem when appraising the roof of the church as one would an antique: "Cleaned, or restored?" (12). At the end of the second stanza, the speaker reflects that "the place was not worth stopping for" (18). Yet stop he did, and that tells us volumes about what the rest of the poem is about.

In the third stanza, the poem's tone and the speaker's attitude shift as the speaker begins to ponder big questions about religion in today's world: Does it have any meaning left? Should it? The speaker reveals to us that he often stops at churches like these, searching for meaning, yet "Wondering what to look for" (21), not even knowing what the questions are that he wants answered. His use of words like "parchment, plate and pyx" (25) reveals to us that he is not as ignorant about religious liturgy as he would have us believe—which, in turn, is further evidence of the dual nature of the poem: the speaker wants us to believe he doesn't know or care about anything to do with religion, yet he has been on his quest for meaning long enough to know the names of things he claims he does not. The last line of the third stanza poses another compelling question, this time about the future: after churches fall out of use, "Shall we avoid them as unlucky places?" (27). The question of whether, when faith is finally dead, people will still cling to superstitions such as luck and supernatural powers of whatever nature is a fascinating one.

The speaker goes on to explore this question in the next few stanzas by imagining some specific ways in which superstition might persist after religion is gone: women might take their children to "touch a particular stone" (29) or pick herbs around the church to use for medicinal purposes. But in all these imagined examples, no one actually goes to the church to worship anymore. In stanza 4, the speaker presents various tableaux of people using the church for more and more mundane uses, such as a student of architecture, someone else who only likes to see the ruins of old buildings simply because they're old, and finally, and somewhat paradoxically, a "Christmas-addict" (43) who (presumably) wants to see the last religious remnants of his beloved, commoditized, and commercialized holiday. The last person who might visit the church in this post-religion world might even be a doppelganger of the speaker himself, who, though claiming to be "Bored" and "uninformed" (46), visits the church because "it held unspilt / So long and equably what since is found / Only in separation—marriage, and birth, / And death, and thoughts of these" (48-51). Once again the speaker insists that he is ignorant and careless of religion, but goes on to betray the fact that even if he does not believe in the religion itself, he is fascinated by the idea that it held "unspilt" what people now only find in marriages, births, and deaths: meaning. It is at this point that the reader can truly appreciate the point and purpose of this whole poem: meaning, and the search for it. It seems poignant that the speaker realizes there is more meaning in the church itself than any other place, whether actual belief in religion is there or not.

The last stanza seems to be an attempt on the speaker's part to reconcile the opposing forces of the poem—the speaker's insistence that he cares nothing for religion and that religion is meaningless anyway versus his existential need to find some kind of meaning that will justify his existence and maybe even the beliefs of others. The speaker finally respects what the church does for people, including himself: one's "compulsions meet, / Are recognised, and robed as destinies" (56-57). When one wonders if compulsions are merely that, one can go to church and be told that he or she is part of a larger whole—one's destiny. And if compulsions can be transformed into destinies, at least in the mind of the wonderer, then there will always be value in such a service: "that much never can be obsolete" (58), according to the speaker of the poem.

The last stanzas of the poem are devoted to a man who gravitates to the church because he "once heard [it] was proper to grow wise in, / If only that so many dead lie round" (62-63). Once again, the speaker shows us that even when belief in the religion associated with the church is completely gone, a sense of reverence, if only for the dead, will remain. The belief may be gone, but the sense of a community among people searching for, and perhaps finding, meaning will remain, and people will always be drawn to that, no matter what their belief system (or lack thereof).

The poem itself has another overarching concern that merits discussion: death. There are many images of or mentions of death throughout the poem: There are "flowers, cut / For Sunday, brownish now" (4-5), the words "Here endeth" (15) echoing through the small church, the possibility of someone seeing a "walking [. . .] dead one" (31), the assertion that "superstition, like belief, must die" (34), talk of the "ghostly silt / Dispersed" (46-47), thoughts of "marriage, and birth, / And death" (50-51). And finally, the last image in the poem is the abandoned church's graveyard in which "so many dead lie round" (62). Throughout the poem there is death: death of people, death of ideas, death of faith. Death's pervasiveness is one more way the poem struggles with its dual nature: the poem narrates a serious search for meaning, yet the very definition of death is that there is no meaning. Death is the end, there is nothing more. Any search for meaning is rendered meaningless anyway upon one's death. The speaker implies that there is even an end to the search for meaning itself. The speaker asks in line 35, perhaps the most powerful line of the whole poem, "And what remains when disbelief has gone?" What is left over when even "disbelief" has died? Is it the beginning of another cycle in the search for meaning, or has even the "faith" that there is nothing out there died as well?

The poem "Church Going" is a very layered, intensive look at all the things that matter to us as human beings: meaning, death, hope, hopelessness, and the way all of these things blend together in the perpetual existential crisis that is man's very existence.

20 | EXTERNAL FORM

The previous chapters have discussed many of the internal features of a poem that make it unique: the tone and characteristics of its speaker; its situation and setting and its themes; its diction, imagery, and sounds. This chapter ventures into the external form of a poem, including its arrangement on the page and into both visual and verbal units. These formal aspects are external in being recognizable; like the fashion and fabric of clothing that expresses the personality of an individual, the external form is an appropriate garb or guise for the unique internal action and meaning of the poem. When reading a poem, you might immediately notice its stanza breaks. Or you might quickly recognize that the poem takes a traditional form such as the sonnet, or that it simply looks odd. These formal features guide readers as well as poets. They help readers feel and appreciate repetitions and connections, changes and gaps, in the language as well as the meaning of the poem.

STANZAS

Most poems of more than a few lines are divided into stanzas—groups of lines divided from other groups by white space on the page. Putting some space between groupings of lines has the effect of sectioning a poem, giving its physical appearance a series of divisions that sometimes correspond to turns of thought, changes of scene or image, or other shifts in structure or direction of the kind examined in the last chapter. In Donne's THE FLEA, for example, the stanza divisions mark distinct stages in the action: Between the first and second stanzas, the speaker stops his companion from killing the flea; between the second and third stanzas, the companion follows through on her intention and kills the flea. Any formal division of a poem into stanzas is important to consider; what appear to be gaps or silences may be structural markers.

Historically, stanzas have most often been organized by patterns of rhyme, and often of meter, too; thus stanza divisions have traditionally been a visual indicator of patterns in sound. In most traditional stanza forms, the pattern of rhyme is repeated in stanza after stanza throughout the poem, until voice and ear become familiar with the pattern and come to expect it. The repetition of pattern allows us to hear deviations from the pattern as well, just as we do in music.

TRADITIONAL STANZA FORMS

As the poems in this anthology demonstrate, stanzas can take myriad forms. Over time, however, certain stanza forms have become traditional, or “fixed.” In using such stanza forms, poets thus often implicitly or explicitly allude and even respond to previous poets and poems that have used the same form. Like musicians, they also generate new effects, meanings, and music through meaningful variations on traditional forms.

Terza Rima

In the following poem, the first and third lines in each stanza rhyme, and the middle line then rhymes with the first and third lines of the next stanza.

ROBERT FROST

Acquainted with the Night

I have been one acquainted with the night.
I have walked out in rain—and back in rain.
I have outwalked the furthest city light.

I have looked down the saddest city lane.
5 I have passed by the watchman on his beat
And dropped my eyes, unwilling to explain.

I have stood still and stopped the sound of feet
When far away an interrupted cry
Came over houses from another street,

10 But not to call me back or say good-by;
And further still at an unearthly height,
One luminary clock against the sky

Proclaimed the time was neither wrong nor right.
I have been one acquainted with the night.

1928

In this stanza form, known as terza rima, the stanzas are linked to each other by a common sound: one rhyme sound from each stanza is picked up in the next stanza, and so on to the end of the poem (though sometimes poems in this form have sections that use varied rhyme schemes). Most traditional stanza forms involve a metrical pattern as well as a rhyme scheme. Terza rima, like most English fixed stanza and verse forms, involves iambic meter (unstressed and stressed syllables alternating regularly), and each line has five beats (pentameter).

As the title of the following poem announces, it, too, is written—at least mostly—in terza rima. And it depends, for its full effect, on our knowing not only that this stanza form was used by Dante in The Divine Comedy, written in Italian in the early 1300s, but also that this three-book epic depicts the poet's journey through Hell (or the inferno) and Purgatory to Paradise.

RICHARD WILBUR

Terza Rima

In this great form, as Dante proved in Hell,
There is no dreadful thing that can't be said
In passing. Here, for instance, one could tell

How our jeep skidded sideways toward the dead
 5 Enemy soldier with the staring eyes,
 Bumping a little as it struck his head,
 And then flew on, as if toward Paradise¹

2008

- What might this poem communicate—about, for example, war, poetry, and/or death—by starting out, but not ending, in terza rima?

Because terza rima requires many rhymes, and thus many different rhyme words, it is not very common in English, a language less rich in rhyme possibilities than Italian or French because it derives from so many different language families.

Spenserian Stanza

Named for Edmund Spenser, who used it to great effect in his long poem The Faerie Queene, the Spenserian stanza is even more rhyme rich than terza rima, using only three rhyme sounds in nine rhymed lines, as in this stanza from John Keats's The Eve of St. Agnes:

Her falt'ring hand upon the balustrade,	a
Old Angela was feeling for the stair,	b
When Madeline, St. Agnes' charmèd maid,	a
Rose, like a missioned spirit, unaware:	b
With silver taper's light, and pious care,	b
She turned, and down the agèd gossip led	c
To a safe level matting. Now prepare,	b
Young Porphyro, for gazing on that bed;	c
She comes, she comes again, like ring dove frayed and fled	c

Notice that while the first eight lines of a Spenserian stanza are in iambic pentameter, the ninth has one extra foot, making it iambic hexameter.

Ballad Stanza

The much more common ballad stanza has only one set of rhymes in four lines; lines 1 and 3 in each stanza do not rhyme at all. And while those lines are in iambic tetrameter (4 beats/feet), lines 2 and 4 are rhymed iambic trimeter (3 beats/feet). As its name suggests, this stanza form is often used in ballads including SIR PATRICK SPENS, which begins with the following stanza:

The king sits in Dumferling toune,	a
Drinking the blude-reid wine:	b
"O whar will I get guid sailor,	c
To sail this ship of mine?"	b

TRADITIONAL VERSE FORMS

Stanza forms are not themselves subgenres of poetry, but rather a form that can be used for various kinds of poems. The same is true of other traditional verse forms—

1. Perhaps an allusion, too, to Emily Dickinson's "Because I could not stop for Death—" (p. 872), which ends with a horse-drawn carriage driven by Death carrying the speaker "toward Eternity—" (line 24).

set patterns of rhythm and rhyme that govern whole poems or parts of them rather than individual stanzas. Three verse forms especially useful to know are the rhyming couplet, blank verse, and free verse.

Any pair of consecutive lines that share end rhymes is called a rhyming couplet. Andrew Marvell's TO HIS COY MISTRESS, for example, consists entirely of iambic tetrameter couplets, beginning with these two:

Had we but world enough, and time,	a
This coyness, lady, were no crime.	a
We would sit down, and think which way	b
To walk, and pass our long love's day.	b

A heroic couplet requires iambic pentameter, as in Alexander Pope's SOUND AND SENSE:

But most by numbers judge a poet's song,	a
And smooth or rough, with them, is right or wrong;	a
In the bright muse though thousand charms conspire,	b
Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire	b

Near the other end of the spectrum from the heroic couplet sits blank verse, which consists of lines with regular meter, usually iambic pentameter, but no discernible rhyme scheme, as in these lines, which Adam speaks to Eve in John Milton's Paradise Lost:

Well hast thou motioned, well thy thoughts employed,
 How we might best fulfil the work which here
 God hath assigned us; nor of me shalt pass
 Unpraised: for nothing lovelier can be found
 In woman, than to study household good,
 And good works in her husband to promote.

Though here used by Milton to describe lofty events of cosmic significance, blank verse was among the least formal and most natural of traditional verse forms until the explosion of free verse in the twentieth century. Now perhaps the most common of verse forms, free verse is "free" because it lacks both regular meter and rhyme. The wildly different lengths of the following lines from Helen Chasin's THE WORD PLUM make its use of free verse especially obvious:

taut skin pierced, bitten, provoked into juice, and tart flesh

FIXED FORMS OR FORM-BASED SUBGENRES

Again, all these stanza and verse forms can be used in many different kinds of poems. But some kinds or subgenres of poetry are defined wholly by their use of particular formal patterns. Perhaps the most famous of these are the sonnet and the haiku, to which we devote the albums that follow this chapter. Others include the limerick (see, for example, THERE WAS A YOUNG GIRL FROM ST. PAUL), the vilanelle (DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT, below), the palindrome (MYTH, below), and the sestina (see below). Though relatively rare for much of the twentieth century, such traditional fixed forms have in recent years become increasingly popular once again. McSweeney's Internet Tendency, the online version of the eccentric literary magazine edited by novelist Dave Eggers, included no new poetry except sestinas between 2003 and 2006, and you can still find hundreds of examples on its Web site.

You can probably deduce the principles involved in each of these fixed forms by looking carefully at an example; if you have trouble, consult the definitions in the glossary.

TRADITIONAL FORMS: POEMS FOR FURTHER STUDY

DYLAN THOMAS

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night²

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
5 Because their words had forked no lightning they
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

10 Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,
And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
15 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

And you, my father, there on the sad height,
Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.
Do not go gentle into that good night.
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

1952

- What do the wise, good, wild, and grave men have in common with the speaker's father? Why do you think Thomas chose such a strict form, the villanelle, for such an emotionally charged subject?

2. Written during the final illness of the poet's father.

Myth

I was asleep while you were dying.
 It's as if you slipped through some rift, a hollow
 I make between my slumber and my waking,
 the Erebus³ I keep you in, still trying 5 not to let go. You'll be dead again tomorrow, but in dreams you live. So I try taking you back into morning. Sleep-heavy, turning,
 my eyes open, I find you do not follow.
 Again and again, this constant forsaking.
 10 Again and again, this constant forsaking:
 my eyes open, I find you do not follow.
 You back into morning, sleep-heavy, turning.
 But in dreams you live. So I try taking,
 not to let go. You'll be dead again tomorrow.
 15 The Erebus I keep you in—still, trying—
 I make between my slumber and my waking.
 It's as if you slipped through some rift, a hollow.
 I was asleep while you were dying.

Sestina

September rain falls on the house.
 In the failing light, the old grandmother sits in the kitchen with the child beside the Little Marvel Stove, 5 reading the jokes from the almanac, laughing and talking to hide her tears.

 She thinks that her equinoctial tears and the rain that beats on the roof of the house were both foretold by the almanac,
 10 but only known to a grandmother.
 The iron kettle sings on the stove.
 She cuts some bread and says to the child,

It's time for tea now; but the child is watching the teakettle's small hard tears 15 dance like mad on the hot black stove,
 the way the rain must dance on the house.
 Tidying up, the old grandmother hangs up the clever almanac on its string. Birdlike, the almanac 20 hovers half open above the child, hovers above the old grandmother and her teacup full of dark brown tears.

 She shivers and says she thinks the house feels chilly, and puts more wood in the stove.

 25 It was to be, says the Marvel Stove.
I know what I know, says the almanac.
 With crayons the child draws a rigid house and a winding pathway. Then the child puts in a man with buttons like tears
 30 and shows it proudly to the grandmother.

 But secretly, while the grandmother
 busies herself about the stove, the little moons fall down like tears from between the pages of the almanac 35 into the flower bed the child has carefully placed in the front of the house.

Time to plant tears, says the almanac.
 The grandmother sings to the marvellous stove and the child draws another inscrutable house.

A. E. STALLINGS

Sestina: Like

*With a nod to Jonah Winter*⁴

- Now we're all "friends," there is no love but Like,
 A semi-demi goddess, something like
 A reality-TV star look-alike,
 Named Simile or Me Two. So we like
 5 In order to be liked. It isn't like There's Love or Hate now. Even plain "dislike"
- Is frowned on: there's no button for it. Like
 Is something you can quantify: each "like"
 You gather's almost something money-like,
 10 Token of virtual support. "Please like
 This page to stamp out hunger." And you'd like
 To end hunger and climate change alike,
- But it's unlikely Like does diddly. Like
 Just twiddles its unopposing thumbs-ups, like-15 Wise props up scarecrow silences. "I'm like,
So OVER him," I overhear. "But, like,
 He doesn't get it. Like, you know? He's like It's all OK. Like I don't even LIKE
- Him anymore. Whatever. I'm all like . . ."
 20 Take "like" out of our chat, we'd all alike
 Flounder, agape, gesticulating like
 A foreign film sans subtitles, fall like Dumb phones to mooted desuetude. Unlike
 With other crutches, um, when we use "like,"
- 25 We're not just buying time on credit: Like Displaces other words; crowds, cuckoo-like, Endangered hatchlings from the nest.⁵ (Click "like"
 If you're against extinction!) Like is like Invasive zebra mussels, or it's like 30 Those nutria-things, or kudzu,⁶ or belike
- Redundant fast food franchises, each like (More like) the next. Those poets who dislike Inversions, archaisms, who just like Plain English as she's spoke—why isn't "like"

4. Poet and children's book author (b. 1962); every line of his breakup poem "Sestina: Bob" (1999) ends with the word bob.

5. Some cuckoo species lay their eggs in other birds' nests.

6. Invasive plant of Asian origin, especially ubiquitous in the southern United States. Nutria: invasive species of large, semiaquatic rodent, originally from South America.

35 Their (literally) every other word? I'd like Us just to admit that's what real speech is like.

But as you like, my friend. Yes, we're alike,
How we pronounce, say, lichen, and dislike Cancer and war. So like this page. Click Like.

2013

- How does Stallings here bend sestina conventions to make her point about “real speech” (line 36) and poetry?

THE WAY A POEM LOOKS

Like stanza breaks, other arrangements of print and space help guide the voice and the mind to a clearer sense of sound, meaning, and feeling. But poems are written to be seen as well as heard, and their appearance on the page is crucial to their effect. E. E. Cummings's poem L(A, for example, tries to visualize typographically what the poet asks you to see in your mind's eye.

The unusual spacing of words in the following poem, with some run together and others widely separated, provides a guide to reading, regulating both speed and sense, so that the poem can capture aloud some of the boy's wide-eyed enthusiasm, remembered now from a later perspective. (Notice how the word “defunct” [line 2] helps establish the time and point of view.)

CONCRETE POETRY

Occasionally, poems are composed in a specific shape so that they resemble physical objects. The idea that poems can be related to the visual arts is an old one. Theodoric in ancient Greece is credited with inventing technopaegnia—that is, the construction of poems with visual appeal. Once, the shaping of words to resemble an object was thought to have mystical power, but more recent attempts at concrete poetry, or shaped verse, are usually playful exercises that attempt to supplement (or replace) verbal meanings with devices from painting and sculpture. Here are two examples.

GEORGE HERBERT Easter Wings

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,⁸
 Though foolishly he lost the same,
 Decaying more and more
 Till he became
 Most poor:
 With thee
 O let me rise
 As larks,⁹ harmoniously,
 And sing this day thy victories:
 Then shall the fall further the flight in me.
 My tender age in sorrow did begin;
 And still with sicknesses and shame
 Thou didst so punish sin,
 That I became
 Most thin.
 With thee
 Let me combine,
 And feel this day thy victory;
 For, if I imp¹ my wing on thine,
 Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

1633

- How do this poem's decreasing and increasing line lengths correspond to the meaning of the words? Why do you think Herbert has chosen to present the poem sideways?

8. In plenty. 9. Which herald the morning.

1. Engraft: in falconry, to engraft feathers in a damaged wing, so as to restore the powers of flight.

- What shapes do you see in this poem? How are repeating words or sounds significant to the speaker's apparent statements about what women "should be" or should do (line 2)?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Trace the variations in imagery of light and darkness in Thomas's DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT. How do we know that light represents life and darkness death (rather than, say, sight and blindness)? How does the poet use the strict formal requirements of the villanelle to emphasize this interplay of light and darkness? Write an essay in which you discuss the interaction of form and content in DO NOT GO GENTLE INTO THAT GOOD NIGHT.
2. Which of the poems either mentioned or reproduced in this chapter do you think makes the most effective use of any traditional stanza or verse form? Why and how so? Write a response paper in which you explore your response to the poem and how it is shaped by the poet's choice of a traditional form.
3. Write an essay analyzing what A. E. Stallings's SESTINA: LIKE suggests about social media and its effects on our language and on our sensibilities, paying special attention to the poem's play on the word "like" and with the sestina form.
4. Every poem has a particular form, whether or not it adheres to a traditional stanza or verse form or to conventional ideas about line, rhythm, or spacing. Examine closely the form of any poem in this book, including its arrangement on the page and division into lines and stanzas. How does the poet use form to shape sound, emotion, and meaning? Write an essay examining the relationship between the poem's theme and its external form.

The Sonnet

AN ALBUM

The sonnet, one of the most persistent and familiar fixed forms, originated in medieval Italy and France. It dominated English poetry in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries and then was revived several times from the late eighteenth century onward. Except for some early experiments with length, the sonnet has always been fourteen lines long, and it usually is written in iambic pentameter. It is most often printed as if it were a single stanza, although it actually has formal divisions defined by its various rhyme schemes. For more than four centuries, the sonnet has been surprisingly resilient, and it continues to attract a variety of poets. As a verse form, the sonnet is contained, compact, demanding; whatever it does, it must do concisely. It is best suited to intensity of feeling and concentration of figurative language and expression.

Conventional sonnets are structured according to one of two principles of division. The English, or Shakespearean, sonnet is divided into three units of four lines each (quatrains) and a final unit of two lines (couplet), and sometimes the line spacing reflects this division. Ordinarily its rhyme scheme reflects the structure: The scheme of abab cdcd efef gg is the classic one, but many variations from that pattern still reflect the basic 4-4-4-2 division. In the Italian, or Petrarchan, sonnet (the Italian poet Francesco Petrarch was an early master of this form), the fundamental break is between the first eight lines (called an octave) and the last six (called a sestet). Its “typical” rhyme scheme is abbaabba cdecde, although it, too, produces many variations that still reflect the basic division into two parts, an octave and a sestet.

The two kinds of sonnet structures are useful for different sorts of argument. The 4-4-4-2 structure works very well for a poem that makes a three-step argument (with either a quick summary or a dramatic turn at the end) or for setting up brief, cumulative images. Shakespeare’s THAT TIME OF YEAR THOU MAYST IN ME BEHOLD, for example, uses the 4-4-4-2 structure to mark the progressive steps toward death and the parting of lovers by using three distinct metaphors and then summarizing. In the two-part structure of the Italian sonnet, the octave often states a proposition or generalization, and the sestet provides a particular example, consequence, or application of it; alternatively, the second part may turn away from the first to present a new position or response. The final lines may, for example, reverse the first eight and achieve a paradox or irony in the poem, or the poem may nearly balance two comparable arguments or images. Basically, the 8-6 structure lends itself to poems with two points to make, or to those that make one point and then illustrate or complicate it.

During the Renaissance, poets regularly employed the sonnet for love poems; many modern sonnets continue to be about love or private life, and many poets continue to use a personal, apparently open and sincere tone in their sonnets. Time, (human) mortality, and (art’s) immortality are also conventional topics, reinforced by the form itself: Sonnets are, after all, necessarily brief (just as, they sometimes remind us, all things humans are), yet simultaneously fixed, static, even rigid in somewhat the way monuments are. Today, centuries after the sonnet’s introduction, the very fact that the form has endured so long and has been so highly revered can’t help but reinforce its association with both immortality and artistic tradition.

But poets often find the sonnet form useful for a variety of other subjects and tones. Sonnets may be about politics, philosophy, motherhood, social media. And their tones vary widely, too, from anger and remorse to tender awe or snark. Sometimes poets take the kind of comfort in the careful limits of the form that William Wordsworth describes in NUNS FRET NOT, finding in its two basic variations, the English sonnet and the Italian sonnet, a wealth of ways to organize their materials into coherent structures. Sometimes a neat and precise structure is instead altered as particular needs or effects may demand. And the two basic structures, Shakespearean and Petrarchan, certainly do not define all the structural possibilities within a fourteen-line poem.

Which of the following sonnets follow the Italian model? the English? In each case, how do form, structure, and content work together? How does each poet adapt the traditional form to his or her particular purpose? Aside from particular patterns of rhyme and meter, what other conventions of the sonnet can you identify? How do individual poems use, rework, even comment on those conventions? (To see how one student answered some of these questions by comparing sonnets by two different writers, read Melissa Makolin's essay OUT-SONNETING SHAKESPEARE . . ..)

FRANCESCO PETRARCH

Upon the breeze she spread her golden hair¹

Upon the breeze she spread her golden hair that in a thousand gentle knots was turned,
and the sweet light beyond all measure burned in eyes where now that radiance is rare;

- 5 and in her face there seemed to come an air of pity, true or false, that I discerned:
I had love's tinder in my breast unburned,
was it a wonder if it kindled there?

- 10 She moved not like a mortal, but as though she bore an angel's form, her words had then a sound that simple human voices lack;

a heavenly spirit, a living sun was what I saw; now, if it is not so,
the wound's not healed because the bow grows slack.

c. 1334–38

- What might this sonnet imply about the relationship between the speaker and the woman described? What do both structure and form contribute to that characterization?

HENRY CONSTABLE

My lady's presence makes the roses red

My lady's presence makes the roses red,
Because to see her lips they blush for shame.

1. Translated by Anthony Mortimer.

The lily's leaves, for envy, pale became,
 And her white hands in them this envy bred.
 5 The marigold the leaves abroad doth spread,
 Because the sun's and her power is the same.
 The violet of purple colour came,
 Dyed in the blood she made my heart to shed.
 In brief: all flowers from her their virtue take;
 10 From her sweet breath their sweet smells do proceed;
 The living heat which her eyebeams doth make
 Warmeth the ground and quickeneth the seed.
 The rain, wherewith she watereth the flowers,
 Falls from mine eyes, which she dissolves in showers.
 1594

- Which type of sonnet is this? How do external form and internal structure here work together?

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
 Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
 If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun,²
 If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head.
 5 I have seen roses damasked³ red and white,
 But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
 And in some perfumes is there more delight
 Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
 I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
 10 That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
 I grant I never saw a goddess go;⁴
 My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground.
 And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
 As any she belied with false compare.
 1609

- How might this poem respond to sonnets like Constable's MY LADY'S PRESENCE . . . and Petrarch's UPON THE BREEZE . . . ?

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
 Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
 But you shall shine more bright in these contents
 Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.
 5 When wasteful war shall statues overturn,

2. Mouse-colored.

3. Variegated.

4. Walk.

And broils⁵ root out the work of masonry,
 Nor Mars his⁶ sword nor war's quick fire shall burn
 The living record of your memory.
 'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity
 10 Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
 Even in the eyes of all posterity
 That wear this world out to the ending doom.⁷
 So, till the judgment that yourself arise,
 You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

1609

- How does each quatrain build on the last?

Let me not to the marriage of true minds

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
 Admit impediments.⁸ Love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover to remove:
 5 Oh, no! it is an ever-fixèd mark,
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wandering bark,
 Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.⁹
 Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
 10 Within his bending sickle's compass come;
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
 But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
 If this be error and upon me proved,
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

1609

- What might the speaker mean when he says that love doesn't "ben[d] with the remover to remove" (line 4)? How might the rest of the poem explain and develop this statement?

JOHN MILTON

When I consider how my light is spent

When I consider how my light is spent,
 Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
 And that one talent which is death to hide¹
 Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent

5. Roots of plants.

6. Mars his: Mars's. Nor: neither.

7. Judgment Day.

8. The Church of England's marriage service contains this address to the witnesses: "If any of you know cause or just impediments why these persons should not be joined together [. . .]."

9. That is, measuring the altitude of stars (for purposes of navigation) is not a way to measure value.

1. In the parable of the talents (Matt. 25), the servants who earn interest on their master's money (his talents) while he is away are called "good and faithful"; the one who simply hides the money and then returns it is condemned and sent away.

- 5 To serve therewith my Maker, and present
 My true account, lest he returning chide;
 “Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?”
 I fondly ask; but Patience to prevent²
 That murmur, soon replies, “God doth not need
 10 Either man’s work or his own gifts; who best
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
 Is kingly. Thousands at his bidding speed
 And post o’er land and ocean without rest:
 They also serve who only stand and wait.”
 c. 1652

- How might the timing of the poem’s shift to Patience (in the middle of line 8) be meaningful? Paraphrase the speaker’s question and Patience’s reply.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

Nuns Fret Not

- Nuns fret not at their convent’s narrow room;
 And hermits are contented with their cells;
 And students with their pensive citadels;
 Maids at the wheel, the weaver at his loom,
 5 Sit blithe and happy; bees that soar for bloom,
 High as the highest Peak of Furness-fells,³
 Will murmur by the hour in foxglove bells:
 In truth the prison, unto which we doom
 Ourselves, no prison is: and hence for me,
 10 In sundry moods, ’twas pastime to be bound
 Within the sonnet’s scanty plot of ground;
 Pleased if some souls (for such there needs must be)
 Who have felt the weight of too much liberty,
 Should find brief solace there, as I have found.
 1807

- What does this poem imply about the sonnet’s appeal?

The world is too much with us

- The world is too much with us; late and soon,
 Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:
 Little we see in Nature that is ours;
 We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!⁴
 5 This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon;

2. Forefall. Fondly: foolishly.

3. Mountains in England’s Lake District, where Wordsworth lived.

4. Gift. It is the act of giving the heart away that is “sordid.”

- The winds that will be howling at all hours,
 And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers;
 For this, for every thing, we are out of tune;
 It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be 10 A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
 So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
 Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
 Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
 Or hear old Triton⁵ blow his wreathèd horn.
 1807

- How does the poem characterize the “Pagan” worldview (line 10) as opposed to “ou[r]” modern one? What does it mean to “see in Nature” nothing or “Little [. . .] that is ours” (3)?

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

How Do I Love Thee?

- How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
 I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
 My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
 For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
 5 I love thee to the level of every day's
 Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight.
 I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
 I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise;
 I love thee with the passion put to use
 10 In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.
 I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
 With my lost saints—I love thee with the breath,
 Smiles, tears of all my life!—and, if God choose,
 I shall but love thee better after death.
 1850

- How many “ways” of loving does the speaker “count” in the poem (line 1)? How do these ways relate to and build on each other?

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

In an Artist's Studio

- One face looks out from all his canvases,
 One selfsame figure sits or walks or leans;
 We found her hidden just behind those screens,
 That mirror gave back all her loveliness.

5. Sea deity, usually represented as blowing on a conch shell. Proteus: an old man of the sea who (in The Odyssey) can assume a variety of shapes.

- 5 A queen in opal or in ruby dress,
 A nameless girl in freshest summer-greens,
 A saint, an angel—every canvas means
 The same one meaning, neither more nor less.
 He feeds upon her face by day and night,
 10 And she with true kind eyes looks back on him
 Fair as the moon and joyful as the light:
 Not wan with waiting, not with sorrow dim;
 Not as she is, but was when hope shone bright;
 Not as she is, but as she fills his dream.

1856

- What might this poem suggest about the relationship between painter and subject? How might the poem's form encourage us to compare painting to poetry?

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

What lips my lips have kissed, and where, and why

- What lips my lips have kissed, and where, and why,
 I have forgotten, and what arms have lain
 Under my head till morning; but the rain
 Is full of ghosts tonight, that tap and sigh
 5 Upon the glass and listen for reply,
 And in my heart there stirs a quiet pain
 For unremembered lads that not again
 Will turn to me at midnight with a cry.
 Thus in the winter stands the lonely tree,
 10 Nor knows what birds have vanished one by one,
 Yet knows its boughs more silent than before:
 I cannot say what loves have come and gone;
 I only know that summer sang in me
 A little while, that in me sings no more.

1923

- What are the poem's principal parts? Why does the Italian/Petrarchan model suit this sonnet?

Women have loved before as I love now

- Women have loved before as I love now;
 At least, in lively chronicles of the past—
 Of Irish waters by a Cornish prow
 Or Trojan waters by a Spartan mast
 5 Much to their cost invaded—here and there,
 Hunting the amorous line, skimming the rest,
 I find some woman bearing as I bear
 Love like a burning city in the breast.

I think however that of all alive
 10 I only in such utter, ancient way
 Do suffer love; in me alone survive
 The unregenerate passions of a day
 When treacherous queens, with death upon the tread,
 Heedless and wilful, took their knights to bed.

1931

- What does this poem imply about the difference between ancient and modern ways of loving?

I, being born a woman and distressed

I, being born a woman and distressed
 By all the needs and notions of my kind,
 Am urged by your propinquity to find
 Your person fair, and feel a certain zest
 5 To bear your body's weight upon my breast:
 So subtly is the fume of life designed,
 To clarify the pulse and cloud the mind,
 And leave me once again undone, possessed.
 Think not for this, however, the poor treason
 10 Of my stout blood against my staggering brain,
 I shall remember you with love, or season
 My scorn with pity,—let me make it plain:
 I find this frenzy insufficient reason
 For conversation when we meet again.

1923

- What feelings are expressed here? What does the poem imply about the source or cause of these feelings?

I will put Chaos into fourteen lines

I will put Chaos⁶ into fourteen lines
 And keep him there; and let him thence escape
 If he be lucky; let him twist, and ape
 Flood, fire, and demon—his adroit designs
 5 Will strain to nothing in the strict confines
 Of this sweet Order, where, in pious rape,
 I hold his essence and amorphous shape,
 Till he with Order mingles and combines.
 Past are the hours, the years, of our duress,
 10 His arrogance, our awful servitude:
 I have him. He is nothing more nor less
 Than something simple not yet understood;

6. In Greek mythology, the formless void preceding creation. But Millay's Chaos recalls another mythological figure, Proteus. A sea god endowed with both a knowledge of all things (past, present, and future) and the ability to assume any form in order to elude humans, he would divulge his knowledge only to a captor able to hold him fast through all his mutations—hence the English term protean.

I shall not even force him to confess;
Or answer. I will only make him good.

1923

- What might this sonnet suggest about the value or appeal of the sonnet form?

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

First Fight. Then Fiddle.

First fight. Then fiddle. Ply the slipping string
With feathery sorcery; muzzle the note
With hurting love; the music that they wrote
Bewitch, bewilder. Qualify to sing
5 Threadwise. Devise no salt, no hempen thing
For the dear instrument to bear. Devote
The bow to silks and honey. Be remote
A while from malice and from murdering.
But first to arms, to armor. Carry hate
10 In front of you and harmony behind.
Be deaf to music and to beauty blind.
Win war. Rise bloody, maybe not too late
For having first to civilize a space
Wherein to play your violin with grace.

1949

- After advising “First fight. Then fiddle,” the speaker discusses first music, then conflict. Why do you think the poet has arranged her material this way? Why a sonnet?

GWEN HARWOOD

In the Park

She sits in the park. Her clothes are out of date.
Two children whine and bicker, tug her skirt.
A third draws aimless patterns in the dirt.
Someone she loved once passes by—too late
5 to feign indifference to that casual nod.
“How nice,” et cetera. “Time holds great surprises.”
From his neat head unquestionably rises
a small balloon . . . “but for the grace of God . . .”
They stand a while in flickering light, rehearsing 10 the children’s names and birthdays. “It’s so sweet to hear their chatter, watch them grow and thrive,” she says to his departing smile. Then, nursing the youngest child, sits staring at her feet.
To the Wind she says, “They have eaten me alive.”

1963

- What is the implication of the “small balloon” (line 8) that rises from the head of the man who passes by?

JUNE JORDAN

Something Like a Sonnet for Phillis Miracle Wheatley⁷

- Girl from the realm of birds florid and fleet flying full feather in far or near weather
 Who fell to a dollar lust coffled⁸ like meat
 Captured by avarice and hate spit together
 5 Trembling asthmatic alone on the slave block built by a savagery travelling by carriage viewed like a species of flaw in the livestock
 A child without safety of mother or marriage

 Chosen by whimsy but born to surprise
 10 They taught you to read but you learned how to write
 Begging the universe into your eyes:
 They dressed you in light but you dreamed with the night.
 From Africa singing of justice and grace,
 Your early verse sweetens the fame of our Race.

1989

- Phillis Wheatley usually wrote in heroic couplets—rhyming couplets of iambic pentameter. What is the effect of Jordan’s use of dactylic meter, unusual for a sonnet?

BILLY COLLINS

Sonnet

- All we need is fourteen lines, well, thirteen now, and after this one just a dozen
 to launch a little ship on love’s storm-tossed seas, then only ten more left like rows of beans.
 5 How easily it goes unless you get Elizabethan and insist the iambic bongos must be played and rhymes positioned at the ends of lines, one for every station of the cross.
 But hang on here while we make the turn 10 into the final six where all will be resolved, where longing and heartache will find an end,
 where Laura will tell Petrarch⁹ to put down his pen,

7. African-born poet (1753–84) brought to the United States and enslaved at the age of seven or eight.

8. Chained together in a line.

9. Italian poet Francesco Petrarch (1304–74), regarded as a father of the sonnet form. Many of his love poems were inspired by Laura, who may have been the wife of a local nobleman.

take off those crazy medieval tights, blow out the lights, and come at last to bed.

1999

- In what respects is Collins's poem a traditional sonnet? In what respects is it not? What might it suggest about the relationship between love and poetry, especially as conventionally portrayed in sonnets?

HARRYETTE MULLEN

*Dim Lady*¹

My honeybunch's peepers are nothing like neon. Today's special at Red Lobster is redder than her kisser. If Liquid Paper is white, her racks are institutional beige. If her mop were Slinkys, dishwater Slinkys would grow on her noggin. I have 5 seen tablecloths in Shakey's Pizza Parlors, red and white, but no such picnic colors do I see in her mug. And in some mintyfresh mouthwashes there is more sweetness than in the garlic breeze my main squeeze wheezes. I love to hear her rap, yet I'm aware that Muzak has a hipper beat. I don't know any 10 Marilyn Monroes. My ball and chain is plain from head to toe.
And yet, by gosh, my scrumptious Twinkie has as much sex appeal for me as any lanky model or platinum movie idol who's hyped beyond belief.

2002

- How might Mullen's poem essentially "do unto" Shakespeare's My Mistress' Eyes Are Nothing Like the Sun much as Shakespeare's poem does to earlier, especially Petrarchan sonnets? What is the effect of Mullen's diction? her use of brand names? Is DIM LADY a sonnet?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Consider carefully the structure of, and sequencing in, Brooks's FIRST FIGHT. THEN FIDDLE. How do various uses of sound in the poem (rhyme, onomatopoeia, and alliteration, for example) reinforce its themes and tones? Write an essay in which you explore the relationship between sound and sense in the poem.
2. Some of the sonnets in this book, including those by Shakespeare, adhere closely to the classic English model; others, such as Milton's WHEN I CONSIDER HOW MY LIGHT IS SPENT, follow the Italian model; and some, including those by Billy Collins and June Jordan, bear only slight resemblance to either of the traditional sonnet models. Take any four sonnets in this book as the basis for an essay in which you compare the various ways poets have used the sonnet form to achieve their unique artistic purposes.
3. Several poems in this album are not only sonnets but also commentaries on the sonnet or on certain conventions associated with it such as Petrarchan "conceits" (Shakespeare's MY MISTRESS' EYES . . .) or the relation between (male) speaker and (female) subject or love object. Write an essay comparing at least two of these poems. What does each ultimately suggest about the sonnet through both its form and its content?

1. Shakespeare's sonnets frequently address or refer to the so-called Dark Lady.

Haiku

AN ALBUM

The haiku, an import into the English poetic tradition, has a long history in Japanese poetry. Originally, the haiku (then called hokku) was a short section of a longer poem (called a renga or haikai) composed by several poets who wrote segments in response to one another. Traditionally, the Japanese haiku was an unrhymed poem consisting of seventeen sounds (or, rather, characters representing seventeen sounds) and distributed over three lines in a 5-7-5 pattern—that is, five distinctive sounds in the first line, seven in the second, and five in the third. “Sounds” in the Japanese language are not exactly the same as “syllables” in English, but when English writers began to compose haiku about a century ago, they ordinarily translated the sound requirement into syllables.

Haiku aim for compression; they leave a lot unsaid. Typically, haiku describe a natural object and imply a state of mind. They usually have a “seasonal” requirement, so that each poem associates itself with one season of the year in a revolving pattern of change. This seasonal association may be suggested quite subtly and indirectly through, for example, an allusion to a seasonal flower. Haiku more generally involve descriptions of nature, reflecting the Buddhist sense of nature as orderly and benign but also contingent and transient.

When adapted into other languages and cultures, haiku cannot rely on the same spiritual assumptions or worldview, but these poems usually retain a sense of the human and natural as being mutually reflective and interdependent. Haiku often combine observation and imagination, blurring the Western distinction between seeing something literally and having some “vision” of its end or meaning.

Some of the traditional Japanese masters of haiku from the seventeenth to the early twentieth century—Bashō and Buson, for example—are represented (in English translations) in this album. So, too, are some of the many later poets and translators who have tried their hand at haiku, without always strictly observing the seventeen-syllable and three-line requirements. Some (as you’ll see) create long poems in which each stanza is a haiku. As haiku has become an international form, its conventions have, like those of other fixed forms, proven both demanding and adaptable to the particular needs of different cultural contexts, different languages, and different poets.

From “A MELUS Interview: Etheridge Knight” (1985)*

Gwendolyn Brooks. Yeah, she's the first one turned me on to haiku. She used to come visit me when I was in prison. And this is in the Sixties, remember, this is long before they had poets-in-the-prison programs and poets in schools. [. . .] She brought me some books and Japanese haiku. Years later I asked her how come and she said, “It was because you were too wordy in your poems.” And I like haiku. I try to use it, I try to follow the general form. I try to bring my own American consciousness to it. You know. [. . .] I like them because you gotta deal with the noun and the verb. You ain't got too much time to fool around with some abstractions, you know, a lot of adverbs and adjectives and stuff. But I like them.

TWAIKU

With its 280-character limit (previously 140), Twitter has given haiku a new lease on life, inspiring thousands of people around the world to try their hand at crafting what some now dub “twaiku.” You can find countless examples—on topics ranging from cats and zombies to NASCAR—online and via Facebook pages like “The Twitter Haiku Movement.” But the “movement” (if such it is) first grabbed headlines in early 2010, when Sun Microsystems’ CEO Jonathan Schwartz chose to tweet (or “twaiku”) his resignation:

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. What is gained, and what is lost, when an artistic tradition like Japanese haiku is imported, through translation, imitation, and inspiration, into another language and culture? Using the poems in this album and your own research, write an essay in which you analyze the way that haiku has established itself as part of English-language literary culture. What might be distinctive about English-language or specifically American haiku? Or how exactly have writers in this tradition adapted the form to suit and reflect a distinctively modern, Western perspective and experience?
2. As this album begins to demonstrate, haiku has proven especially attractive to twentieth- and twenty-first-century African American poets. Gwendolyn Brooks, for example, introduced the form to Etheridge Knight, and Sonia Sanchez in a sense walks in their footsteps. Using the poems in this album and your own research, write an essay in which you explore how one or two of these poets, or others, have made their own distinctive use of the form.
3. Write an essay exploring the seasonal imagery in at least three of the more traditional haiku in this album. How does each refer to a season, however indirectly? What does each manage to suggest about the particular character or feeling of that season, and how so?

Exploring Contexts

The more knowledge you have—both general knowledge and knowledge of poetic and literary traditions—the better a reader of poetry (and everything else) you are likely to be. Poems often draw on a fund of human knowledge about all sorts of things, asking us to bring to bear facts and beliefs we have acquired from earlier reading or from our everyday experiences. In the previous chapters, we have looked at how practice, specific skills, and a knowledge of basic literary terms make interpretation easier and better. This contextual section focuses more on other types of information you need to read richly and fully: information about authors and their work, about events that influenced authors or inspired their writing, and about the ways other readers and critics have interpreted the work. Poets always write in a specific time and place, under unique circumstances, and with some awareness of the world around them, whether or not they explicitly refer to contemporary matters. Poems not only refer to people, places, and events—things that exist in time—but also reflect given moments; they are the products of both the potentialities and the limitations of the times in which they are created. Many poems—like many works of drama and fiction—also have something to say about their times, as well as timeless human qualities, habits, relationships, and concerns.

What we need to bring to our reading varies from poem to poem. For example, to understand Wilfred Owen's DULCE ET DECORUM EST we need to know that poison gas was used in World War I; the green tint through which the speaker sees the world in lines 13–14 comes from the green glass in the goggles of the gas mask he has just put on. But some broader issues matter as well, such as the climate of opinion that surrounded the war and the way war had been represented in earlier literary works. No doubt you will read a poem more intelligently—and with more feeling—the more you know about its cultural, historical, and literary contexts. But at the same time, your sense of these subjects will grow as a result of reading the poems themselves sensitively and thoughtfully. Reading poetry can be a way to gain knowledge as well as an aesthetic experience. Although we don't generally turn to poetry for information as such, poems often give us more than we expect, insofar as we are aware of real-world contexts.

To get at appropriate factual, cultural, and historical information, we need to ask three kinds of questions of ourselves. The first is obvious: Do I understand all (or most) of the references in the poem? When events, places, or people unfamiliar to you come up, you will need to find out what, where, or whom they are. The second question is more difficult: How do I know, in a poem that does not refer specifically to events, people, or ideas that I do not recognize, that I need to know more? That is, when a poem has no specific references to look up, no people or events to identify, how do I know that it has a specific context? Usually, good poets will not puzzle you more than necessary, so you can safely assume that anything that is not self-explanatory merits close attention and possibly some digging in the library and/or careful Googling. References that are not in themselves clear provide a strong clue that you need more information. When something doesn't click, when the information given seems insufficient, you need to trust your puzzlement and try to find the missing facts that will help you to make sense of the poem. But how? Often the date of the poem helps; sometimes the title gives a clue or a point of departure; sometimes you can uncover, by reading about the author, some of the things he or she was interested in or concerned about. There is no single all-purpose way to discover what to look for, but that kind of research—looking for clues, adding up the evidence—can be interesting in itself and very rewarding when it is successful. The third question for every factual reference is Why? Why does the poem refer to this particular person instead of some other? What function does the reference serve?

21 | THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT: ADRIENNE RICH

Even though all poets share the medium of language and usually have some common notions about their craft, they put the unique resources of their individual personalities, experiences, and outlooks into every poem they create. A poet may rely on tradition extensively and use devices that others have developed without surrendering his or her individuality, just as any individual shares certain characteristics with others—political affiliations, religious beliefs, tastes in clothes and music—without compromising his or her integrity and uniqueness. Sometimes a person's uniqueness is hard to define. But it is always there, and we recognize and depend on it in our relationships with other people. And so with poets: Most don't make a conscious effort to put an individual stamp on their work; they don't have to. The stamp is there in the very subjects, words, images, and forms they choose. Every individual's unique consciousness marks what it records and imagines.

Experienced readers can often identify a poem as the distinctive work of an individual poet even though they may never have seen that poem before, much as experienced listeners can identify a new piece of music as the work of a particular composer, singer, or group after hearing only a few phrases. This ability depends on a lot of reading or a lot of listening to music, and any reasonably sensitive reader can learn, over time, to do it with remarkable accuracy. Yet this ability is not an end in itself; rather, it is a by-product of learning to appreciate the distinctive qualities of a poet's work. Once you've read several poems by the same poet, you will usually see some features that the poems all share. Many people have favorite poets, just as they have favorite rock groups or rap artists. In both cases, we are attracted to the artist's work because, consciously or not, we recognize and appreciate that artist's distinctive style and outlook.

The work of any writer will display a characteristic way of thinking. It will have certain identifiable tendencies. But this does not mean that every poem by a particular author will be predictable and contain all of the same features. Poets test their talents and their views—as well as their readers—by experimenting with various subjects and points of view, formal structures and devices. Like all of us, poets also grow and change over time. As readers, then, we want to strive to recognize differences, as well as similarities, among individual poems and to appreciate the ways an author's work does and doesn't change over the years.

Of what practical use is it to learn to recognize and understand the distinctive voice and mind of a particular poet? One use is the pleasant surprise that occurs when you recognize something familiar. Reading a new poem by a familiar poet can be like meeting an old friend.

In addition, just as you learn from watching other people, seeing how they react and respond to various situations and events, so you can learn from watching poets at work—seeing how they learn and develop, how they change their minds or test alternative points of view, how they discover the reach and limits of their imaginations and talents, how they find their distinctive voices and come to terms with their own identities. Each poem exists separately and individually, but the whole body of a poet's work also records the workings and the evolution of a distinctive artistic consciousness as it confronts a world that is itself perpetually changing.

Finally, the more you know about a poet and the more of his or her poems you read, the better a reader you will likely be of any individual poem by the poet. When you grow accustomed to a writer's habits and manners and means of expression, you learn what to expect. Coming to a new poem by a familiar poet, you know what to look for and have clear expectations. At the same time, you are better prepared to appreciate the surprises each poem holds in store.

THE POETRY OF ADRIENNE RICH

You will find both continuity and change, similarities and differences, in the work of any good poet, and this chapter introduces you to a great one. Adrienne Rich (1929–2012) was an especially active, prolific poet whom many readers and critics regard as the best of her generation. A careful reader of her work will find similarities of interest and strategy from her earliest poems—published shortly after World War II, in 1951—to her newest ones. A distinctive mind and orientation are at work.

But over the years Rich's work changed quite a lot, too, as she modified her views on a number of issues. Such changes were the result both of her personal experiences and of those shared experiences that helped define her era. Many of the changes in Rich's ideas and attitudes, for example, reflect changing concerns among American intellectuals (especially women) in the second half of the twentieth century, and her poems represent both changed social conditions and sharply altered social, political, and philosophical attitudes. But her poems also reflect altered personal circumstances. Rich married in her early twenties and had three children by the time she was thirty; many of her early poems are about heterosexual love, and some of them are quite explicitly about sex. Later, she was involved in a long-term lesbian relationship and wrote, again quite explicitly, about sex between women. In Rich's poems, then, we may not only trace the contours of an evolving personal life and outlook but also—and even more important for the study of poetry generally—see how changes within the poet and in her social and cultural context alter the subjects, themes, and form of her poetry.

Just as information about an author's life and times can help us in this enterprise, so, too, can the essays, letters, and interviews in which an author reflects on the character and aims of his or her poetry and on the topics the poetry explores. In the case of Rich, we have a bounty of such material from a poet who was also a remarkably prolific, articulate, and influential prose writer. Gathered at the end of this chapter are excerpts from these writings, including both essays that express Rich's outlook at a particular moment and retrospective pieces in which she reflects on the development of her work over time.

It is fitting that two of Adrienne Rich's books—A Change of World (1951) and The Will to Change (1971)—bear titles that prominently feature the word change. For change is both a consistent concern of her poetry and a hallmark of her poetic career. Published when their author was just twenty-one, poems such as AT A BACH CONCERT, STORM WARNINGS, and AUNT JENNIFER'S TIGERS seem, at first glance, preternaturally mature. With their tightly controlled structure, their regular rhythm (and, often, rhyme), and their coolly observant tone, these early poems both embody and celebrate the “discipline” that “masters feelings” and the “proud restraining purity” by which art lends order to life (“At a Bach Concert,” lines 4, 5, 11). (Versions of the word master, in fact, appear in all three poems.) Explaining why he chose A Change of World for the prestigious Yale Younger Poets Series, poet W. H. Auden singled out just such qualities and attitudes, praising Rich for a “craftsmanship” based on that “capacity for detachment from the self and its emotions without which no art is possible.” If “poems are analogous to persons,” Auden continued, then these poems are “neatly and modestly dressed, speak quietly but do not mumble, respect their elders but are not cowed by them, and do not tell fibs.”

Adrienne Rich, 1951

Less than a decade later, however, Rich began to see the very “neatness” and “detachment” of her own early poems as itself a kind of “fib.” As she put it in 1964, the early poems, “even the ones I liked best and in which I felt I’d said most, were queerly limited; [. . .] in many cases I [. . .] suppressed, omitted, falsified even, certain disturbing elements to gain the perfection of order.” From this point forward, Rich’s work attempted to do the opposite—to, in Matthew Arnold’s words, “see life steadily and see it whole,” in all its disturbing, disorderly imperfection. Indeed, one of the major themes of the later poems is both the necessity and the difficulty of breaking through the web of “myth” and illusion in order to get to “the thing itself” (DIVING INTO THE WRECK 63).

In its attempt to do just that, Rich’s work itself became less neat and orderly, less quiet, modest, and respectful. Beginning with the collection Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law (1963), the poems speak in many radically different voices and tones and take many different forms. Rich’s evolution as a poet was not a matter of pursuing any kind of single-minded mastery over her materials. “I find that I can no longer go to write a poem with a neat handful of materials and express those materials according to a prior plan,” Rich explained in 1964; “the poem itself engenders new sensations, new awareness in me as it progresses.” What results are “poems that are experiences” rather than “poems about experiences.”

In becoming more informal, exploratory, and emotional, Rich’s poems also became more personal and autobiographical, more willing to enter and lay bare what “Storm Warnings” calls the “troubled regions” of the poet’s own life, heart, and mind (28). In fact, Rich suggested that her artistic growth was, in part, a matter of closing the gap between “the woman in the poem and the woman writing the poem.” And in “Roofwalker,” a 1961 poem that articulated her new poetic ideal, Rich compares herself both to a roofer standing atop a half-built house and to “a naked man fleeing / across” those very roofs. Like both, she now dared to be “exposed, larger than life, / and due to break my neck.”

Adrienne Rich, 1966

At the same time, Rich's work also became steadily more social, political, and historical. HISTORY is, in fact, the title of one poem in this chapter and the subject of many others. As early as 1956, Rich also began to insist on the historicity of her own poems by dating each one. "It seems to me now that this was an oblique political statement," Rich insists in the 1984 essay "Blood, Bread, and Poetry": "It was a declaration that placed poetry in a historical continuity, not above or outside history." "For Rich," as one critic argues, "a deepening subjectivity does not mean withdrawal, as it did for [Emily] Dickinson, but, on the contrary, a more searching engagement with people and with social forces."

In Rich's life, as in her work, the movement into the self fueled the movement outward—into the world and back into the past—and vice versa. On the one hand, it was in part her personal feelings and experiences—the fact that she felt "unfit, disempowered, adrift" as a housewife and mother in the mid-1950s—that sent her to the work of "political" writers such as Mary Wollstonecraft, Simone de Beauvoir, and James Baldwin, and, later, into the antiwar, civil rights, and women's movements. On the other hand, it was these writers and movements that eventually encouraged her to see her "private turmoil"—indeed, her consciousness itself—as the product of historically specific social and political forces. As she explains in "Blood, Bread, and Poetry," my personal world view [. . .] was [. . .] created by political conditions. I was not a man; I was white in a white-supremacist society; I was [. . .] educated from the perspective of a particular class; my father was an "assimilated" Jew in an anti-Semitic world, my mother a white southern Protestant; there were particular historical currents on which my consciousness would come together, piece by piece. [. . .] My personal world view, which like so many young people I carried as a conviction of my own uniqueness, was not original with me, but was, rather, my untutored and half-conscious rendering of the facts of blood and bread, the social and political forces of my time and place.

Rich's mature poetry often scrutinizes the "social and political forces" that shape our lives and our relationships with one another and with the planet we inhabit. In this way, "the personal is political" for and in Rich—and so, too, is the literary. Yet her poetry works as poetry largely because in it the converse is always equally true. Her "poems compel us," as critic Albert Gelpi suggests, "precisely because [. . .] the politics [are] not abstracted and depersonalized but tested on the nerve-ends."

Despite—or even because of—all the changes, Rich's work also demonstrates a real and rare sort of consistency. From the very beginning of her career in the 1950s to her death in 2012, Rich conceived poems with a powerful sense of functional structure and cast them in lyric modes that sensitively reflect their moods and tones. She engaged readers viscerally and intellectually through vivid images. And certain images and objects—knives and coffee pots, ruins and rubble, maps and monsters, wintry weather—recur in multiple poems, binding the poems together even as they help us track a process of evolution and change that, Rich reminds us, isn't simple or straightforward. "If you think you can grasp me, think again," she warns us in the poem "Delta"; "my story flows in more than one direction."

POEMS BY ADRIENNE RICH

At a Bach Concert

Coming by evening through the wintry city
 We said that art is out of love with life.
 Here we approach a love that is not pity.

This antique discipline, tenderly severe,
 5 Renews belief in love yet masters feeling,
 Asking of us a grace in what we bear.

Form is the ultimate gift that love can offer—
 The vital union of necessity
 With all that we desire, all that we suffer.

10 A too-compassionate art is half an art.
 Only such proud restraining purity
 Restores the else-betrayed, too-human heart.

1951

Storm Warnings

The glass has been falling all the afternoon,
 And knowing better than the instrument
 What winds are walking overhead, what zone
 Of gray unrest is moving across the land,

5 I leave the book upon a pillowed chair
 And walk from window to closed window, watching
 Boughs strain against the sky

And think again, as often when the air
 Moves inward toward a silent core of waiting,

10 How with a single purpose time has traveled
 By secret currents of the undiscerned
 Into this polar realm. Weather abroad
 And weather in the heart alike come on Regardless of prediction.

15 Between foreseeing and averting change
 Lies all the mastery of elements
 Which clocks and weatherglasses cannot alter.
 Time in the hand is not control of time,
 Nor shattered fragments of an instrument
 20 A proof against the wind; the wind will rise,
 We can only close the shutters.

I draw the curtains as the sky goes black
 And set a match to candles sheathed in glass
 Against the keyhole draught, the insistent whine

25 Of weather through the unsealed aperture.
 This is our sole defense against the season;

These are the things that we have learned to do
Who live in troubled regions.

Living in Sin

- She had thought the studio would keep itself;
no dust upon the furniture of love.
Half heresy, to wish the taps less vocal,
the panes relieved of grime. A plate of pears,
5 a piano with a Persian shawl, a cat stalking the picturesque amusing mouse had risen at his urging.
Not that at five each separate stair would writhe
under the milkman's tramp; that morning light 10 so coldly would delineate the scraps of last night's cheese and three sepulchral bottles;
that on the kitchen shelf among the saucers
a pair of beetle-eyes would fix her own—envoy from some village in the moldings . . .
15 Meanwhile, he, with a yawn, sounded a dozen notes upon the keyboard,
declared it out of tune, shrugged at the mirror, rubbed at his beard, went out for cigarettes;
while she, jeered by the minor demons, 20 pulled back the sheets and made the bed and found a towel to dust the table-top,
and let the coffee-pot boil over on the stove.
By evening she was back in love again,
though not so wholly but throughout the night 25 she woke sometimes to feel the daylight coming like a relentless milkman up the stairs.

Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law

1

- You, once a belle in Shreveport, with henna-colored hair, skin like a peachbud,
still have your dresses copied from that time,
and play a Chopin prelude 5 called by Cortot:¹ "Delicious recollections float like perfume through the memory."

Your mind now, mouldering like wedding-cake, heavy with useless experience, rich with suspicion, rumor, fantasy,

1. Alfred Cortot (1877–1962), Franco-Swiss pianist and conductor.

- 10 crumbling to pieces under the knife-edge of mere fact. In the prime of your life.
Nervy, glowering, your daughter wipes the teaspoons, grows another way.

2

- Banging the coffee-pot into the sink
15 she hears the angels chiding, and looks out past the raked gardens to the sloppy sky.
Only a week since They said: Have no patience.

The next time it was: Be insatiable.

Then: Save yourself; others you cannot save.²

- 20 Sometimes she's let the tapstream scald her arm,
a match burn to her thumbnail,

or held her hand above the kettle's snout right in the woolly steam. They are probably angels, since nothing hurts her anymore, except 25 each morning's grit blowing into her eyes.

3

- A thinking woman sleeps with monsters.
The beak that grips her, she becomes. And Nature, that sprung-lidded, still commodious steamer-trunk of tempora and *mores*³ 30 gets stuffed with it all: the mildewed orange-flowers, the female pills, the terrible breasts of Boadicea⁴ beneath flat foxes' heads and orchids.

- Two handsome women, gripped in argument,
each proud, acute, subtle, I hear scream 35 across the cut glass and majolica like Furies⁵ cornered from their prey:
The argument ad feminam,⁶ all the old knives that have rusted in my back, I drive in yours, ma semblable, ma soeur!⁷

4

- 40 Knowing themselves too well in one another:

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

From “When We Dead Awaken” (1979)*

Over two years I wrote a 10-part poem called “Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law,” in a longer, looser mode than I’d ever trusted myself with before. It was an extraordinary relief to write that poem. It strikes me now as too literary, too dependent on allusion; I hadn’t found the courage yet to do without authorities, or even to use the pronoun “I”—the woman in the poem is always “she.” One section of it, #2, concerns a woman who thinks she is going mad; she is haunted by voices telling her to resist and rebel, voices which she can hear but not obey.

II, p. 574: “. . . elle arrive du fond des âges, de Thèbes, de Minos, de Chichén Itzá; et elle est aussi le totem planté au cœur de la brousse africaine; c’est un hélicoptère et c’est un oiseau; et voilà la plus grande merveille: sous ses cheveux peints le bruissement des feuillages devient une pensée et des paroles s’échappent de ses seins” [Rich’s note]. “[S]he comes from the remotest ages, from Thebes, Minos, Chichén Itzá; and she is also the totem planted in the heart of the African jungle; she is a helicopter and she is a bird; and here is the greatest wonder: beneath her painted hair, the rustling of leaves becomes a thought and words escape from her breasts” (Simone de Beauvoir’s The Second Sex, translated by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany, Alfred A. Knopf, 2009, p. 764).

PASSAGES FROM RICH'S ESSAYS

From When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision*
(1972, 1979)⁵

Most, if not all, human lives are full of fantasy—passive daydreaming which need not be acted on. But to write poetry or fiction, or even to think well, is not to fantasize, or to put fantasies on paper. For a poem to coalesce, for a character or an action to take shape, there has to be an imaginative transformation of reality which is in no way passive. And a certain freedom of the mind is needed—freedom to press on, to enter the currents of your thought like a glider pilot, knowing that your motion can be sustained, that the buoyancy of your attention will not be suddenly snatched away. Moreover, if the imagination is to transcend and transform experience it has to question, to challenge, to conceive of alternatives, perhaps to the very life you are living at that moment. You have to be free to play around with the notion that day might be night, love might be hate; nothing can be too sacred for the imagination to turn into its opposite or to call experimentally by another name. For writing is re-naming. Now, to be maternally with small children all day in the old way, to be with a man in the old way of marriage, requires a holding-back, a putting-aside of that imaginative activity, and demands instead a kind of conservatism. I want to make it clear that I am not saying that in order to write well, or think well, it is necessary to become unavailable to others, or to become a devouring ego. This has been the myth of the masculine artist and thinker; and I do not accept it. But to be a female human being trying to fulfill traditional female functions in a traditional way is in direct conflict with the subversive function of the imagination. The word traditional is important here. There must be ways, and we will be finding out more and more about them, in which the energy of creation and the energy of relation can be united. But in those earlier years I always felt the conflict as a failure of love in myself. I had thought I was choosing a full life: the life available to most men, in which sexuality, work, and parenthood could coexist. But I felt, at twenty-nine, guilt toward the people closest to me, and guilty toward my own being.

I wanted, then, more than anything, the one thing of which there was never enough: time to think, time to write. The fifties and early sixties were years of rapid revelations: the sit-ins and marches in the South, the Bay of Pigs, the early antiwar movement,⁶ raised large questions—questions for which the masculine world of the academy around me seemed to have expert and fluent answers. But I needed to think for myself—about pacifism and dissent and violence, about poetry and society, and about my own relationship to all these things. For about ten years I was reading in fierce snatches, scribbling in notebooks, writing poetry in fragments; I was looking desperately for clues, because

5. First published in College English in 1972; this version, slightly revised, is included in On Lies, Secrets, and Silence: Selected Prose: 1966–1978, W. W. Norton, 1979, pp. 33–49.

6. That is, the movement opposing the Vietnam War (c. 1955–75). Bay of Pigs: On April 17, 1961, 1,400 Cuban exiles, backed by the CIA, launched a botched invasion of Communist Cuba at the Bay of Pigs, on the island's south coast.

if there were no clues then I thought I might be insane. I wrote in a notebook about this time:

Paralyzed by the sense that there exists a mesh of relationships—e.g., between my anger at the children, my sensual life, pacifism, sex (I mean sex in its broadest significance, not merely sexual desire)—an interconnectedness which, if I could see it, make it valid, would give me back myself, make it possible to function lucidly and passionately. Yet I grope in and out among these dark webs.

I think I began at this point to feel that politics was not something “out there” but something “in here” and of the essence of my condition.

In the late fifties I was able to write, for the first time, directly about experiencing myself as a woman. The poem⁷ was jotted in fragments during children's naps, brief hours in a library, or at 3 A.M. after rising with a wakeful child. I despaired of doing any continuous work at this time. Yet I began to feel that my fragments and scraps had a common consciousness and a common theme, one which I would have been very unwilling to put on paper at an earlier time because I had been taught that poetry should be “universal,” which meant, of course, nonfemale. Until then I had tried very much not to identify myself as a female poet.

From A Communal Poetry (1993)⁸

One day in New York in the late 1980s, I had lunch with a poet I'd known for more than twenty years. Many of his poems were—are—embedded in my life. We had read together at the antiwar events of the Vietnam years.⁹ Then, for a long time, we hardly met. As a friend, he had seemed to me withheld, defended in a certain way I defined as masculine and with which I was becoming in general impatient; yet often, in their painful beauty, his poems told another story. On this day, he was as I had remembered him: distant, stiff, shy perhaps. The conversation stumbled along as we talked about our experiences with teaching poetry, which seemed a safe ground. I made some remark about how long it was since last we'd talked. Suddenly, his whole manner changed: You disappeared! You simply disappeared. I realized he meant not so much from his life as from a landscape of poetry to which he thought we both belonged and were in some sense loyal.

If anything, those intervening years had made me feel more apparent, more visible—to myself and to others—as a poet. The powerful magnet of the women's liberation movement—and the women's poetry movement it released—had drawn me to coffeehouses where women were reading new kinds of poems; to emerging “journals of liberation” that published women's poems, often in a context of political articles and the beginnings of feminist criticism; to bookstores selling chapbooks and pamphlets from the new women's presses; to a woman poet's workshops with women in prison; to meetings with other women poets in Chinese restaurants, coffee shops, apartments, where we talked not only of poetry, but of the conditions that make it possible or impossible. It had never occurred to me that I was disappearing—rather, that I was, along with other women poets, beginning to appear. In fact, we were taking part in an immense shift in human consciousness.

My old friend had, I believe, not much awareness of any of this. It was, for him, so off-to-the-edge, so out-of-the-way; perhaps so dangerous, it seemed I had sunk, or dived, into a black hole. Only later, in a less constrained and happier meeting, were we able to speak of the different ways we had perceived that time.

He thought there had been a known, defined poetic landscape and that as poetic contemporaries we simply shared it. But whatever poetic "generation" I belonged to, in the 1950s I was a mother, under thirty, raising three small children. Notwithstanding the prize and the fellowship to Europe that my first book of poems had won me,¹ there was little or no "appearance" I then felt able to claim as a poet, against that other profound and as yet unworded reality.

From Why I Refused the National Medal for the Arts (2001)*²

July 3, 1997

Jane Alexander, Chair
The National Endowment for the Arts
1100 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20506

Dear Jane Alexander,

I just spoke with a young man from your office, who informed me that I had been chosen to be one of twelve recipients of the National Medal for the Arts at a ceremony at the White House in the fall. I told him at once that I could not accept such an award from President Clinton or this White House because the very meaning of art, as I understand it, is incompatible with the cynical politics of this administration. I want to clarify to you what I meant by my refusal.

Anyone familiar with my work from the early sixties on knows that I believe in art's social presence—as breaker of official silences, as voice for those whose voices are disregarded, and as a human birthright. In my lifetime I have seen the space for the arts opened by movements for social justice, the power of art to break despair. Over the past two decades I have witnessed the increasingly brutal impact of racial and economic injustice in our country.

1. Rich won the Yale Younger Poets Prize in 1951 and traveled on a Guggenheim Fellowship 1952–53.

2. "Why I Refused the National Medal for the Arts." Arts of the Possible: Essays and Conversations, W. W. Norton, 2001, pp. 98–105.

After the text of my letter to Jane Alexander, then chair of the National Endowment for the Arts, had been fragmentarily quoted in various news stories, Steve Wasserman, editor of the Los Angeles Times Book Review, asked me for an article expanding on my reasons. Herewith the letter and the article [Rich's note].

There is no simple formula for the relationship of art to justice. But I do know that art—in my own case the art of poetry—means nothing if it simply decorates the dinner table of power that holds it hostage. The radical disparities of wealth and power in America are widening at a devastating rate. A president cannot meaningfully honor certain token artists while the people at large are so dishonored.

I know you have been engaged in a serious and disheartening struggle to save government funding for the arts, against those whose fear and suspicion of art is nakedly repressive. In the end, I don't think we can separate art from overall human dignity and hope. My concern for my country is inextricable from my concerns as an artist. I could not participate in a ritual that would feel so hypocritical to me.

Sincerely,
Adrienne Rich

cc: President Clinton

The invitation from the White House came by telephone on July 3. After several years' erosion of arts funding and hostile propaganda from the religious right and the Republican Congress, the House vote to end the National Endowment for the Arts was looming. That vote would break as news on July 10; my refusal of the National Medal for the Arts would run as a sidebar story in the New York Times and the San Francisco Chronicle.

In fact, I was unaware of the timing. My refusal came directly out of my work as a poet and essayist and citizen drawn to the interfold of personal and public experience. I had recently been thinking and writing about the shrinking of the social compact, of whatever it was this country had ever meant when it called itself a democracy: the shredding of the vision of government of the people, by the people, for the people.

"We the people—still an excellent phrase," said the playwright Lorraine Hansberry in 1962, well aware who had been excluded, yet believing the phrase might someday come to embrace us all. And I had for years been feeling both personal and public grief, fear, hunger, and the need to render this, my time, in the language of my art.

Whatever was "newsworthy" about my refusal was not about a single individual—not myself, not President Clinton. Nor was it about a single political party. Both major parties have displayed a crude affinity for the interests of corporate power, while deserting the majority of the people, especially the most vulnerable. Like so many others, I've watched the dismantling of our public education, the steep rise in our incarceration rates, the demonization of our young black men, the accusations against our teen-age mothers, the selling of health care—public and private—to the highest bidders, the export of subsistence-level jobs in the United States to even lower-wage countries, the use of below-minimum-wage prison labor to break strikes and raise profits, the scapegoating of immigrants, the denial of dignity and minimal security to working and poor people. At the same time, we've witnessed the acquisition of publishing houses, once risk-taking conduits of creativity, by conglomerates driven single-mindedly to fast profits, the acquisition of major communications and media by those same interests, the sacrifice of the arts and public libraries in stripped-down school and civic budgets, and, most recently, the evisceration of the National Endowment for the Arts. Piece by piece the democratic process has been losing ground to the accumulation of private wealth.

There is no political leadership in the White House or the Congress that has spoken to and for the people who, in a very real sense, have felt abandoned by their government.

And what about art? Mistrusted, adored, pietized, condemned, dismissed as entertainment, commodified, auctioned at Sotheby's, purchased by investment-seeking celebrities, it dies into the "art object" of a thousand museum basements. It's also reborn hourly in prisons, women's shelters, small-town garages, community-college workshops, halfway houses, wherever someone picks up a pencil, a wood-burning tool, a copy of The Tempest,³ a tag-sale camera, a whittling knife, a stick of charcoal, a pawnshop horn, a video of Citizen Kane,⁴ whatever lets you know again that this deeply instinctual yet self-conscious expressive language, this regenerative process, could help you save your life. "If there were no poetry on any day in the world," the poet Muriel Rukeyser wrote, "poetry would be invented that day. For there would be an intolerable hunger."

Art can never be totally legislated by any system, even those that reward obedience and send dissident artists to hard labor and death; nor can it, in our specifically compromised system, be really free. It may push up through cracked macadam, by the merest means, but it needs breathing space, cultivation, protection to fulfill itself. Just as people do. New artists, young or old, need education in their art, the tools of their craft, chances to study examples from the past and meet practitioners in the present, get the criticism and encouragement of mentors, learn that they are not alone. As the social compact withers, fewer and fewer people will be told Yes, you can do this; this also belongs to you. Like government, art needs the participation of the many in order not to become the property of a powerful and narrowly self-interested few.

Art is our human birthright, our most powerful means of access to our own and another's experience and imaginative life. In continually rediscovering and recovering the humanity of human beings, art is crucial to the democratic vision. A government tending further and further away from the search for democracy will see less and less "use" in encouraging artists, will see art as obscenity or hoax.

Federal funding for the arts, like the philanthropy of private arts patrons, can be given and taken away. In the long run art needs to grow organically out of a social compost nourishing to everyone, a literate citizenry, a free, universal, public education complex with art as an integral element, a society honoring both human individuality and the search for a decent, sustainable common life. In such conditions, art would still be a voice of hunger, desire, discontent, passion, reminding us that the democratic project is never-ending.

For that to happen, what else would have to change?

*From Poetry and the Forgotten Future (2006)*⁵

What I'd like to do here is touch on some aspects of poetry as it's created and received in [a] violently politicized and brutally divided world [. . .].

I'll flash back to 1821: Shelley's⁶ claim, in "The Defence of Poetry," that "poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." Piously overquoted, mostly out of context, it's taken to suggest that simply by virtue of composing verse, poets exert some exemplary moral power—in a vague, unthreatening way. In fact, in his earlier political essay "A Philosophic View of Reform," Shelley had written that "Poets and philosophers [italics mine] are the unacknowledged" etc. The philosophers he was talking about were revolutionary-minded: Thomas Paine, William Godwin, Voltaire, Mary Wollstonecraft.⁷

And Shelley was, no mistake, out to change the legislation of his time. For him there was no contradiction among poetry, political philosophy, and active confrontation with illegitimate authority [. . .].

Shelley, in fact, saw powerful institutions, not original sin or "human nature," as the source of human misery. For him, art bore an integral relationship to the "struggle between Revolution and Oppression." His West Wind was the "trumpet of a prophecy," driving "dead thoughts . . . like withered leaves, to quicken a new birth."⁸

He did not say, "Poets are the unacknowledged interior decorators of the world."

Pursuing this theme of the committed poet and the action of poetry in the world: two interviews, both from 1970.

A high official of the Greek military junta asks the poet Yannis Ritsos, then under house arrest: "You are a poet. Why do you get mixed up in politics?"

Ritsos answers, "A poet is the first citizen of his country and for this very reason it is the duty of the poet to be concerned about the politics of his country."

Second interview. The South African poet Dennis Brutus, when asked about poetry and political activity: "I believe that the poet—as a poet—has no obligation to be committed, but the man—as a man—has an obligation to be committed. What I'm saying is that I think everybody ought to be committed and the poet is just one of the many 'everybodies.'"

Dennis Brutus wrote, acted on, was imprisoned then exiled for his opposition to the South African apartheid⁹ regime [. . .].

What's at stake here is the recognition of poetry as what James Scully calls "social practice." He distinguishes between "protest poetry" and "dissident poetry": Protest poetry is "conceptually shallow," "reactive," predictable in its means, too often a hand-wringing from the sidelines.

Dissident poetry, however [he writes] does not respect boundaries between private and public, self and other. In breaking boundaries, it breaks silences, speaking for, or at best, with, the silenced; opening poetry up, putting it into the middle of life. . . . It is a poetry that talks back, that would act as part of the world, not simply as a mirror of it.

I'm both a poet and one of the "everybodies" of my country. I live, in poetry and daily experience, with manipulated fear, ignorance, cultural confusion, and social antagonism huddling together on the fault line of an empire. In my lifetime I've seen the breakdown of rights and citizenship where ordinary "everybodies," poets or not, have left politics to a political class bent on shoveling the elemental resources, the public commons of the entire world, into private control. Where democracy has been left to the raiding of "acknowledged" legislators, the highest bidders. In short, to a criminal element.

Ordinary, comfortable Americans have looked aside when our fraternally-twinning parties—Democrat and Republican—have backed dictatorships against popular movements abroad; as their covert agencies, through torture and assassination, through supplied weapons and military training, have propped up repressive parties and regimes in the name of anticommunism and our "national interests." Why did we think fascistic methods, the subversion of civil and human rights, would be contained somewhere else? Because as a nation, we've clung to a self-righteous false innocence, eyes shut to our own scenario, our body politic's internal bleeding.

9. Literally, "apartness" (Afrikaans); system of legalized racial segregation practiced in South Africa from 1948 until 1991.

But internal bleeding is no sudden symptom. That uncannily prescient African American writer James Baldwin asked his country, a quarter century ago: "If you don't know my father, how can you know the people in the streets of Tehran?"¹

This year, a report from the Bureau of Justice Statistics finds that 1 out of every 136 residents of the United States is behind bars: many in jails, unconvicted. That the percentage of black men in prison or jail is almost 12 to 1 over white male prisoners. That the states with the highest rates of incarceration and execution are those with the poorest populations.

We often hear that—by contrast with, say, Nigeria or Egypt, China or the former Soviet Union—the West doesn't imprison dissident writers. But when a nation's criminal justice system imprisons so many—often on tawdry evidence and botched due process—to be tortured in maximum security units or on death row, overwhelmingly because of color and class, it is in effect—and intention—silencing potential and actual writers, intellectuals, artists, journalists: a whole intelligentsia. The internationally known case of Mumia Abu-Jamal² is emblematic but hardly unique. The methods of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo³ have long been practiced in the prisons and policing of the United States.

What has all this to do with poetry? [. . .]

[. . . L]et's never discount it—within every official, statistical, designated nation, there breathes another nation: of unappointed, unappeased, unacknowledged clusters of people who daily, with fierce imagination and tenacity, confront cruelties, exclusions, and indignities, signaling through those carriers—which are often literal cages—in poetry, music, street theater, murals, videos, Web sites—and through many forms of direct activism.

I hope never to idealize poetry—it has suffered enough from that. Poetry is not a healing lotion, an emotional massage, a kind of linguistic aromatherapy. Neither is it a blueprint, nor an instruction manual, nor a billboard [. . .].

Walt Whitman never separated his poetry from his vision of American democracy—a vision severely tested in a Civil War fought over the economics of slavery. Late in life he called "poetic lore [. . .] a conversation overheard in the dusk, from speakers far or hid, of which we get only a few broken murmurs"—the obscurity, we might think now, of democracy itself.

But also of those "dark times" in and about which Bertolt Brecht⁴ assured us there would be songs.

1. Capital of Iran.

2. African American activist and radio journalist (b. 1954) sentenced to death in 1982 for the murder of a Philadelphia police officer; many believe Abu-Jamal was wrongfully convicted.

3. Prisons in Iraq and Cuba, respectively. Established by the United States in 2002, the Guantánamo Bay Detention Camp houses prisoners of war, mainly from Afghanistan. Between 2004 and 2006, several U.S. soldiers were convicted of torturing inmates of Abu Ghraib while that facility was jointly controlled by U.S. and Iraqi forces (2003–06).

4. In "Motto," the German poet and playwright (1898–1956) asks, "In dark times, will there also be singing?" And he answers, "yes, there will be singing. About the dark times."

Poetry has been charged with “aestheticizing,” thus being complicit in, the violent realities of power, of practices like collective punishment, torture, rape, and genocide. This accusation was famously invoked in Adorno’s⁵ “after the Holocaust lyric poetry is impossible”—which Adorno later retracted and which a succession of Jewish poets have in their practice rejected [. . .].

If to “aestheticize” is to glide across brutality and cruelty, treat them merely as dramatic occasions for the artist rather than structures of power to be revealed and dismantled—much hangs on the words “merely” and “rather than.” Opportunism isn’t the same as committed attention. But we can also define the “aesthetic” not as a privileged and sequestered rendering of human suffering, but as news of an awareness, a resistance, that totalizing systems want to quell: art reaching into us for what’s still passionate, still unintimidated, still unquenched.

Poetry has been written off on other counts: (1) it’s not a mass-market “product”: it doesn’t get sold on airport newsstands or in supermarket aisles; (2) the actual consumption figures for poetry can’t be quantified at the checkout counter; (3) it’s too “difficult” for the average mind; (4) it’s too elite, but the wealthy don’t bid for it at Sotheby’s. It is, in short, redundant. This might be called the free-market critique of poetry.

There’s actually an odd correlation between these ideas: poetry is either inadequate, even immoral, in the face of human suffering, or it’s unprofitable, hence useless. Either way, poets are advised to hang our heads or fold our tents. Yet in fact, throughout the world, transfusions of poetic language can and do quite literally keep bodies and souls together—and more.

Poetry has the capacity—in its own ways and by its own means—to remind us of something we are forbidden to see. A forgotten future: a still-uncreated site whose moral architecture is founded not on ownership and dispossession, the subjection of women, torture and bribes, outcast and tribe, but on the continuous redefining of freedom—that word now held under house arrest by the rhetoric of the “free” market. This ongoing future, written off over and over, is still within view. All over the world its paths are being rediscovered and reinvented: through collective action, through many kinds of art. Its elementary condition is the recovery and redistribution of the world’s resources that have been extracted from the many by the few.

Finally: there is always that in poetry which will not be grasped, which cannot be described, which survives our ardent attention, our critical theories, our classrooms, our late-night arguments. There is always (I am quoting the poet/translator Américo Ferrari) “an unspeakable where, perhaps, the nucleus of the living relation between the poem and the world resides.”

5. German philosopher Theodor Adorno (1903–69).

The living relation between the poem and the world: difficult knowledge, operating theater where the poet, committed, goes on working.

A POEM FOR ADRIENNE RICH

JOY HARJO

By the Way

For Adrienne Rich

- I've given it time, as if time were mine to give.
 There was a dam, larger than Hoover⁷ or the President or the patent
 For the metal creature that sucks up all the dust.
 Words had to stop and ask permission before crossing over.
 5 Oh, sometimes they were wild with the urgency of sweet
 And leaped—
 Mostly the rest were kept in the net
 Of swallowed or forbidden language.
- I want to go back and rewrite all the letters.
 10 I lied frequently.
 No. I was not O.K.
 And neither was James Baldwin,⁸ though his essays
 Were perfect spinning platters of comprehension of the fight
 To assert humanness in a black-and-white world.

6. Rich's bibliography has been abbreviated.

7. Straddling the border of Nevada and Arizona, Hoover Dam was the world's largest when it opened in 1935.

8. African American novelist, civil rights activist, and social critic whose influential essays include The Fire Next Time (1963) and the collection Notes of a Native Son (1955).

- 15 That's how blues emerged, by the way—
 Our spirits needed a way to dance through the heavy mess.
 The music, a sack that carries the bones of those left alongside
 The trail of tears⁹ when we were forced To leave everything we knew by the way—
- 20 I constructed an individual life in the so-called civilized world.
 We all did—far from the trees and plants
 Who had born us and fed us.
 All I wanted was the music, I would tell you now—
 Within it, what we cannot carry.
- 25 I talk about then from a hotel room just miles
 From your home in the East
 Before you fled on your personal path of tears
 To the West, that worn-out American Dream
 Dogging your steps.
- 30 You lived on a pedestal for me then, the driven diver¹ who climbed Back up from the abyss, Venus on a seashell² with a dagger
 In her hands,
 I had to look, and followed your tracks in the poems
 Cut by suffering.
- 35 Aren't they all?
 We're in the apocalyptic age of addiction and forgetting.
 It's worse now.
- But that dam, I had to tell you. I broke it open stone by stone.
 It took a saxophone, flowers, and your words
- 40 Had something to do with it
 I can't say exactly how.
 The trajectory wasn't clean, even though it was sure.
 Does that make sense?
 Maybe it does only in the precincts of dreams and poetry,
- 45 Not in a country lit twenty-four hours a day to keep dreams stuck
 Turning in a wheel
 In the houses of money.
- I read about transcendence, how the light
 Came in through the window of a nearby traveller
 And every cell of creation opened its mouth
 To drink grace.

That's what I never told you.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. In her 1951 poem AT A BACH CONCERT, Adrienne Rich describes "Form" as "the ultimate gift that love can offer" (line 7). What, exactly, is the case for the "discipline" of formal art argued by this poem (4)? How does Rich's later work both embody and reject formalism? Considering as evidence the selections of Rich's poetry and prose in this and previous chapters, write an essay in which you discuss how Rich's thoughts about formality and form evolved throughout her career.
2. Carefully considering plot, characterization, and structure, write an essay in which you detail the ways DIVING INTO THE WRECK is and is not typical of Rich's work.
3. In poems such as SNAPSHOTS OF A DAUGHTER-IN-LAW and PLANETARIUM, Rich considers the creative accomplishments of women throughout history. What role do these women play in Rich's poetry, separately and together? How is that role both constrained and unconstrained by their gender? Write an essay in which you examine the way Rich portrays creative women. Are they role models in her work, or something else?

4. Rich once said of her college days in the late 1940s,

I had no political ideas of my own, only the era's vague and hallucinatory anti-Communism and the encroaching privatism of the 1950s. Drenched in invisible assumptions of my class and race, unable to fathom the pervasive ideology of gender, I felt "politics" as distant, vaguely sinister, the province of powerful older men or of people I saw as fanatics. It was in poetry that I sought a grasp on the world and on interior events, "ideas of order," even power.

Using the poems by Rich included in this anthology, write an essay that charts the development of the poet's political consciousness.

5. In the prose excerpts in this chapter, Rich describes and defends the political passions that, she says, animate her life as an artist. How fully do Rich's poems embody her political beliefs, particularly her commitment to feminism? Write an essay in which you explore Rich's poetry in light of her feminist politics.
6. Choose two or more poems in this book by one author (other than Rich), and write an essay in which you draw on those poems to demonstrate either the distinctive, characteristic qualities and features of that author's work or the way your understanding of one poem by the author is altered or enhanced when you read it in conjunction with the other poem or poems.

SAMPLE WRITING: COMPARATIVE ESSAY

The student essay below was written in response to the following assignment (a more elaborate version of the last writing suggestion in ch. 21):

Your second essay for the course should be 6–9 pages long and should analyze two or more poems included in The Norton Introduction to Literature. The poems must be by the same author.

You are strongly encouraged to pay attention to how the poems' meaning and effect are shaped by some aspect or aspects of their form. Those aspects might include specific formal features such as rhyme, meter, alliteration, or assonance, and/or external form or subgenre—the fact that a poem is a Shakespearean or Petrarchan sonnet, a haiku, or a dramatic monologue, for example. (In terms of the latter, you might consider how the poem's effect and meaning are shaped by the fact that it takes a particular form.)

In her essay, student writer Melissa Makolin draws on three sonnets by William Shakespeare to argue for the distinctiveness and radicalism of the views expressed in two sonnets by another author, Edna St. Vincent Millay. In a sense, then, Makolin's essay focuses simultaneously on external form (ch. 20) and the author's work (ch. 21), even as it explores gender ("Exploring Gender: An Album") and engages in a kind of feminist criticism (see "Critical Approaches"). That's a lot to tackle in a relatively short essay, and you will no doubt find things both to admire and to criticize about Makolin's argument. At what points do you find yourself agreeing with her interpretation? disagreeing? wanting more evidence or more analysis of the evidence provided? more contextual information—about literary tradition, the author, or historical and cultural context? Where and how might the essay's logic seem faulty or its claims contradictory? In the end, what might you take away from this sample essay about how to craft an effective, persuasive argument about an author's work?

Out-Sonneting Shakespeare: An Examination of Edna St. Vincent Millay's Use of the Sonnet Form

Edna St. Vincent Millay is known not only for her poetry, but also for the feminist ideals she represents therein. She was an extremely talented poet who turned the sonnet form on its head, using the traditionally restrictive form previously used almost exclusively by male poets to express feminist ideas that were radical for her time. Sonnets, especially as written by Shakespeare and Petrarch, are often about the physical beauty of an idealized but also objectified woman, and they implicitly emphasize the man's dominance over her. Millay uses the sonnet form to assert a much different view of femininity, sexuality, and biological dominance. She uses a form known for its poetic limitations to reject social limitations. She uses a form previously used to objectify women to portray them as sexual beings with power and control over their own bodies and lives. The paradox of Millay's poetry is that she uses a poetically binding, male-dominated form to show that she will not be bound either by literary tradition or societal mores regarding inter-gender relations.

The idea of a woman seeking physical pleasure in defiance of societal constraints is one that was revolutionary when "Women have loved before as I love now" and "I, being born a woman and distressed" were published, in 1931 and 1923 respectively. They are poems about a woman's lust leading her to select a sexual partner based on her physical needs rather than on the desire for love. This is a concept that Shakespeare would have found very contentious for three reasons. First, Shakespeare did not agree with acting on lust of any kind; in fact, this is the topic of his sonnet "Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame." It is a fourteen-line treatise on the evils that result from acting on lustful urges in which Shakespeare declares,

Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame
 Is lust in action; and, till action, lust
 Is perjured, murderous, bloody, full of blame,
 Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust. (lines 1-4)

Lust, sexual or otherwise, is a pathway to a hell both religious and secular. Seventeenth-century society dramatically constricted the liberties of women in particular and didn't encourage sexual freedom for either gender.

Second, the majority of Shakespeare's sonnets simultaneously idealize and trivialize the two things they celebrate: women and love. In poems such as "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun," he treats women either as objects of an ordered, almost courtly love or as objects of mild ridicule. In this poem's first twelve lines, he mocks his mistress by describing her halitosis (7-8), referring to her breasts as "dun" (3) and her hair as "black wires" (4), references to all the contemporary conventions of beauty to which she does not conform. He not only tells her what the ideal of feminine beauty is, but also makes light of the various ways in which she does not live up to it. He justifies these hurtful insults by reassuring the poor woman that she is "as rare / As any she belied with false compare" (13-14). He mocks her appearance by telling her that she is special and beautiful in her own way only because he loves her. Insulting someone, breaking down her self-esteem, and convincing her that she could be loved by no one else are tactics used in abusive relationships to subjugate one's partner. This is not love, and the role of women in the traditional Shakespeare sonnet is far from empowered.

Third and finally, in addition to idealizing while simultaneously trivializing women, Shakespeare's sonnets also demean the concept of love. To Shakespeare, a woman is worthy of love either because she is an ideal of physical beauty or because he is noble enough to love her despite her flaws (as in "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun"). He takes this warped concept one step further, though, by creating an ideal of love that is egotistical and unhealthy for both parties. In "Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?" he spends the first twelve lines describing the ways in which this particular woman fulfills the contemporary ideals of beauty. It is clear that he ardently reveres her physical appearance, and the poem ends with the kind of declaration of personal devotion consistent with love. The turn, however, exhibits a malignant narcissism when it reassures the beloved that "So long as men can breathe or eyes can see, / So long lives this, and this gives life to thee" (13-14). The object of the speaker's affection is just that, an object that only exists as an appendage to him. Shakespeare makes it clear that it is only because of his poetic greatness that their love will persist through the ages. He uses the poetic form to relegate women to the position of objects.

The sonnets of Edna St. Vincent Millay use Shakespearean and Petrarchan forms to offer quite a different view of the role of women. She sees herself as a liberated woman, and she is not afraid to defy social conventions by taking lovers and discarding them when necessary. In writing sonnets about actively satisfying her lust, she also defies literary conventions, completely changing the male-female power dynamic of past sonnets by male writers. In "Women have loved before as I love now," Millay discusses how women throughout history have felt the same lust that she feels, but unlike other more timid and traditional women, she is willing to join the ranks of the brave women of antiquity and to satisfy her passions despite the potential cost. This poem celebrates the women who choose to act against the standards set for them. Describing them as "treacherous queens, with death upon the tread, / Heedless and wilful, [who] took their knights to bed" makes them sound heroic, and it shifts control in the sexual relationship from the man to the woman (13-14). In Millay's version, the women sexually dominate the men and temporarily free themselves from the constraints of an oppressive society. Further, by alluding to the famous females of the "lively chronicles of the past" (2), she shows not only that this behavior is natural and heroic, but also that it is historically valid. The specific women she alludes to when referring to "Irish waters by a Cornish prow" (3) and "Trojan waters by a Spartan mast" (4) are respectively Iseult, the adulteress of the classic work of medieval passion The Romance of Tristan and Iseult, and Helen of Troy (or any of the other libidinous women) of the Homeric epics.

The fact that Millay uses the sonnet form to illustrate sexual liberation is significant for several reasons. First, it shows that she understands the restrictions placed upon her, both as a poet and as a woman. Second, using the sonnet shows that she can hold her own against the great male poets and write within the boundaries that they have erected; the subject matter of her poetry shows that she chooses not to. Lastly, it is significant because, in using the sonnet form for her own feminist purposes, she directly confronts Shakespeare's one-dimensional portrayal of women by proposing her own view of ideal femininity.

The second of Edna St. Vincent Millay's sonnets that defies the ideals set forth by Shakespeare is "I, being born a woman and distressed." It is a poem about impermanent lust, not eternal love. The speaker tells her lover that her feelings are purely physical ("a certain zest / To bear your body's weight upon my breast," 4-5) and simply arise out of human biology ("the needs and notions of my kind," 2) and close quarters ("propinquity," 3). Emotional and physical needs are two things which need not be dependent on each other, and temporary desire does not have to lead to anything lasting. Consummation of a relationship was never discussed in the time of Shakespeare as a tenet of courtly love because women were supposed to be angelic ideals rather than real people with carnal desires. Millay's speaker defies these unrealistic and unattainable ideals of eternal adoration by warning her lover not to "Think" that "I shall remember you with love" (9, 11), illustrating that desire is impermanent. In fact, it is just a temporary "frenzy" and "insufficient reason" even to have a "conversation when we meet again" (13-14). Lust in Millay's world is fleeting, whereas the love of Shakespeare's world is final and complete once the man conquers all and the woman takes her place on his arm. Millay's poem might seem cynical, but it represents a more realistic view of female and male interactions; life and love are transitory and to be enjoyed in the moment because sexual urges can be sated, are biologically determined, and essential to survival, while emotional ones are (relatively) inconsequential and satisfied in other ways.

Millay draws on Shakespeare as a kind of foil by using the form so associated with his name as a vehicle for her very different views on the same topics. Millay brings sexual relationships to a far more terrestrial level with her assertions that women have primal urges that must be satisfied and that submission to ascribed gender roles is not necessary in order to obtain this satisfaction. She presents a radically modern view of relationships. She lambastes the Shakespearean paradigm of the idealized woman, a traditionally beautiful possession of the egotistical man. By using the Shakespearean sonnet form to propose her own revamped, modern vision of woman, a self-aware person who fearlessly relishes the idea of her own emotional and sexual independence, Millay redefines both "woman" and "love."

Emily Dickinson

AN ALBUM

The bee himself did not evade the schoolboy more than she evaded me; and even at this day I still stand somewhat bewildered, like the boy.

—THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON

The woman many regard as among America's most original poets was born in her family's home in Amherst, Massachusetts, on December 10, 1830. She would die in the same home at the age of fifty-five, having anonymously published only ten of the almost eighteen hundred poems her sister discovered after her death. Because she never married and rarely, if ever, ventured outside her home in the last twenty years of her life, biographers and critics often contrast the narrowness of Emily Dickinson's life with the tremendous breadth of her posthumous reputation and influence, and the brevity and emotional intensity of her poetry with its sheer formal, emotional, and intellectual audacity and range.

Yet Dickinson's life was not quite as uneventful or narrow as it might outwardly appear. She received a fairly extensive education for a woman of her era, studying classics, science, and other subjects at both Amherst Academy, which she attended for seven years, and the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (later, Mount Holyoke College), which she attended for one year. She also read widely and deeply throughout her life. Moreover, she had a great deal of indirect knowledge of public and literary affairs, including the abolitionist, feminist, and Transcendentalist movements, as well as the various theological controversies of her day. Her father was a prominent lawyer, college administrator, and politician; Emily herself maintained an avid correspondence with some ninety people and included among her friends the clergyman Charles Wadsworth, journalists Samuel Bowles and Thomas Higginson, and novelist Helen Hunt Jackson. Dickinson's friendships also ensured her a select, but astute, audience for her letters and the poems she often included in them.

Dickinson nonetheless did cultivate her privacy and independence, bequeathing us a body of poetry that is in some ways as deliberately elusive, enigmatic, and eccentric as the woman herself apparently was, even to those who knew her best. As a result, hers is also a poetry that holds especially rich rewards for readers willing both to read individual poems multiple times and to read multiple poems with an eye on the light each sheds on the others.

As you read the Dickinson poems gathered in this album and in other chapters, try to identify the various formal features and strategies that seem to you most characteristic of Dickinson's poetry, including its diction, syntax, punctuation, meter, and rhyme. Pay attention, too, to the varying tone of the poems and the persona Dickinson creates in and through them. To what extent and how and why do the speakers of these varied lyrics seem like versions of the same person? what sort of person or persons? What patterns do you notice in the objects depicted and in the topics or questions explored in these poems? What sorts of feelings are communicated, and what might the poems have to say about feeling, as well as thought and imagination? Why might (or might not) Dickinson's poems seem "torn up by the roots, with rain and dew and earth still clinging to them," as Higginson once declared? Or how might the poems help you understand what Dickinson meant when she wrote, "Tell all the truth but tell it slant— Success in Circuit lies"?

As you work to answer these questions for yourself, you may—like countless readers before you—find yourself as intrigued by the poet behind the work as by the work itself, and rightly so. Yet critic Molly McQuade's cautionary words are worth remembering: "Because [Dickinson] lived in seclusion by choice, and because her poetry also steadfastly reflects the author's coveting of privacy, to read the life in the poetry is perilous, if not impossible. Likewise, to search the life for the origins of her poetry would be treacherous."

Another factor that may make both a biographical approach to Dickinson's poetry and claims about how it changed over time unusually difficult is the fact that we cannot precisely date her poems. Instead, we have to rely on the approximate dates scholars assign based on a study of the letters and the hand-sewn books that hold the only surviving copies. In a way, then, the case of Emily Dickinson is a bit like that of William Shakespeare—one in which all that we don't know about the author makes the work all the more intriguing.

POEMS BY EMILY DICKINSON

Wild Nights—Wild Nights!

Wild Nights—Wild Nights!
Were I with thee

Wild Nights should be
Our luxury!

5 Futile—the Winds—
To a Heart in port—
Done with the Compass—
Done with the Chart!

Rowing in Eden—
10 Ah, the Sea!
Might I but moor—Tonight—
In Thee!

1861

- Whom might the speaker be addressing? What might it mean to be “Done with the Chart” (line 8)?

“Hope” is the thing with feathers—

“Hope” is the thing with feathers—
That perches in the soul—
And sings the tune without the words—
And never stops—at all—

5 And sweetest—in the Gale—is heard—
And sore must be the storm—
That could abash the little Bird
That kept so many warm—

I’ve heard it in the chilliest land—
10 And on the strangest Sea—
Yet—never—in Extremity,
It asked a crumb—of me.

1862

- What might be both expected and unexpected or surprising about the poem’s controlling metaphor and the way it develops? How might the imagery in this poem compare to that in other Dickinson poems? Or how might the use of imagery (rather than the images themselves) compare?

After great pain, a formal feeling comes—

After great pain, a formal feeling comes—
The Nerves sit ceremonious, like Tombs—
The stiff Heart questions was it He, that bore,
And Yesterday, or Centuries before?

5 The Feet, mechanical, go round—
A Wooden way
Of Ground, or Air, or Ought—
Regardless grown,
A Quartz contentment, like a stone—

- 10 This is the Hour of Lead—
 Remembered, if outlived,
 As Freezing Persons recollect the Snow—
 First—Chill—then Stupor—then the letting go—
 c. 1862

- What different metaphors and similes are used here, and what does each contribute to the poem's portrayal of how we feel "After great pain"?

I heard a Fly buzz—when I died—

- I heard a Fly buzz—when I died—
 The Stillness in the Room
 Was like the Stillness in the Air—
 Between the Heaves of Storm—
- 5 The Eyes around—had wrung them dry—
 And Breaths were gathering firm
 For that last Onset—when the King
 Be witnessed—in the Room—
- I willed my Keepsakes—Signed away
 10 What portion of me be Assignable—and then it was
 There interposed a Fly—
- With Blue—uncertain—stumbling Buzz—
 Between the light—and me—
 15 And then the Windows failed—and then
 I could not see to see—1863

- How would you describe this poem's internal structure? That is, how would you divide it into parts, and characterize the relationship between them or the way one part differs from the other? Why a fly?

My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—

- My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—
 In Corners—till a Day
 The Owner passed—identified—
 And carried Me away—
- 5 And now We roam in Sovereign Woods—
 And now We hunt the Doe—
 And every time I speak for Him—
 The Mountains straight reply—
- And do I smile, such cordial light
 10 Upon the Valley glow—
 It is as a Vesuvian face
 Had let its pleasure through—

And when at Night—Our good Day done—
 I guard My Master's Head—
 15 'Tis better than the Eider-Duck's Deep Pillow—to have shared—
 To foe of His—I'm deadly foe—
 None stir the second time—
 On whom I lay a Yellow Eye—
 20 Or an emphatic Thumb—
 Though I than He—may longer live
 He longer must—than I—
 For I have but the power to kill,
 Without—the power to die—
 c. 1863

- How does Dickinson set up and then defy expectations through the poem's controlling metaphor? How do the poem's quirks (e.g., the jerky rhythm, the strange syntax, the slant rhymes) contribute to its overall effect?

I stepped from Plank to Plank

I stepped from Plank to Plank
 A slow and cautious way
 The Stars about my Head I felt
 About my Feet the Sea.
 5 I knew not but the next
 Would be my final inch—
 This gave me that precarious Gait
 Some call Experience.
 1865

- For what does “stepp[ing] from Plank to Plank” become a metaphor in the poem? Is this experience a positive or a negative one?

Tell all the truth but tell it slant—

Tell all the truth but tell it slant—
 Success in Circuit lies
 Too bright for our infirm Delight
 The Truth's superb surprise
 5 As Lightning to the Children eased
 With explanation kind
 The Truth must dazzle gradually
 Or every man be blind—
 1872

- What meanings of the word “Circuit” (line 2) seem especially appropriate and relevant here? Why and how so?

Higgledy-piggledy
 Emily Dickinson
 Liked to use dashes
 Instead of full stops.

- What does the use of dactyls (each metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed syllables) contribute to this poem? How do this meter and the poem's other formal features underscore its depiction of both Dickinson's poetry and the attitudes of modern "Critics and editors" (line 7)?

HART CRANE

To Emily Dickinson

You who desired so much—in vain to ask—
 Yet fed your hunger like an endless task,
 Dared dignify the labor, bless the quest—
 Achieved that stillness ultimately best,

- 5 Being, of all, least sought for: Emily, hear!
 O sweet, dead Silencer, most suddenly clear
 When singing that Eternity possessed
 And plundered momentarily in every breast;
 —Truly no flower yet withers in your hand.
 10 The harvest you described and understand
 Needs more than wit to gather, love to bind.
 Some reconciliation of remotest mind—

Leaves Ormus rubyless, and Ophir¹ chill.
 Else tears heap all within one clay-cold hill.

1927

- How does the speaker characterize Emily Dickinson in the first five lines of the poem? What does the second stanza suggest about the nature of her poetry? How does the poem's form contribute to its characterization of Dickinson and her work?

1. Ormus and Ophir were cities in the Middle East legendary for their wealth and luxury.

BILLY COLLINS

Taking Off Emily Dickinson's Clothes

First, her tippet² made of tulle, easily lifted off her shoulders and laid on the back of a wooden chair.

And her bonnet,
5 the bow undone with a light forward pull.

Then the long white dress, a more complicated matter with mother-of-pearl buttons down the back,
so tiny and numerous that it takes forever
10 before my hands can part the fabric, like a swimmer's dividing water,
and slip inside.

You will want to know
that she was standing 15 by an open window in an upstairs bedroom, motionless, a little wide-eyed,
looking out at the orchard below,
the white dress puddled at her feet on the wide-board, hardwood floor.

20 The complexity of women's undergarments in nineteenth-century America is not to be waved off,
and I proceeded like a polar explorer through clips, clasps, and moorings, 25 catches, straps, and whalebone stays, sailing toward the iceberg of her nakedness.

Later, I wrote in a notebook
it was like riding a swan into the night,
but, of course, I cannot tell you everything—30 the way she closed her eyes to the orchard, how her hair tumbled free of its pins,
how there were sudden dashes
whenever we spoke.

What I can tell you is 35 it was terribly quiet in Amherst that Sabbath afternoon,
nothing but a carriage passing the house,
a fly buzzing in a windowpane.

So I could plainly hear her inhale 40 when I undid the very top hook-and-eye fastener of her corset

2. Shoulder cape with hanging ends.

and I could hear her sigh when finally it was unloosed, the way some readers sigh when they realize that Hope has feathers, 45 that Reason is a plank, that Life is a loaded gun that looks right at you with a yellow eye.

1998

- How does this poem use figures of speech to characterize the act of disrobing Dickinson? For what does that act, in turn, become a metaphor? How does the poem use allusions to specific Dickinson poems?

Chronology

- 1830 Dickinson is born on December 10 in Amherst, Massachusetts, second of the three children of Emily Norcross Dickinson and Edward Dickinson, son of the founder of Amherst College and himself both a treasurer of the college and a lawyer.
- 1841 After attending two local primary schools, Dickinson enters Amherst Academy; one of her teachers will later describe her “as a very bright, but rather delicate and frail-looking girl; an excellent scholar; of exemplary deportment, faithful in all school duties; but somewhat shy and nervous.” “Her compositions,” he added, “were strikingly original.”
- 1842–43 Dickinson’s father serves two terms as a state senator, later joining the Governor’s Executive Council (1846–47).
- 1844 After the death of a cousin, Dickinson spends a month with her aunt in Boston.
- 1847 Dickinson leaves Amherst Academy for one year at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (later Mount Holyoke College).
- 1852 Dickinson publishes the first of seven poems to appear anonymously in the local Springfield Daily Republican, a newspaper with liberal, abolitionist leanings.
- 1853–55 Dickinson’s father serves in the U.S. Congress; in spring 1855, Dickinson goes to Washington, D.C., with her father and sister, visiting a cousin in Philadelphia on the way home. Also in 1855, her elder brother, Austin, declares himself “saved,” and Emily becomes the only member of her immediate family not to undergo a similar religious conversion experience.
- 1856 Austin Dickinson marries Susan Huntington Gilbert, who will become one of Emily Dickinson’s most intimate friends and the recipient of many letters and approximately ninety poems—by far the most of any correspondent.
- 1858 Dickinson meets Springfield Daily Republican editor Samuel Bowles (1826–78), who becomes a frequent visitor.
- 1862 Dickinson initiates a lifelong correspondence with Atlantic Monthly literary editor, abolitionist, and feminist Thomas Wentworth Higginson (1823–1911);

though she will send many of her poems to Higginson, he advises against publication.

- 1864–65 Eye trouble sends Dickinson on two extended stays in Cambridgeport, where she is treated by a Boston ophthalmologist. After her return, Dickinson will seldom leave the family home, though she will receive visits from intimates including Higginson, Bowles, and the Reverend Charles Wadsworth.
- 1874 Dickinson's father dies.
- 1875 Dickinson's always-frail mother suffers a major stroke; Dickinson becomes her bedridden mother's primary caretaker.
- 1877 After the death of his wife, Judge Otis P. Lord, an old friend, engages Dickinson in what one journalist calls "an astonishingly candid, erotic correspondence," though Dickinson apparently refuses a marriage proposal.
- 1886 Fifty-five-year-old Dickinson dies at home on May 15. In an obituary, sister-in-law Susan Dickinson observes, "Very few in the village, except among older inhabitants, knew Miss Emily personally, although the facts of her seclusion and her intellectual brilliancy were familiar Amherst traditions." After Dickinson's death, her sister discovers almost eighteen hundred poems and three volumes of letters.
- 1890 Austin Dickinson's mistress, Mabel Loomis Todd (1856–1932), and Thomas Higginson coedit and publish a posthumous collection of selected poems by Emily Dickinson.
- 1891 Responding to "a constant and earnest demand by readers for further information in regard to her," Higginson publishes excerpts from selected Dickinson letters.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. One immediately apparent feature of Dickinson's poetry is her rather odd use of punctuation, especially her frequent use of the dash. Write an essay that explains how punctuation contributes to the effect and meaning of at least two Dickinson poems.
2. Write an essay exploring the various kinds of "circuits" or "circuitousness" at work in at least two Dickinson poems and the way such "circuits" contribute to the poems' success.
3. Write an essay explaining the way Dickinson's poetry is characterized in one poem about Dickinson included in this album; be sure to draw on at least one of Dickinson's poems to assess whether, why, and how that characterization seems apt.

W. B. Yeats

AN ALBUM

Mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.

—W. H. AUDEN

If it is difficult to make claims about either biographical elements in Emily Dickinson's poems or her poetry's development over time, the opposite seems true of the work of W. B. Yeats. Whereas Dickinson left us guessing about her inner life, the timing and revision of her poems, and her ideas about the nature and goals of her craft, Yeats left us a treasure trove of memoirs, essays, and manuscripts on which to draw. As such, his poetry may well move and speak to us more as we discover more about the author's personal experience and beliefs; about the order in which the poems were written (and often rewritten); and about the historical events that helped shape the author and his work. Whereas Dickinson published few poems in her lifetime and soared to fame only after her death, Yeats was a prolific and celebrated, if controversial, public figure who received the Nobel Prize for Literature some twenty-five years before his death.

William Butler Yeats was born in Dublin in 1865. Though he spent much of his youth in London and is today regarded as one of the greatest lyric poets in the English language, he is best known as the preeminent Irish poet of the twentieth century. Well versed in Irish history, folklore, and politics, Yeats attended art school for a time before devoting himself to writing poetry that was, early in his career, self-consciously dreamy and ethereal. (A great admirer of poets Percy Shelley [1792–1822] and William Blake [1782–1827], Yeats once labeled himself “the last Romantic.”) Yeats's poems became tighter, more concrete, direct, and passionate with his involvement (mainly through theater) with the Irish nationalist cause, his desperate love for the actress and activist Maud Gonne (1866–1953), his exposure to the work of the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), and his friendship with the American poet Ezra Pound (1885–1972). Yeats served as a senator in the newly independent Irish government before withdrawing from active public life to Thoor Ballylee, a crumbling, ancient tower fashioned into a home by Yeats and Georgie Hyde-Lees (1892–1968), the young Englishwoman he ultimately married.

Both Yeats and his work were profoundly shaped by shifts in the character and fortunes of Irish nationalism—both the political movement to liberate Ireland from British control and its cultural cousin, the Celtic Revival, which sought to rejuvenate a distinctively Irish literature and culture. Deeply involved in both movements in a way that his younger countryman, James Joyce (1882–1941), never was, Yeats nonetheless—at various times and in various ways—found himself in profound conflict with their aims, their methods, and their vision of both art and Ireland. Though he was particularly averse to the idea of art as propaganda, his early poetry and plays draw heavily on the oral folk traditions and rhythms to which he was first introduced during childhood visits to County Sligo and which he began to research more seriously after his introduction to Irish nationalists. Though such folk sources would become less important to his later work, Yeats strove throughout his life to preserve and reinvigorate Irish culture.

Yeats was also deeply influenced by events and movements that stretched well beyond his native country, including World War I (1914–18), the spiritualist movement, and the birth of psychology. As Yeats himself recognized, his deep immersion in the occult, as well as his lifelong search for a satisfactory belief system to replace the Protestant Christianity of his forebears, was a reaction to the materialistic, rationalistic spirit of his age (or what he called “the despotism of fact” that for him culminated in the First World War) and one common among the artists and intellectuals of his day. Ultimately, Yeats came to believe fervently in what his contemporary Carl Jung (1875–1961) labeled the “collective unconscious”—a sort of universal memory shared by all human beings—and in the idea that the poet, like the priest, the prophet, and the magician, taps into the collective unconscious and moves his audience through symbols. The comparison between priest and poet is key, for Yeats also believed that the arts, including poetry, should perform a quasi-religious function. He claimed in his essay “The Autumn of the Body” (1898) that “The arts are [. . .] about to take upon their shoulders the burdens that have fallen from the shoulders of priests, and to lead us back upon our journey by filling our thoughts with the essence of things, and not with things.” Elsewhere, he declared that he “made a new religion, almost an infallible church of poetic tradition.”

Such beliefs shape not only the complex symbolism of Yeats’s verse but also its external form. Yeats eschewed the free verse popular with his contemporaries at least in part because, as he explains in “The Symbolism of Poetry” (1900),

The purpose of rhythm [. . .] is to prolong the moment [. . .] when we are both asleep and awake, [. . .] by hushing us with an alluring monotony, which holds us waking by variety, to keep us in that state of perhaps real trance, in which the mind liberated from the pressure of the will is unfolded in symbols [. . .]. In the making and in the understanding of a work of art, and the more easily if it is full of patterns and symbols and music, we are lured to the threshold of sleep, and it may be far beyond it, without knowing that we have ever set our feet upon the steps of horn or of ivory.

To achieve those incantatory rhythms, Yeats experimented with various meters and verse forms, ranging from ballad stanza to ottava rima.

The chronology at the end of this album and the footnotes that accompany the poems will provide you with more information about Yeats, and you can find much more online and in the library. Even without that information, however, you will learn much about Yeats, his art, his beliefs, and the way all three changed over time by carefully reading the poems in this album one by one, paying attention to all that you observe, and discussing them with other readers. As you do so, consider the following questions:

- What patterns can you detect in the poems’ external form, as well as internal structure?
- Where do symbols occur and recur, and what role do they play?
- What vision of art and the artist is conveyed by both the content and the form of these poems?

- Do you agree with those scholars who see dramatic shifts of both form and content from early poems such as THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE (1890) to midcareer poems such as ALL THINGS CAN TEMPT ME (1910) and EASTER 1916 (1916) to late poems such as LEDA AND THE SWAN (1923) and SAILING TO BYZANTIUM (1927)?
- If you do detect three distinct phases and kinds of poems here, then do you think THE SECOND COMING (1919) fits more with the poems of Yeats's second or middle phase, or more with those of his third or late phase? Why and how so?
- If you see all the poems as more alike than different, what are the features that make them both alike and distinctive?

POEMS BY W. B. YEATS

The Lake Isle of Innisfree¹

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,
 And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made,
 Nine bean-rows will I have there, a hive for the honey-bee,
 And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

- 5 And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,
 Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
 There midnight's all a glimmer, and noon a purple glow,
 And evening full of the linnet's wings.

- I will arise and go now, for always night and day
 10 I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore;
 While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements grey,
 I hear it in the deep heart's core.

1890

- Why does the speaker vow to go to Innisfree, and how does the life he imagines living there compare to the one he now lives? In what ways might his imagined future seem like a return to the past?

1. Island in Lough Gill, County Sligo, Ireland.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

W. B. YEATS (1865–1939)

From The Trembling of the Veil (1922)

Sometimes I told myself very adventurous love-stories with myself for hero, and at other times I planned out a life of lonely austerity, and at other times mixed the ideals and planned a life of lonely austerity mitigated by periodical lapses. I had still the ambition, formed in Sligo in my teens, of living in imitation of Thoreau² on Innisfree, a little island in Lough Gill, and when walking through Fleet Street very homesick I heard a little tinkle of water and saw a fountain in a shop-window which balanced a little ball upon its jet, and began to remember lake water. From the sudden remembrance came my poem Innisfree, my first lyric with anything in its rhythm of my own music. I had begun to loosen rhythm as an escape from rhetoric and from that emotion of the crowd that rhetoric brings, but I only understood vaguely and occasionally that I must for my special purpose use nothing but the common syntax. A couple of years later I would not have written that first line with its conventional archaism—“Arise and go”—nor the inversion in the last stanza. Passing another day by the new Law Courts [. . .] I grew suddenly oppressed by the great weight of stone, and thought, “There are miles and miles of stone and brick all round me,” and presently added, “If John the Baptist or his like were to come again and had his mind set upon it, he could make all these people go out into some wilderness leaving their buildings empty,” and that thought, which does not seem very valuable now, so enlightened the day that it is still vivid in the memory [. . .].

The Autobiography of William Butler Yeats.* Macmillan, 1953. In this excerpt from his autobiography, Yeats describes the period in the 1880s when he was in his twenties and living in London with his family.

All Things Can Tempt Me

All things can tempt me from this craft of verse:

One time it was a woman's face, or worse—

The seeming needs of my fool-driven land;

Now nothing but comes readier to the hand

5 Than this accustomed toil. When I was young,

I had not given a penny for a song

Did not the poet sing it with such airs

That one believed he had a sword upstairs;

2. Henry David Thoreau (1817–62) spent two years living in an isolated cabin near Walden Pond, in Massachusetts, experiences described in Walden; or Life in the Woods (1854).

- Yet would be now, could I but have my wish,
 10 Colder and dumber and deafer than a fish.

1910

- In his commentary on THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE (see “Authors on Their Work,” above), Yeats suggests that over time he abandoned the archaic language and syntax, as well as subject matter, of his early verse. How might (or might not) ALL THINGS CAN TEMPT ME both exemplify and comment on that shift? How do diction and syntax contribute to the poem’s effect?

Easter 1916³

- I have met them at close of day
 Coming with vivid faces
 From counter or desk among gray
 Eighteenth-century houses.
 5 I have passed with a nod of the head
 Or polite meaningless words,
 Or have lingered awhile and said
 Polite meaningless words,
 And thought before I had done
 10 Of a mocking tale or a gibe
 To please a companion
 Around the fire at the club,
 Being certain that they and I
 But lived where motley is worn:
 15 All changed, changed utterly:
 A terrible beauty is born.
- That woman’s⁴ days were spent
 In ignorant good-will,
 Her nights in argument
 20 Until her voice grew shrill.
 What voice more sweet than hers
 When, young and beautiful,
 She rode to harriers?
 This man⁵ had kept a school
 25 And rode our wingèd horse,⁶
 This other⁷ his helper and friend
 Was coming into his force;

3. On Easter Monday, 1916, nationalist leaders proclaimed an Irish Republic. After a week of street fighting, the British government put down the Easter Rebellion and executed a number of prominent nationalists, including the four mentioned in lines 75–76, all of whom Yeats knew personally.

4. Countess Constance Georgina Markievicz (1868–1927), a beautiful and well-born young woman from County Sligo who became a vigorous nationalist. She was initially condemned to death, but her sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment, and she was granted amnesty in 1917.

5. Patrick Pearse (1879–1916), who led the assault on the Dublin Post Office, from which the proclamation of a republic was issued. A schoolmaster by profession, he had championed the restoration of the Gaelic language in Ireland and was an active political writer and poet.

6. The mythological Pegasus, a traditional symbol of poetic inspiration.

7. Thomas MacDonagh (1878–1916), also a writer and teacher.

He might have won fame in the end,
 So sensitive his nature seemed,
 30 So daring and sweet his thought.
 This other man⁸ I had dreamed
 A drunken, vainglorious lout.
 He had done most bitter wrong
 To some who are near my heart,
 35 Yet I number him in the song;
 He, too, has resigned his part
 In the casual comedy;
 He, too, has been changed in his turn,
 Transformed utterly:
 40 A terrible beauty is born.

Hearts with one purpose alone
 Through summer and winter seem
 Enchanted to a stone
 To trouble the living stream.
 45 The horse that comes from the road,
 The rider, the birds that range
 From cloud to tumbling cloud,
 Minute by minute they change;
 A shadow of cloud on the stream
 50 Changes minute by minute;
 A horse-hoof slides on the brim,
 And a horse plashes within it;
 The long-legged moor-hens dive,
 And hens to moor-cocks call;
 55 Minute by minute they live:
 The stone's in the midst of all.

Too long a sacrifice
 Can make a stone of the heart.
 O when may it suffice?
 60 That is Heaven's part, our part
 To murmur name upon name,
 As a mother names her child
 When sleep at last has come
 On limbs that had run wild.
 65 What is it but nightfall?
 No, no, not night but death;
 Was it needless death after all?
 For England may keep faith⁹
 For all that is done and said.
 70 We know their dream; enough
 To know they dreamed and are dead;

8. Major John MacBride (1868–1916), who had married Yeats's beloved Maud Gonne in 1903 but separated from her two years later.

9. Before the uprising, the English had promised eventual home rule to Ireland.

And what if excess of love
 Bewildered them till they died?
 I write it out in a verse—
 75 MacDonagh and MacBride
 And Connolly¹ and Pearse
 Now and in time to be,
 Wherever green is worn,
 Are changed, changed utterly;
 80 A terrible beauty is born.

1916

- The phrase “A terrible beauty is born” becomes a kind of refrain in this poem. What does the poem suggest about why the events of Easter 1916 and the kind of political passion and commitment that went into it were simultaneously “terrible” and “beautiful”? What do the stone and the stream seem to symbolize?

The Second Coming²

Turning and turning in the widening gyre³
 The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
 Things fall apart; the center cannot hold;
 Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
 5 The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
 The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
 The best lack all conviction, while the worst
 Are full of passionate intensity.

 Surely some revelation is at hand;
 10 Surely the Second Coming is at hand.
 The Second Coming! Hardly are those words out
 When a vast image out of *Spiritus Mundi*⁴
 Troubles my sight: somewhere in sands of the desert
 A shape with lion body and the head of a man,
 15 A gaze blank and pitiless as the sun,
 Is moving its slow thighs, while all about it
 Reel shadows of the indignant desert birds.⁵
 The darkness drops again; but now I know
 That twenty centuries of stony sleep

1. James Connolly (1868–1916), leader of the Easter uprising.

2. The Second Coming of Christ, according to Matthew 24.29–44, will follow a time of “tribulation.” In A Vision (1937), Yeats describes his view of history as dependent on cycles of about two thousand years: The birth of Christ had ended the cycle of Greco-Roman civilization, and now the Christian cycle seemed near an end, to be followed by an antithetical cycle, ominous in its portents.

3. Literally, the widening spiral of a falcon’s flight. “Gyre” is Yeats’s term for a cycle of history, which he diagrammed as a series of interpenetrating cones.

4. Or Anima Mundi (Latin), the spirit or soul of the world. Yeats considered this universal consciousness or memory a fund from which poets drew their images and symbols.

5. Yeats later wrote of the “brazen winged beast [. . .] described in my poem The Second Coming” as “associated with laughing, ecstatic destruction.”

- 20 Were vexed to nightmare by a rocking cradle,
And what rough beast, its hour come round at last,
Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?

January 1919

1920, 1921

- What vision of the contemporary world is implied by the metaphors in the poem's first half? What vision of its future is suggested in the poem's second half?

Leda and the Swan⁶

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill,
He holds her helpless breast upon his breast.

- 5 How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
And how can body, laid in that white rush,
But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?

- A shudder in the loins engenders there
10 The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?

1923

- If THE SECOND COMING predicts the end of one historical cycle and its governing (Christian) myth, LEDA AND THE SWAN imagines the beginning of the preceding cycle. How does the poem characterize that beginning? Might we again have here (as in EASTER 1916) a kind of “terrible beauty”? How would you paraphrase the question the speaker poses at the poem's end? Why might questions loom so large in this poem?

Sailing to Byzantium⁷

I

That⁸ is no country for old men. The young
In one another's arms, birds in the trees

6. According to Greek myth, Zeus took the form of a swan to rape Leda, who became the mother of Helen of Troy; of Castor; and also of Clytemnestra, Agamemnon's wife and murderer. Helen's abduction from her husband, Menelaus, brother of Agamemnon, began the Trojan War (line 10). Yeats described the visit of Zeus to Leda as an annunciation like that to Mary (see Luke 1.26–38); “I imagine the annunciation that founded Greece as made to Leda” (A Vision).

7. Ancient name of Istanbul, Turkey, the capital and holy city of Eastern Christendom from the late fourth century until 1453. It was famous for its stylized and formal mosaics; its symbolic, nonnaturalistic art; and its highly developed intellectual life. Yeats repeatedly uses it to symbolize a world of artifice and timelessness, free from the decay and death of the natural and sensual world.

8. Ireland, as an instance of the natural, temporal world.

—Those dying generations—at their song,
 The salmon-falls, the mackerel-crowded seas,
 5 Fish, flesh, or fowl, commend all summer long
 Whatever is begotten, born, and dies.
 Caught in that sensual music all neglect
 Monuments of unaging intellect.

II

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
 10 A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
 For every tatter in its mortal dress,
 Nor is there singing school but studying
 Monuments of its own magnificence;
 15 And therefore I have sailed the seas and come
 To the holy city of Byzantium.

III

O sages standing in God's holy fire
 As in the gold mosaic of a wall,
 Come from the holy fire, perne in a gyre,⁹
 20 And be the singing-masters of my soul.
 Consume my heart away; sick with desire
 And fastened to a dying animal
 It knows not what it is; and gather me
 Into the artifice of eternity.

IV

25 Once out of nature I shall never take
 My bodily form from any natural thing,
 But such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make
 Of hammered gold and gold enameling
 To keep a drowsy Emperor awake;¹
 30 Or set upon a golden bough² to sing
 To lords and ladies of Byzantium
 Of what is past, or passing, or to come.

1927

- Like THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE, this poem focuses on an imaginary journey and on a contrast between then and there versus here and now, yet this poem deals more directly with the subject of art and especially of poetry

9. That is, whirl in a coiling motion, so that his soul may merge with its motion as the timeless world invades the cycles of history and nature. "Perne" is Yeats's coinage (from the noun pirn): to spin around in the kind of spiral pattern that thread makes as it comes off a bobbin or spool.

1. I have read somewhere that in the Emperor's palace at Byzantium was a tree made of gold and silver, and artificial birds that sang [Yeats's note].

2. In book 6 of the Aeneid, the sibyl tells Aeneas that he must pluck the golden bough from a nearby tree in order to descend to Hades, the underworld. Each time Aeneas plucks the branch, an identical one takes its place.

or song; what it might be like, where it might come from, what it might do for us. How does this poem both pose and answer those questions?

A POEM ABOUT W. B. YEATS

W. H. AUDEN

In Memory of W. B. Yeats

(d. January, 1939)

I

- He disappeared in the dead of winter:
 The brooks were frozen, the airports almost deserted,
 And snow disfigured the public statues;
 The mercury sank in the mouth of the dying day.
 5 What instruments we have agree
 The day of his death was a dark cold day.
- Far from his illness
 The wolves ran on through the evergreen forests,
 The peasant river was untempted by the fashionable quays;
 10 By mourning tongues
 The death of the poet was kept from his poems.
- But for him it was his last afternoon as himself,
 An afternoon of nurses and rumors;
 The provinces of his body revolted,
 15 The squares of his mind were empty,
 Silence invaded the suburbs,
 The current of his feeling failed; he became his admirers.
- Now he is scattered among a hundred cities
 And wholly given over to unfamiliar affections,
 20 To find his happiness in another kind of wood
 And be punished under a foreign code of conscience.
 The words of a dead man
 Are modified in the guts of the living.

- But in the importance and noise of tomorrow
 25 When the brokers are roaring like beasts on the floor of the Bourse,³
 And the poor have the sufferings to which they are fairly accustomed,
 And each in the cell of himself is almost convinced of his freedom,
 A few thousand will think of this day
 As one thinks of a day when one did something slightly unusual.
- 30 What instruments we have agree
 The day of his death was a dark cold day.

II

You were silly like us; your gift survived it all:
 The parish of rich women, physical decay,

3. Paris stock exchange.

Yourself. Mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.
 35 Now Ireland has her madness and her weather still,
 For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives
 In the valley of its making where executives
 Would never want to tamper, flows on south
 From ranches of isolation and the busy griefs,
 40 Raw towns that we believe and die in; it survives,
 A way of happening, a mouth.

III

Earth, receive an honored guest:
 William Yeats is laid to rest.
 Let the Irish vessel lie
 45 Emptied of its poetry.

 In the nightmare of the dark
 All the dogs of Europe bark,
 And the living nations wait,
 Each sequestered in its hate;

 50 Intellectual disgrace
 Stares from every human face,
 And the seas of pity lie
 Locked and frozen in each eye.

 Follow, poet, follow right
 55 To the bottom of the night,
 With your unconstraining voice
 Still persuade us to rejoice;

 With the farming of a verse
 Make a vineyard of the curse,
 60 Sing of human unsuccess
 In a rapture of distress;

 In the deserts of the heart
 Let the healing fountain start,
 In the prison of his days
 65 Teach the free man how to praise.
 1939

- Does Auden's elegy as a whole affirm that "poetry makes nothing happen" (line 36)? Why does the death of Yeats seem to inspire the speaker to reflect on this possibility?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

W. H. AUDEN (1907–73)

From “W. H. Auden, The Art of Poetry No. 17” (1974)*

INTERVIEWER: How about writers as leaders? Yeats, for instance, held office.

AUDEN: And he was terrible! Writers seldom make good leaders. They're self-employed, for one thing, and they have very little contact with their customers. It's very easy for a writer to be unrealistic. I have not lost my interest in politics, but I have come to realize that, in cases of social or political injustice, only two things are effective: political action and straight journalistic reportage of the facts. The arts can do nothing. The social and political history of Europe would be what it has been if Dante, Shakespeare, Michelangelo, Mozart, et al., had never lived. A poet, qua poet, has only one political duty, namely, in his own writing to set an example of the correct use of his mother tongue which is always being corrupted. When words lose their meaning, physical force takes over. By all means, let a poet, if he wants to, write what is now called an “engagé” [“engaged”] poem, so long as he realizes that it is mainly himself who will benefit from it. It will enhance his literary reputation among those who feel the same as he does.

• • •

INTERVIEWER: Would you care to comment on Yeats?

AUDEN: I find it very difficult to be fair to Yeats because he had a bad influence on me. He tempted me into a rhetoric which was, for me, oversimplified. Needless to say, the fault was mine, not his. He was, of course, a very great poet.

*“W. H. Auden, The Art of Poetry No. 17.” Interview by Michael Newman. The Paris Review, no. 57, Spring 1974, www.theparisreview.org/interviews/3970/the-art-of-poetry-no-17-w-h-auden.

Chronology

- 1865 William Butler Yeats is born on June 13 in Dublin, Ireland, the eldest child of merchant's daughter Susan Pollexfen Yeats and well-known, but often financially strapped, lawyer-turned-painter John Butler Yeats.
- 1867 To further his career as an artist, John Yeats moves his family to London.
- 1872 Yeats, with his mother and siblings, spends two years at his maternal grandparents' home in Sligo, on Ireland's rural west coast.
- 1874 Yeats returns to London with his family and attends the Godolphin School.
- 1880 Financial difficulties force John Yeats to move his family back to Dublin, where his eldest son attends a local high school.

- 1884 Yeats enters Dublin's Metropolitan School of Art, where he will study until 1886. With fellow writer and art student George Russell (known as "AE"), Yeats begins his research into spiritualism and the occult.
- 1885 Yeats meets Irish nationalist John O'Leary and, with O'Leary's help, publishes his first poems in the Dublin University Review. (In a 1907 essay, Yeats will describe O'Leary as championing the "romantic" and "idealistic" "conception of Irish nationality [. . .] in whose service I labour.")
- 1887 Yeats returns to London with his family and edits Poems and Ballads of Young Ireland.
- 1888 Yeats joins the spiritualist Theosophical Society and edits Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry.
- 1889 Yeats publishes his first volume of poetry, The Wanderings of Oisín and Other Poems, and meets and falls in love with the actress and Irish revolutionary Maud Gonne.
- 1891 Gonne rejects the first of at least three marriage proposals from Yeats.
- 1892 Yeats and others found the London-based Irish Literary Society, and Yeats publishes The Countess Cathleen and Various Legends and Lyrics, a collection of plays and poems.
- 1893 Yeats publishes an edition of William Blake's poems and a prose work, The Celtic Twilight.
- 1895 Yeats publishes Poems, which includes revised versions of works in his first two collections and which is sometimes said to mark the end of his early period.
- 1896 Yeats meets fellow writer and Celtic Revivalist Lady Augusta Gregory and begins to spend holidays at her estate, Coole Park, in rural County Galway, Ireland.
- 1899 Yeats and Lady Gregory found the Irish Literary Theatre, later called the Abbey Theatre, in Dublin, which produces his Countess Cathleen.
- 1902 Maud Gonne stars in Yeats's Cathleen ni Houlihan.
- 1903 Gonne marries war veteran John MacBride, from whom she will separate in 1905.
- 1904 Yeats's middle period arguably begins with the publication of the collection In the Seven Woods. He begins a six-year stint as manager of the Abbey Theatre, coming into conflict both with conservative Catholics offended by the supposed immorality and impiety of Abbey productions and with Irish nationalists convinced that Abbey plays should promote a wholly positive view of Ireland and the Irish.
- 1907 An Abbey performance of J. M. Synge's The Playboy of the Western World sparks riots over its supposedly negative portrayal of the Irish.
- 1913 Yeats spends the first of three winters with the young American poet Ezra Pound.
- 1914 World War I begins (in August). Yeats publishes Responsibilities, his first pointedly modernist, as well as avowedly public and political, poetry collection.
- 1916 In London, Yeats debuts At the Hawk's Well, the first of his plays influenced by Japanese Noh drama (rather than Irish history and legend), and publishes Reveries of Childhood and Youth, the first volume of his autobiography. In April, Irish nationalists stage the Easter Uprising in Dublin. Proclaiming Ireland an independent republic, the seven hundred volunteers are defeated by British troops after a week of bloody fighting; their leaders, including John MacBride, are executed for treason in May. Yeats proposes to Maud Gonne for the last time.

- 1917 The Russian Revolution begins, and T. S. Eliot publishes his first poetry collection, which includes The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock and which, Yeats later claimed, announced the birth of a new, self-consciously “modern” poetry that he “disliked” and yet admired for its “satiric intensity.” Yeats marries Georgie Hyde-Lees; while still on their honeymoon, Georgie begins the spirit-inspired automatic writing that will be the basis for A Vision (1925).
- 1918 World War I ends. Yeats and his wife move to Thoor (literally, “Castle”) Ballylee, an ancient Norman tower near Lady Gregory’s estate; the tower and its winding staircase will become a central symbol in his later poetry.
- 1919 In January, Russian revolutionaries kill four grand dukes, bringing to seventeen the number of members of the former Russian emperor’s family to die in the revolution. Yeats writes “The Second Coming” and publishes The Wild Swans at Coole, the last collection of his so-called middle period. His first child, a daughter, is born in Dublin. Ireland enters a period of civil unrest.
- 1921 A truce brings temporary peace to Ireland. Yeats’s second child, a son, is born, and Yeats publishes the poetry collection Michael Robartes and the Dancer.
- 1922 Irish Civil War begins. Yeats’s father dies. Yeats publishes The Trembling of the Veil, the second volume of his autobiography, and begins a six-year stint as a senator in the first Irish government.
- 1923 Yeats wins the Nobel Prize for Literature.
- 1925 Yeats publishes A Vision, a work of nonfiction outlining his system of symbols and cyclical vision of history.
- 1928 Yeats publishes The Tower and resigns from the Irish Senate.
- 1933 Yeats publishes The Winding Stair and Other Poems.
- 1939 At seventy-three, Yeats dies in France on January 28. World War II begins.
- 1948 Yeats’s remains are returned to Ireland and buried in County Sligo under a stone bearing the epitaph he composed: “Cast a cold eye / On Life, on Death. / Horseman, pass by!”

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write an essay in which you compare THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE and SAILING TO BYZANTIUM in order to show how Yeats’s poetry both did and didn’t change over the course of his career. How might the first of these poems seem like the work of a young man and poet, and the latter like that of a mature or even elderly one?
2. Write an essay that explains the significance of any one recurring image or symbol, or set of related images or symbols, in at least two Yeats poems. Alternatively, use your essay to explore why terror and beauty seem to go together in Yeats’s poems.
3. Drawing on at least three poems, write an essay explaining whether and how Yeats’s poetry seems distinctly “Irish.” How, for example, might the troubled history of his native country or his own troubled relationship to Irish nationalism, as well as the middle-class Irish public, be explored in the poems, including the later ones that outwardly seem resolutely non-Irish in content and form?

4. Write an essay comparing the way W. H. Auden's poem about Yeats portrays the nature, source, and function of poetry to the way Yeats's poems, such as SAILING TO BYZANTIUM, do. Alternatively, compare the way each poet handles the contrast between physical, mortal life and "decay" (Auden, line 33), on the one hand, and the life lived in the imagination and poetry, on the other. Do the two poets seem to agree about the immortality and importance of poetry?

Pat Mora

AN ALBUM

Award-winning contemporary writer Pat Mora was born in 1942 in El Paso, Texas, a city on the Mexican border to which all four of her Spanish-speaking grandparents migrated during the Mexican Revolution. After earning a BA and MA from the University of Texas, El Paso, she taught both high-school and college English but did not devote herself seriously to writing until after her 1981 divorce, when, as she once joked to an interviewer, “I saw the age of forty coming for me.” In the years since, she has seen her three children into adulthood; remarried; and left Texas for Cincinnati, Ohio, and Santa Fe, New Mexico (her two current homes). She has also flourished as a writer, publishing collections of poetry including Borders (1986), Agua Santa/Holy Water (1995), Aunt Carmen’s Book of Practical Saints (1997), and Adobe Odes (2007); a book of essays, Nepantla: Essays from the Land in the Middle (1993); a family memoir, House of Houses (1997); and over twenty-five books for children and young adults, including poetry, picture books, biographies, and retellings of Mayan folktales.

Avowing that she “take[s] pride in being a Hispanic writer,” Mora sees her work for both children and adults as bound up with the effort to promote literacy, a wider knowledge and appreciation of Hispanic culture and heritage, and cross-cultural understanding. In Nepantla, she likens the work of the poet to that of the curandera, or traditional healer, sounding not unlike poet W. B. Yeats when she argues that [t]he Chicana writer seeks to heal cultural wounds of historical neglect by providing opportunities to remember the past, to share and ease bitterness, to describe what has been viewed as unworthy of description, to cure by incantations and rhythms, by listening with her entire being and responding. She then gathers the tales and myths, weaves them together, and, if lucky, casts spells.

Though she makes frequent use of Spanish terms and phrases in her work, Mora writes primarily in English because she is, in her own words, “bilingual, though English-dominant,” living on the figurative border between languages and cultures or in what she calls “the land in the middle.” Much of her work explores that land. Yet in interviews, Mora roundly rejects the idea that the experience of living “in the middle” is necessarily negative. Rather, she insists that, while “there are situations where, yes, it’s plenty difficult” or where she is uncertain about where she belongs or who she is, there is also a flip side: “it’s double pleasure in a way,” offering “the advantage of moving back and forth.” As Mora also suggests, people from all backgrounds “experience borders of many kinds throughout life.” And by exploring some of these divides—between men and women, for example, or among different generations—Mora’s work stresses the ubiquity and even universality of the border experience, as well as the pleasures and conflicts it entails.

Literal, physical borders in particular and space and place in general also intrigue Mora—all the more, she suggests, since a 1989 move from the Southwest to the Midwest heightened her awareness of both the distinctiveness of her native landscape and her own relationship to it. Whenever she flew west, she explained to one interviewer,

I would look out at this tremendous space and think how totally I felt at home there. Many of my Midwestern friends would confide to me that they found the desert sometimes even terrifying. I remember one of the brightest women I know who is an academic in Cincinnati said to me that the first time she came to the Southwest she was afraid she would fall off because she was so used to the protection of trees [. . .]. Our early geography shapes us in complex ways.

Geography, landscape, and the immigrant experience are only some of the many things you will find to explore in Mora's poems, including those gathered in this album and in other chapters. What might her poems individually and collectively suggest about what both is and isn't unique about the Mexican American experience? about the positive and negative aspects of living "in the land of the middle"? about what unites and divides Mexican Americans of different classes, generations, and genders? about family? about the power and the limits of language? In what ways might Mora's poems perform the curandera-like work she ascribes to the poet in Nepantla?

Elena

My Spanish isn't enough.
 I remember how I'd smile
 listening to my little ones, understanding every word they'd say,
 5 their jokes, their songs, their plots.
 *Vamos a pedirle dulces a mamá. Vamos.*¹
 But that was in Mexico.
 Now my children go to American high schools.
 They speak English. At night they sit around 10 the kitchen table, laugh with one another.
 I stand by the stove and feel dumb, alone.
 I bought a book to learn English.
 My husband frowned, drank more beer.
 My oldest said, "Mamá, he doesn't want you 15 to be smarter than he is." I'm forty, embarrassed at mispronouncing words,
 embarrassed at the laughter of my children, the grocer, the mailman. Sometimes I take my English book and lock myself in the bathroom, 20 say the thick words softly, for if I stop trying, I will be deaf
 when my children need my help.

1985

- What does the speaker mean by the first line—"My Spanish isn't enough"? What other words in the poem address the inadequacy of language?

1. Let's go ask mama for sweets. Let's go (Spanish).

Gentle Communion

Even the long-dead are willing to move.
Without a word, she came with me from the desert.
Mornings she wanders through my rooms making beds, folding socks.

5 Since she can't hear me anymore,
Mamande² ignores the questions I never knew to ask, about her younger days, her red hair, the time she fell and broke her nose in the snow. I will never know.

10 When I try to make her laugh, to disprove her sad album face, she leaves the room, resists me as she resisted grinning for cameras, make-up, English.

While I write, she sits and prays,
15 feet apart, legs never crossed,
the blue housecoat buttoned high as her hair dries white, girlish around her head and shoulders.

She closes her eyes, bows her head,
20 and like a child presses her hands together, her patient flesh steeple, the skin worn, like the pages of her prayer book.

Sometimes I sit in her wide-armed chair as I once sat in her lap.

25 Alone, we played a quiet I Spy.
She peeled grapes I still taste.

She removes the thin skin, places
the luminous coolness on my tongue.
I know not to bite or chew. I wait 30 for the thick melt,
our private green honey.

- How does this poem draw on the various meanings of the word communion? Why might it be significant that the grandmother comes “Without a word” (line 2)?

- How does the poem's form, especially its visual appearance and rhythm, contribute to its characterization of the mother-daughter relationship?

La Migra

Let's play *La Migra*³
 I'll be the Border Patrol.
 You be the Mexican maid.
 I get the badge and sunglasses.

5 You can hide and run,
 but you can't get away
 because I have a jeep
 I can take you wherever
 I want, but don't ask 10 questions because
 I don't speak Spanish.
 I can touch you wherever
 I want but don't complain too much because I've got and I have handcuffs.

I'll be the Mexican woman.
Your jeep has a flat,
and you have been spotted

25 All you have is heavy: hat, glasses, badge, shoes, gun.
I know this desert,
where to rest,
where to drink.
30 Oh, I am not alone.
You hear us singing
and laughing with the wind,
Agua dulce brota aquí,
*aquí, aquí,*⁴ but since you 35 can't speak Spanish,
you do not understand.
Get ready.

- To what is adobe compared in the poem? How do these comparisons work together to characterize both the adobe and the life lived within it?

Chronology

- 1942 Pat Mora is born on January 19 in El Paso, Texas, to Raul Antonio Mora, an optician, and his wife, Estela; both are bilingual, second-generation El Pasoans of Mexican descent.
- 1963 Mora marries William H. Burnside, Jr., with whom she will have a son and two daughters; earns her BA from Texas Western College (now the University of Texas, El Paso, or UTEP); and begins a three-year stint teaching in the El Paso Independent School District.
- 1967 Mora earns her MA from UTEP.
- 1971 Mora begins working as a part-time English and communications instructor at El Paso Community College.
- 1979 Mora begins working as a part-time English instructor at UTEP.
- 1981 After her first marriage ends in divorce, Mora devotes more time to writing, while also working as assistant to UTEP's Vice President of Academic Affairs.
- 1984 Mora marries Vernon Lee Scarborough, an archaeologist teaching at UTEP, and publishes her first poetry collection, Chants, winner of the Harvey L. Johnson and Southwest Book awards.
- 1986 Mora wins her second Southwest Book Award for her second poetry collection, Borders.
- 1988 Mora becomes director of UTEP's natural history museum and assistant to the university president.
- 1989 Mora leaves UTEP to take up full-time writing, lecturing, and promoting literacy; she also moves to the Cincinnati/northern Kentucky area when her husband joins the University of Cincinnati anthropology department. (The couple will make a second home in Santa Fe, New Mexico.)
- 1991 Mora publishes Communion, a collection of poems chronicling her travels to Cuba, India, and Pakistan.
- 1992 Mora publishes A Birthday Basket for Tia, the first of many children's books.

- 1993 Mora publishes Nepantla: Essays from the Land in the Middle.
- 1994 Mora wins a National Endowment for the Arts fellowship to complete her poetry collection Agua Santa/Holy Water (1995).
- 1997 Mora publishes House of Houses, a family memoir, and the poetry collection Aunt Carmen's Book of Practical Saints, and spearheads creation of a national day of celebration of children's bilingual literacy (El día de los niños, El día de los libros/Children's Day, Book Day).
- 2001 Mora publishes My Own True Name: New and Selected Poems for Young Adults.
- 2007 Mora publishes Adobe Odes.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Food, cooking, and related imagery figure in many of Mora's poems. Write an essay exploring the significance of such references. What might the poems suggest about the roles food, cooking, and eating play in our lives?
2. Drawing on at least three of Mora's poems, write an essay that explores her vision of the role of language. When, how, and why does language both unite and divide people? When, why, and how might nonverbal forms of communication prove superior?
3. As the introduction to this album suggests, Pat Mora takes pride in being a Latina writer and identifies one of her goals as chronicling the experience and feelings of contemporary Latinos and Latinas. Write an essay in which you compare at least two of Mora's poems, exploring what they together imply about what it is like to be Latino/a and how that experience differs across generations, classes, and/or genders.
4. The poems reprinted here were originally included in various collections, each of which has a distinct focus and flavor. GENTLE COMMUNION, for example, appears in Mora's third volume, Communion (1991), which some critics see as the culmination of the earliest phase of her career and as the reflection of both a widening of the world depicted in her work (through poems inspired by her travels to other countries) and a greater concentration on the situation of women and on the relationships both among women and between women and men. Pick the Mora poem you like most, identify the collection in which it originally appeared, and read some other poems included in that collection. Then write an essay that either compares your chosen poem to others in the collection or that explains how your interpretation of the original poem changes when you read it in conjunction with the other poems.

Shewing the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul

The Author & Printer W Blake.

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild
Piping songs of pleasant glee
On a cloud I saw a child.
And he laughing said to me

Pipe a song about a Lamb
Sol piped with merry chear.
Piper pipe that song again
Sol piped, he wept to hear.

Drop thy pipe thy happy pipe
Sing thy songs of happy chear.
Sol sang the same again
While he wept with joy to hear.

Piper sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read
So he vanished from my sight
And I plucked a hollow reed.

And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear.

The Ecchoing Green

The Sun does arise,
And makes happy the skies.
The merry bells ring
To welcome the Spring.
The sky-lark and thrush,
The birds of the bush,
Sing louder around,
To the bells' cheerful sound,
While our sports shall be seen
On the Ecchoing Green.

Old John with white hair
Does laugh away care,
Sitting under the oak,
Among the old folk.

They

They laugh at our play.
And soon they all say.
Such such were the joys.
When we all girls & boys.
In our youth time were seen,
On the Frothing Green.

Till the little ones weary
No more can be merry
The sun does descend,
And our sports have an end:
Round the laps of their mothers,
Merry sisters and brothers,
Like birds in their nest.
Are ready for rest:
And sport no more seen,
On the darkening Green.

HOLY THURSDAY

Tw'as on a Holy Thursday their innocent faces clean
The children walking two a two in red & blue & green
Grey headed headles walk'd before with wands as white as Till into the high dome of Pauls they like fountains waters flow
O what a multitude they see in these flower of London town
Sealed in companies they sit with radiance all their own
The hum of multitudes was there but multitudes of lambs
Thousands of little boys & girls raising their innocent hands
Now like a mighty wind they rise to heaven the voice of song
Or like harmonious thunderings the seats of heaven among Beneath them sat the aged men wise guardians of the poor
Then cherish pity lest you drive an angel from your door

The Lamb

Little Lamb who made thee
Dost thou know who made thee
Gave thee life & bid thee feed;
By the stream & o'er the mead;
Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing woolly bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice;
Little Lamb who made thee
Dost thou know who made thee

Little Lamb I'll tell thee,
Little Lamb I'll tell thee;
He is called by thy name,
For he calls himself a Lamb;
He is meek & he is mild,
He became a little child;
A child & thou a lamb,
We are called by his name;
Little Lamb God bless thee,
Little Lamb God bless thee

The Chimney Sweeper

When my mother died I was very young,
And my father sold me while yet my tongue
Could scarcely cry weep weep weep weep.
So your chimneys I sweep & in soot I sleep.
Theres little Tom Dacre who cried when his head
That curl'd like a lambs back, was shav'd, so I said,
Hush Tom never mind it, for when your heads bare,
You know that the soot cannot spoil your white hair.
And so he was quiet, & that very night,
As Tom was a sleeping he had such a sight,
That thousands of sweepers Dick, Joe, Ned & Jack,
Were all of them lock'd up in coffins of black,
And by came an Angel who had a bright key,
And he open'd the coffins & set them all free.
Then down a green plain leaping laughing they run,
And wash in a river and shine in the Sun.
Then naked & white, all their bags left behind,
They rise upon clouds, and sport in the wind,
And the Angel told Tom, if he'd be a good boy,
He'd have God for his father & never want joy.
And so Tom awoke and we rose in the dark
And got with our bags & our brushes to work.
Tho' the morning was cold, Tom was happy & warm,
So if all do their duty, they need not fear harm.

SONGS OF EXPERIENCE

The Author & Printer W Blake

Introduction.

Hear the voice of the Bard!
Who Present, Past, & Future sees
Whose ears have heard,
The Holy Word,
That walked among the ancient trees.

Calling the lapsed Soul,
And weeping in the evening dew;
That might controll
The starry pole;
And fallen fallen light renew!

O Earth O Earth return!
Arise from out the dewy grass;
Night is worn,
And the morn
Rises from the slumberous mass.

Turn away no more:
Why wilt thou turn away
The starry floor
The watry shore
Is given thee till the break of day.

The Tyger.

Tyger Tyger, burning bright,
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye,
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies,
Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand, dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, & what art,
Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? & what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain,
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? what dread grasp,
Dare its deadly wrongs clasp?

When the stars throw down their spears,
And water'd heaven with their tears;
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he who made the Lamb make thee?

Tyger Tyger burning bright,
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye,
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

THE GARDEN of LOVE

I went to the Garden of Love,
And saw what I never had seen;
A Chapel was built in the midst,
Where I used to play on the green.

And the gates of this Chapel were shut,
And Thou shalt not, writ over the door;
So I turn'd to the Garden of Love,
That so many sweet flowers bore.

And I saw it was filled with graves,
And tomb-stones where flowers should be;
And Priests in black gowns, were walking their rounds,
And binding with briars, my joys & desires.

THE Chimney Sweeper

A little black thing among the snow;
Crying weep, weep, in notes of woe!
Where are thy father & mother, say?
They are both gone up to the church to pray.

Because I was happy upon the heath,
And smil'd among the winters snow;
They clothed me in the clothes of death,
And taught me to sing the notes of woe.

And because I am happy, & dance & sing,
They think they have done me no injury;
And are gone to praise God & his Priest & King,
Who make up a heaven of our misery.

HOLY THURSDAY

Is this a holy thing to see,
In a rich and fruitful land,
Babes reduced to misery,
Fed with cold and usurous hand?

Is that trembling cry a song?
Can it be a song of joy?
And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak & bare,
And their ways are filled with thorns,
It is eternal winter there.

For where-e'er the sun does shine,
And where-e'er the rain does fall;
Babe can never hunger there,
Nor poverty the mind appall.

22 | THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT: WILLIAM BLAKE'S SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OF EXPERIENCE

Throughout history and across the globe, poets have collected their poems into sequences or cycles. The type of poem we today call haiku, for instance, emerged out of a tradition in Japanese culture dating back to the middle ages, whereby a single poet would produce a poem of three lines to which other poets would add poems of two and three lines each to create a sequence of thirty-six, one hundred, or even a thousand or more linked poems. Over time, people began to lift out the three-line verse that began such a sequence and to treat it as a poem in its own right, often gathering a number of these to create an anthology of sorts. The popularity of such anthologies in turn inspired poets to begin writing stand-alone poems of this type, which eventually came to be known as haiku. Even Bashō (1644–94), the acknowledged master of the form, published most of his haiku as part of a sequence embedded within a lengthy prose memoir of his extensive travels.

In the Western literary tradition, one common type of poetic sequence is the sonnet sequence. Many of the most famous sonnets—from those of Francesco Petrarch and William Shakespeare to those of Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Edna St. Vincent Millay—are part of such sequences. These poems often lack titles; instead we conventionally either use the poems' first lines as titles ("My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun") or number them according to their place in the sequence (Sonnet 130).

Each of the poems in a sequence is an independent literary work that can be, and often is, enjoyed and understood on its own. Yet each also functions as part of the larger literary work that is the sequence. We can thus enjoy and understand the poem in a different way when we read it in the context of other poems in the sequence and in light of the traditions of poetic sequences generally.

Today, most poems are too short to be published singly, even if they are not part of a sequence. They may first appear in magazines, newspapers, or online, and later in books, including both collections of poems by a single writer and anthologies (like the one you are reading) that include the work of many poets. The poems in one poet's collection may be less intimately related to each other than the poems in a sequence, but they usually were written around the same time and provide a window of sorts onto a particular phase of the author's life and career. Further, poems in a collection—even, in rare cases, a collection by multiple authors—often share other features, depicting comparable situations or speakers or having a similar external form, for example. Though not the same as sequences, such collections can also offer an illuminating context for a particular poem—slightly altering, perhaps expanding, our response and interpretation.

WILLIAM BLAKE'S SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OF EXPERIENCE

The rest of this chapter focuses on William Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience, one of the English-language tradition's most extraordinary poetry collections. One unique aspect of this collection is the fact that its creator—a professional painter and illustrator—not only wrote all the poems but also illustrated and printed the book himself, using a method of his own invention. As a result, Blake may be regarded as the creator rather than the mere author of a book that is simultaneously a visual and verbal experience—a collection of interlinked paintings and poems.

The fact that the book was etched, printed, painted, and then sewn together by hand, moreover, had at least two important effects. First, Blake produced few copies of Songs of Innocence and of Experience; to date, only twenty-four are known to exist. Second, each of those twenty-four copies differs slightly from all the others: The order of the poems varies somewhat, and so, too, does the coloring of individual pages and illustrations.

In all its versions, however, the book combines two distinct yet intimately related sequences of poems. Blake first produced the book Songs of Innocence in 1789. Five years later, in 1794, he added other poems and pages to that book in order to create a new one: Songs of Innocence and of Experience. As its title suggests, the book is divided into two sections—"Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience," each with its own title page and introductory poem.

Together, the two sections and sequences portray the world from two opposed perspectives, or what the book's title page labels "Two Contrary States of the Human Soul." An individual poem in "Songs of Innocence" thus often has a direct companion or counterpart poem in "Songs of Experience." In some cases, those two poems, though dramatically different, share the same title and depict the same character or situation: There are, for example, two poems called HOLY THURSDAY and two called THE CHIMNEY SWEEPER. In other cases, the connection between the two poems is less direct: The poem THE LAMB, in "Songs of Innocence," for example, is typically viewed as the companion to THE TYGER, in "Songs of Experience." And the same holds true for THE ECCHOING GREEN (in "Innocence") and THE GARDEN OF LOVE (in "Experience"). A few poems, however, do not have an obvious counterpart; the two most famous examples are LONDON and THE SICK ROSE, which originally appeared in "Songs of Experience."

This chapter includes ten poems from Songs of Innocence and of Experience, along with color reproductions of some of the volume's actual pages or "plates" to give you a sense of how it looks. (To see all of Blake's work, including various versions of the poems in this album, visit the impressive Blake Archive at www.blakearchive.org/blake/.) To provide more insight into Blake's life and times, a chronology follows the poems.

SONGS OF INNOCENCE

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild
 Piping songs of pleasant glee
 On a cloud I saw a child.
 And he laughing said to me

- 5 Pipe a song about a Lamb;
 So I piped with merry chear,
 Piper pipe that song again—
 So I piped, he wept to hear.

- Drop thy pipe thy happy pipe
 10 Sing thy songs of happy chear,
 So I sung the same again
 While he wept with joy to hear

- Piper sit thee down and write
 In a book that all may read—
 15 So he vanish'd from my sight.
 And I pluck'd a hollow reed.

- And I made a rural pen,
 And I stain'd the water clear,
 And I wrote my happy songs
 20 Every child may joy to hear.

The Ecchoing Green

- The Sun does arise,
 And make happy the skies.
 The merry bells ring,
 To welcome the Spring.
 5 The sky-lark and thrush,
 The birds of the bush,
 Sing louder around,
 To the bells chearful sound.
 While our sports shall be seen
 10 On the Ecchoing Green.

- Old John with white hair
 Does laugh away care,
 Sitting under the oak,
 Among the old folk.
 15 They laugh at our play,
 And soon they all say,
 Such such were the joys.
 When we all girls & boys,
 In our youth time were seen,
 20 On the Ecchoing Green.

- Till the little ones weary
 No more can be merry
 The sun does descend,
 And our sports have an end:
 25 Round the laps of their mothers,
 Many sisters and brothers,
 Like birds in their nest,
 Are ready for rest;
 And sport no more seen,
 30 On the darkening Green.

Holy Thursday¹

- 'Twas on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean,
 The children walking two & two, in red & blue & green;
 Grey headed beadles walkd before with wands as white as snow,

- Little Lamb, who made thee?
 Dost thou know who made thee?
 Gave thee life, and bid thee feed
 By the stream and o'er the mead;
 5 Gave thee clothing of delight,
 Softest clothing woolly bright;
 Gave thee such a tender voice,
 Making all the vales rejoice?
 Little Lamb, who made thee?
 10 Dost thou know who made thee?
 Little Lamb, I'll tell thee!
 Little Lamb, I'll tell thee:
 He is callèd by thy name,
 For he calls himself a Lamb,

1. In the English Church, the Thursday celebrating Christ's ascension, thirty-nine days after Easter. It was customary on this day to march the poor, frequently orphaned, children from London's charity schools to a service at St. Paul's Cathedral.

2. See Hebrews 13.2: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

- 15 He is meek and he is mild;
 He became a little child.
 I a child and thou a lamb,
 We are callèd by his name.
 Little Lamb, God bless thee!
 20 Little Lamb, God bless thee!

The Chimney Sweeper

- When my mother died I was very young,
 And my father sold me while yet my tongue,
 Could scarcely cry weep weep weep weep.
 So your chimneys I sweep & in soot I sleep.
- 5 There's little Tom Dacre, who cried when his head

Chronology: William Blake and His Times

- 1757 William Blake is born in London on November 28, one of the seven children of Catherine and James Blake (a maker and seller of stockings and gloves); only five of the children will survive infancy.
- 1765–67 Blake has his first angelic visions and, at age ten, enters drawing school.
- 1772 At age fourteen, Blake is apprenticed to a master engraver.
- 1776 The American Revolution begins.
- 1779 His apprenticeship complete, twenty-one-year-old Blake begins his studies at the Royal Academy of Art (RAA).
- 1780 Blake begins to read and sing his own poems to friends and to earn his living by giving drawing lessons and by engraving prints and book illustrations for other authors and artists. (One such work is Anna Letitia Barbauld's Hymns in Prose for Children [1781].) While sketching near a river, Blake and two fellow artists are detained by British soldiers, who suspect them of being French spies; the prisoners are released only after other RAA members testify on their behalf.
- 1782 Blake (at twenty-four) marries Catherine Boucher, an illiterate former domestic servant and one of the thirteen children of a market gardener. (Blake will teach his wife not only to read and write but also to engrave and print books, and she will eventually help with the engraving, printing, coloring, and assembling of all his self-published works.)
- 1783 A friend finances the publication of Poetical Sketches, the only book by Blake to be published in the conventional manner by another publisher. The American Revolution ends.
- 1784 After the death of Blake's father, Blake's younger brother comes to live and study engraving with Blake and his wife; Blake uses his small inheritance to open a small print-selling and publishing business with a friend and writes (but does not publish) An Island in the Moon, a work of prose satire containing drafts of three poems later included in Songs of Innocence.
- 1785 When Blake's business folds, he returns to his work as an engraver for other publishers.
- 1787 After his brother's death, Blake begins to see him in visions, including one that reveals a new method of "illuminated printing" or relief etching.
- 1788 Blake produces All Religions Are One and There Is No Natural Religion, the first works made using his "illuminated printing" technique; Blake will use the same method to self-publish all of his subsequent work.

- 1789 Blake etches Songs of Innocence and The Book of Thel. The French Revolution begins in July with the storming of the Bastille, a Parisian prison.
- 1790–91 Blake etches The Marriage of Heaven and Hell and The French Revolution.
- 1792 Blake's friend and fellow radical Thomas Paine is sentenced to death in absentia for publishing his two-part political treatise Rights of Man, though the sentence is never carried out.
- 1793 In France, Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette are executed as part of the "Reign of Terror." Britain and France go to war. Blake etches America.
- 1794 Several London radicals well-known to Blake are tried for high treason, a capital crime, but they are ultimately acquitted. Blake produces Songs of Innocence and of Experience, Visions of the Daughters of Albion, and The Book of Urizen.
- 1795–96 Blake produces The Book of Los and begins The Four Zoas.
- 1800 Blake and his wife move from London to the Sussex seaside to be near his new patron, William Hayley, whom Blake will later describe as "the enemy of my Spiritual Life while he pretends to be the Friend of my Corporeal."
- 1802–1804 A scuffle with a soldier leads to Blake's trial and acquittal on charges of sedition, a capital crime. Blake and Catherine move back to London.
- 1809–10 Blake self-publishes Milton.
- 1815 British forces defeat Napoleon at Waterloo.
- 1818–20 Blake self-publishes Jerusalem.
- 1820–25 Blake produces (on commission) watercolor illustrations for the Book of Job.
- 1825 Blake begins work on another commission, illustrations for Dante's Divine Comedy.
- 1827 Blake dies on August 12 at the age of sixty-nine.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Write an essay analyzing Blake's two HOLY THURSDAY poems or any other pair of counterpart poems from Songs of Innocence and of Experience. What different views of the same person, place, situation, and so on are offered in your two poems? What conclusions does each poem seem to reach about, and through, the subject it depicts? How do the poems' formal qualities—syntax, diction, rhythm, rhyme, and so on—contribute to their distinctive tone and theme(s)?
2. Drawing on evidence from various poems in the "Songs of Experience" section of Songs of Innocence and of Experience, write an essay explaining how LONDON or THE SICK ROSE works as a "Song of Experience" poem. What similarities do you see between LONDON or THE SICK ROSE and other "Experience" poems? What does either of these poems add to the "Experience" sequence?
3. Write an essay exploring a particular symbol or set of symbols, characters, or formal techniques that you see as important to the effect and meaning of Blake's Songs as a sequence.
4. Choose any poem in this anthology and use library or Internet resources to research the collection or sequence of which it is a part. Write a response paper or essay reflecting on how your interpretation of the poem changes when you read it as part of a particular collection or sequence rather than on its own.

5. Write an essay analyzing at least two poems in this book that are part of the same sequence or collection. You might choose two sonnets by Edna St. Vincent Millay or William Shakespeare or two poems from the sequence of odes by John Keats that includes ODE TO A NIGHTINGALE, ODE ON A GRECIAN URN, and TO AUTUMN. How do your two poems make sense together, as parts of a single, unified sequence or collection? If you know how the poems are ordered in the collection, what difference might their order make to their meaning?
6. Write two poems that, like Blake's HOLY THURSDAY or CHIMNEY SWEEPER poems, depict the same object, person, or situation from two dramatically different perspectives.

23 | CULTURAL AND HISTORICAL CONTEXTS: THE HARLEM RENAISSANCE

Poetry may be read in private moments or experienced in a great variety of communal settings—in classrooms or theaters, for example, or at poetry slams or public readings. It is nonetheless almost always written in solitude by a single author. Collaborative composition is rare in poetry, even rarer than in other arts. Still, there is a sense in which many poems represent collaborative acts. Traditions, group identities, shared experiences, desires, and communal needs may come together in a particular moment and location to produce poetry that has a distinctive stamp of time, place, and vision. One such phenomenon was the Harlem Renaissance, a period of ten or fifteen years early in the twentieth century when an extraordinarily talented group of people came together in uptown Manhattan to celebrate and embody the awakening of a new African American consciousness. It was an unprecedented moment in American poetry and in American culture at large, and it produced some of the twentieth century's most compelling and original poems, as well as significant works of art in a variety of other genres and media.

The Harlem Renaissance was not exactly a movement in the sense of having a formal structure; no one originated it or called it to order, and it was not consciously planned or organized by any person or group. There was no founder, no architect, no leader, and it is hard to say why or how—or even exactly when—it began or ended. It happened, as the needs and desires of African American intellectuals and artists became manifest and began to coalesce in a particular time and place, and it ended—or rather scattered its energy—when conditions in the world at large dictated that other priorities, especially economic ones, began to trump those that had brought it together. But it was not, of course, independent of history or without cause. It was a product of many circumstances, most of them involving the long-term aftereffects of slavery and the increasingly articulated desire of African Americans to produce a distinctive black American culture within the larger national culture. The Harlem Renaissance represented powerful assertions: that America had to include the voices of black Americans in order to find its own full definition and, equally, that artistic creativity—including literary creativity—was essential to black Americans' realization and assertion of their full humanity. To live in Harlem and to be black and creative was not an altogether happy experience, and the poetry that exploded out of that time and place is a poetry of anger, resentment, conflict, and torn loyalties. It is also a poetry of energy, sensitivity, humanity, and high ideals.

What was the Harlem Renaissance? It was first of all a migration or, rather, part of a migration: Around the end of World War I, American blacks relocated in large numbers from the South to the North and from rural areas to cities. New York was only one of many destinations; Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Washington, Cleveland, Buffalo, and other urban centers all received huge numbers of black migrants. But New York was the largest and most vibrant seat of culture in America, beginning to rival European capitals as a site where active artistic communities produced and consumed culture of all kinds—high, low, and in between. More than 100,000 blacks migrated to Harlem during the 1920s, taking over and transforming a

Manhattan neighborhood north of Central Park and turning it into a distinctive, creative, independent center of art and performance activities that drew the rest of New York City to it. For most of the 1920s—called “the Roaring ’20s” because of the era’s daring, rebellious attitudes and booming economic growth—Harlem was a magnet for avant-garde whites in New York. They flocked to speakeasies, nightclubs, and theaters. They were fascinated by the kinds of music, dance, and performance art they could find there—productions quite different from those on Broadway or in other parts of the city, though increasingly white venues tried to capture, in their own productions, something of the life and energy that patrons sought in Harlem. White readers and many white artists showed enormous—sometimes mawkish or even ghoulis—curiosity about black life in America. Before the Harlem Renaissance had ended, many novels and a large number of Broadway productions—Marc Connelly's Green Pastures (1930), Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones (1920), and All God's Chillun Got Wings (1924), for example—tried to represent the black experience for white audiences. Black artists and writers (and their readers) were not always happy with the way white writers either portrayed black experience and black concerns or “adapted” (some would say “appropriated”) work originally created by African Americans, but the widespread curiosity provided a wider audience for black literature and arts than ever before.

The height of the Harlem Renaissance was the 1920s. Some historians, pointing to the political ferment caused by U.S. entry into World War I in 1917, date its beginnings in the mid to late teens, and some regard it as lasting until the outbreak of World War II in the late 1930s. But the decade of the 1920s saw most of the productivity and creative energy that we associate with the flourishing of Harlem. And it was in the early 1920s when most of the leading writers in the group actually moved to New York. Many historians regard the stock-market crash of 1929 and the depression that followed as signs of the end. Certainly the mood of the whole nation changed rapidly then, and by the early 1930s most of the leading figures of the Renaissance had moved away from New York, sometimes forming smaller communities elsewhere. Harlem itself began a slow economic decline.

Between the wars, though, Harlem's productivity and impact were dramatic. Before 1917, there had been few publishing outlets hospitable to young black writers; only Paul Lawrence Dunbar among African American poets was widely read or known, and he had died in 1906. But rising political and social concerns during and immediately after World War I produced several new periodicals: The Messenger, founded in 1917 by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, claimed to be “The only Radical Negro Magazine in America,” and in 1923 the Urban League started its own magazine, Opportunity. Both of these new journals saw themselves as activist alternatives to the NAACP's official journal, Crisis, edited by W. E. B.

Du Bois. Other magazines came and went. Fire!! managed only a single issue, but brought verbal and visual art spectacularly together. Meanwhile—and perhaps just as important in a different way—mainstream magazines and publishers began to feature younger black writers, who soon developed a broad readership.

Some historians date the Harlem Renaissance from the composition of Claude McKay's fiery sonnet IF WE MUST DIE, written in the summer of 1919. McKay later denied that the poem referred specifically to blacks and whites, but the many antiblack riots that broke out in several American cities that summer—sometimes called “the Red Summer”—certainly shaped the poem. Another milestone was the publication in 1922 of James Weldon Johnson's Book of American Negro Poetry, which, in the words of the editors of The Norton Anthology of the relationship of poetry to black music and experimented with a variety of forms and rhythms. Countee Cullen was instead deeply committed to conventional poetic forms and felt most at home poetically when he was working in traditional fixed forms. Claude McKay, born in Jamaica, lived briefly in New York but mostly in Greenwich Village rather than Harlem, and spent much of his career abroad (in Russia, France, and North Africa). He always followed his own star in poetry, too; his work is sometimes violent and incendiary, but equally strong is his sense of nostalgia and natural spiritualism and his affinity for traditional fixed forms. (He is a master of the sonnet.) Despite setting a militant tone in a founding poem of the Harlem Renaissance, “If We Must Die,” he wrote only African American Literature, “emphasized the youthful promise of the new writers and established some of the terms of the emerging movement.” But it was Alain Locke’s landmark anthology The New Negro that, in 1925, effectively announced the significance of the Harlem Renaissance. Locke, a sociology professor at Howard University and the first African American Rhodes Scholar, gathered all kinds of material—poems, fiction, essays, visual art—by authors old and young, black and white—into a working definition of the “new Negro.”

The major figures of the Harlem Renaissance were, however, highly individual. And though they shared many ideals and aspirations, they never confined themselves to a creed or hardened into a “school.” Langston Hughes, with a wonderful lyric voice and an eye for telling details, pursued two poems that were directly about Harlem experiences and themes. Likewise, novelists like Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Jesse Fauset, and Nella Larsen pursued individual styles and themes in their fiction. What held the group together was a dedication both to producing first-rate writing and to raising the aspirations of American blacks of all backgrounds and abilities.

The question of who was to benefit from the ambitious art of the Harlem Renaissance was hotly debated. Was it ordinary people, who could stretch the horizons of their reading and their own ambitions? African Americans generally? Or was it primarily intellectuals and artists who might raise expectations for black thought and art? W. E. B. Du Bois, who was a lightning rod for many members of the militant and radical new generation, had famously championed the “talented tenth,” a select group whose natural gifts authoritatively raised them above others. And opinions split over whether the beneficiaries of the Harlem Renaissance were to be ordinary readers and viewers or the creative geniuses themselves, in the service of a higher aesthetic quite distinct from social progress. It’s fair to say that writers remained divided, alternately championing the triumph of art and hoping for a larger cultural impact that would benefit readers (especially black readers) more generally.

The role of whites in the Harlem Renaissance is also a matter of debate. The most controversial, though undeniably influential figure was Carl Van Vechten, whose parties legendarily brought young black writers into the company of famous and powerful white celebrities, many of whom proved helpful to black writers’ careers. Van Vechten was a gifted photographer whose portraits of many rising figures chronicle the Harlem years brilliantly, and he undeniably fostered many useful connections that resulted in publication and fame. But some felt his motives were self-serving, and his well-meaning novel about Harlem life, Nigger Heaven (1926), was widely disparaged, though critics equally suspected “realistic” accounts of everyday life by black writers. (See, for example, the Du Bois review of a Claude McKay novel later in this chapter.) There is no doubt that figures like Van Vechten fostered interaction between prominent whites and rising figures in the black artistic community, but not everyone regarded the results as helpful to the black cause overall. Some historians view white participation in the Harlem Renaissance as exploitative, others as sincere but bumbling; still others view such black-white collaboration as an early demonstration of racial unity.

Another set of questions involves elitism—whether the renaissance had truly salutary effects on the larger black community. Du Bois insisted on the obligation of “the talented tenth” to use their artistic and intellectual gifts to improve the lot of others. Critics of Du Bois find his position divisive and patronizing toward the majority of the black community; defenders see the idea as a strategy for achieving community improvement by cultivating potential leaders. At the heart of this controversy is disagreement about how leadership works to promote both improved social conditions and audience engagement. (Similar arguments rage today over the stardom of African American athletes and entertainers.)

Known as the “Empress of the Blues,” Bessie Smith was one of the most popular entertainers in America during the 1920s.

Two other, related controversies concern the influence of the church on black culture and the relationship of the ambitious new “high art” of poetry, novels, and painting to popular-culture phenomena such as jazz, blues, and dance. There is little doubt that religion was a powerful force in the black community, but observers continue to debate, as the artists themselves then did, whether it fostered and furthered artistic expression or served as a restraining and discouraging force. Often readers can see in poetry about even the most secular subjects traces of religious ideas and traditions; you will have to decide for yourself whether the effects are positive or not. The relationship of radical art to popular culture was even more vexed. Some central figures in the Harlem Renaissance regarded their own aims as “above” the “attractions” and “spectacles” that drew large numbers of whites to Harlem, and they regarded the performance arts as, at best, distractions from, or dilutions of, the main flow of radical artistic expression. And while nearly everyone agrees that the quality of various theatrical arts in the many venues of Harlem was very high, the question of whether, beyond jazz and blues, the influence of popular arts on poetry was good or bad remains open.

• • •

No easy summary of the Harlem Renaissance will do. Its ambitions—often radical, sometimes revolutionary—made enormous waves in both the black urban community and the world of art. However one measures the Harlem Renaissance in terms of its impact on later writers, black and white, the poems themselves continue to speak to readers across divides of time and culture. You will find that some of the poems can hardly be understood without knowledge of the specific circumstances and conditions that produced them; you will also find that many of the poems reach insistently for connections both to the past and to the enduring concerns of poets and readers in far-flung times and places.

ARNA BONTEMPS

A Black Man Talks of Reaping

I have sown beside all waters in my day.
I planted deep, within my heart the fear
That wind or fowl would take the grain away.
I planted safe against this stark, lean year.

- 5 I scattered seed enough to plant the land
In rows from Canada to Mexico
But for my reaping only what the hand
Can hold at once is all that I can show.

- Yet what I sowed and what the orchard yields
10 My brother's sons are gathering stalk and root,
Small wonder then my children glean in fields
They have not sown, and feed on bitter fruit.

Yet Do I Marvel

- I doubt not God is good, well-meaning, kind,
 And did He stoop to quibble could tell why
 The little buried mole continues blind,
 Why flesh that mirrors Him must some day die,
 5 Make plain the reason tortured Tantalus¹
 Is baited by the fickle fruit, declare
 If merely brute caprice dooms Sisyphus²
 To struggle up a never-ending stair.
 Inscrutable His ways are, and immune
 10 To catechism by a mind too strewn
 With petty cares to slightly understand
 What awful brain compels His awful hand.
 Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:
 To make a poet black, and bid him sing!

Saturday's Child³

- Some are teathed on a silver spoon,
 With the stars strung for a rattle;
 I cut my teeth as the black raccoon—
 For implements of battle.
 5 Some are swaddled in silk and down,
 And heralded by a star;⁴
 They swathed my limbs in a sackcloth gown
 On a night that was black as tar.
 For some, godfather and goddame
 10 The opulent fairies be;
 Dame Poverty gave me my name,
 And Pain godfathered me.
 For I was born on Saturday—
 “Bad time for planting a seed,”
 15 Was all my father had to say,
 And, “One mouth more to feed.”
 Death cut the strings that gave me life,
 And handed me to Sorrow,

From the Dark Tower

(To Charles S. Johnson)⁵

We shall not always plant while others reap
 The golden increment of bursting fruit,
 Not always countenance, abject and mute,
 That lesser men should hold their brothers cheap;
 5 Not everlastingly while others sleep
 Shall we beguile their limbs with mellow flute,
 Not always bend to some more subtle brute;
 We were not made eternally to weep.
 The night whose sable breast relieves the stark,
 10 White stars is no less lovely being dark,
 And there are buds that cannot bloom at all
 In light, but crumple, piteous, and fall;
 So in the dark we hide the heart that bleeds,
 And wait, and tend our agonizing seeds.

The bricks are the color of blood and very small.
Is it a black hand,

Or does it explode?

The Weary Blues

Droning a drowsy syncopated tune,
Rocking back and forth to a mellow croon,
I heard a Negro play.
Down on Lenox Avenue⁷ the other night
5 By the pale dull pallor of an old gas light
He did a lazy sway. . . .

6. In darkness (Latin). 7. Major Harlem thoroughfare, now Malcolm X Boulevard.

- He did a lazy sway. . . .
 To the tune o' those Weary Blues.
 With his ebony hands on each ivory key
 10 He made that poor piano moan with melody.
 O Blues!
 Swaying to and fro on his rickety stool
 He played that sad raggy tune like a musical fool.
 Sweet Blues!
 15 Coming from a black man's soul.
 O Blues!
 In a deep song voice with a melancholy tone
 I heard that Negro sing, that old piano moan—
 "Ain't got nobody in all this world,
 20 Ain't got nobody but ma self.
 I's gwine to quit ma frownin'
 And put ma troubles on the shelf."
 Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor.
 He played a few chords then he sang some more—
 25 "I got the Weary Blues
 And I can't be satisfied.
 Got the Weary Blues
 And can't be satisfied—
 I ain't happy no mo'
 30 And I wish that I had died."
 And far into the night he crooned that tune.
 The stars went out and so did the moon.
 The singer stopped playing and went to bed
 While the Weary Blues echoed through his head.
 35 He slept like a rock or a man that's dead.

The Negro Speaks of Rivers

- I've known rivers:
 I've known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.
 My soul has grown deep like the rivers.
 I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young.
 5 I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep.
 I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.
 I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I've seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset.
 I've known rivers:
 Ancient, dusky rivers.
 10 My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

I, Too

I, too, sing America.

I am the darker brother.
They send me to eat in the kitchen
When company comes,
5 But I laugh,
And eat well,
And grow strong.

Tomorrow,
I'll sit at the table.
10 When company comes
Nobody'll dare
Say to me,
"Eat in the kitchen,"
Then.

15 Besides,
They'll see how beautiful I am
And be ashamed—
I, too, am America.

Sonnet to a Negro in Harlem

- You are disdainful and magnificent—
 Your perfect body and your pompous gait,
 Your dark eyes flashing solemnly with hate,
 Small wonder that you are incompetent
 5 To imitate those whom you so despise—
 Your shoulders towering high above the throng,
 Your head thrown back in rich, barbaric song,
 Palm trees and mangoes stretched before your eyes.
 Let others toil and sweat for labor's sake
 10 And wring from grasping hands their meed⁸ of gold.
 Why urge ahead your supercilious feet?
 Scorn will efface each footprint that you make.
 I love your laughter arrogant and bold.
 You are too splendid for this city street.

Harlem Shadows

- I hear the halting footsteps of a lass
 In Negro Harlem when the night lets fall
 Its veil. I see the shapes of girls who pass
 To bend and barter at desire's call.
 5 Ah, little dark girls who in slippered feet
 Go prowling through the night from street to street!
 Through the long night until the silver break
 Of day the little gray feet know no rest;
 Through the lone night until the last snow-flake
 10 Has dropped from heaven upon the earth's white breast,
 The dusky, half-clad girls of tired feet
 Are trudging, thinly shod, from street to street.
 Ah, stern harsh world, that in the wretched way
 Of poverty, dishonor and disgrace,
 15 Has pushed the timid little feet of clay,
 The sacred brown feet of my fallen race!
 Ah, heart of me, the weary, weary feet
 In Harlem wandering from street to street.

1918

If We Must Die

- If we must die, let it not be like hogs
 Hunted and penned in an inglorious spot,
 While round us bark the mad and hungry dogs,
 Making their mock at our accursed lot.
- 5 If we must die, O let us nobly die,
 So that our precious blood may not be shed
 In vain; then even the monsters we defy
 Shall be constrained to honor us though dead!
 O kinsmen! we must meet the common foe!
- 10 Though far outnumbered let us show us brave,
 And for their thousand blows deal one deathblow!
 What though before us lies the open grave?
 Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
 Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!

1919

The Tropics in New York

- Bananas ripe and green, and ginger-root,
 Cocoa in pods and alligator pears,
 And tangerines and mangoes and grape fruit,
 Fit for the highest prize at parish fairs,
- 5 Set in the window, bringing memories
 Of fruit-trees laden by low-singing rills,
 And dewy dawns, and mystical blue skies
 In benediction over nun-like hills.
- My eyes grew dim, and I could no more gaze;
 10 A wave of longing through my body swept,
 And, hungry for the old, familiar ways,
 I turned aside and bowed my head and wept.

1920

America

- Although she feeds me bread of bitterness,
 And sinks into my throat her tiger's tooth,
 Stealing my breath of life, I will confess
 I love this cultured hell that tests my youth!
- 5 Her vigor flows like tides into my blood,
 Giving me strength erect against her hate.
 Her bigness sweeps my being like a flood.
 Yet as a rebel fronts a king in state,
 I stand within her walls with not a shred
- 10 Of terror, malice nor even a word of jeer.
 Darkly I gaze into the days ahead
 To see her might and granite wonders there,

Beneath the touch of Time's unerring hand,
 Like ancient treasures buried in the sand.
 1921

The White House

Your door is shut against my tightened face,
 And I am sharp as steel with discontent;
 But I possess the courage and the grace
 To bear my anger proudly and unbent.
 5 The pavement slabs burn loose beneath my feet,
 And passion rends my vitals as I pass,
 A chafing savage, down the decent street,
 Where boldly shines your shuttered door of glass.
 Oh, I must search for wisdom every hour,
 10 Deep in my wrathful bosom sore and raw,
 And find in it the superhuman power
 To hold me to the letter of your law!
 Oh, I must keep my heart inviolate
 Against the poison of your deadly hate.

CONTEXTUAL EXCERPTS

JAMES WELDON JOHNSON

From the preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry (1921)

James Weldon Johnson, circa 1920

This preface has gone far beyond what I had in mind when I started. It was my intention to gather together the best verses I could find by Negro poets and present them with a bare word of introduction. It was not my plan to make this collection inclusive nor to make the book in any sense a book of criticism. I planned to present only verses by contemporary writers; but, perhaps, because this is the first collection of its kind, I realized the absence of a starting-point and was led to provide one and to fill in with historical data what I felt to be a gap.

It may be surprising to many to see how little of the poetry being written by Negro poets today is being written in poetry, 'possums, watermelons, etc., they have discarded altogether, at least, as poetic material. This tendency will, no doubt, be regretted by the majority of white readers; and, indeed, it would be a distinct loss if the American Negro poets threw away this quaint and musical folk speech as a medium of expression. And yet, after all, these poets are working through a problem not realized by the reader, and, perhaps, by many of these poets themselves not realized consciously. They are trying to break away from, not Negro dialect itself, but the limitations on Negro dialect imposed by the fixing effects of long convention.

The Negro in the United States has achieved or been placed in a certain artistic niche. When he is thought of artistically, it is as a happy-go-lucky, singing, shuffling, banjo-picking being or as a more or less pathetic figure. The picture of him is in a log cabin amid fields of cotton or along the levees. Negro dialect is naturally and by long association the exact instrument for voicing this phase of Negro life; and by that very exactness it is an instrument with but two full stops, humor and pathos. So even when he confines himself to purely racial themes, the Aframerican poet realizes that there are phases of Negro life in the United States which cannot be treated in the dialect either adequately or artistically. Take, for example, the phases rising out of life in Harlem, that most wonderful Negro city in the world. I do not deny that a Negro in a log cabin is more picturesque than a Negro in a Harlem flat, but the Negro in the Harlem flat is here, and he is but part of a group growing everywhere in the country, a group whose ideals are becoming increasingly more vital than those of the traditionally artistic group, even if its members are less picturesque.

What the colored poet in the United States needs to do is something like what Synge⁹ did for the Irish; he needs to find a form that will express the racial spirit by symbols from within rather than by symbols from without, such as the mere mutilation of English spelling and pronunciation. He needs a form that is freer and larger than dialect, but which will still hold the racial flavor; a form expressing the imagery, the idioms, the peculiar turns of thought, and the distinctive humor and pathos, too, of the Negro, but which will also be capable of voicing the deepest and highest emotions and aspirations, and allow of the widest range of subjects and the widest scope of treatment.

Negro dialect is at present a medium that is not capable of giving expression to the varied conditions of Negro life in America, and much less is it capable of giving the fullest interpretation of Negro character and psychology. This is no indictment against the dialect as dialect, but against the mold of convention in which Negro dialect in the United States has been set. In time these conventions may become lost, and the colored poet in the United States may sit down to write in dialect without feeling that his first line will put the general reader in a frame of mind which demands that the poem be humorous or pathetic. In the meantime, there is no reason why these poets should not continue to do the beautiful things that can be done, and done best, in the dialect.

In stating the need for Aframerican poets in the United States to work out a new and distinctive form of expression I do not wish to be understood to hold any theory that they should limit themselves to Negro poetry, to racial themes; the sooner they are able to write American poetry spontaneously, the better. Nevertheless, I believe that the richest contribution the Negro poet can make to the American literature of the future will be the fusion into it of his own individual artistic gifts.

9. John Millington Synge (1871–1909), Irish dramatist whose works celebrate Irish traditions.

ALAIN LOCKE

From The New Negro (1925)

The tide of Negro migration, northward and city-ward, is not to be fully explained as a blind flood started by the demands of war industry coupled with the shutting off of foreign migration, or by the pressure of poor crops coupled with increased social terrorism in certain sections of the South and Southwest. Neither labor demand, the bollweevil,¹ nor the Ku Klux Klan is a basic factor, however contributory any or all of them may have been. The wash and rush of this human tide on the beach line of the northern city centers is to be explained primarily in terms of a new vision of opportunity, of social and economic freedom, of a spirit to seize, even in the face of an extortionate and heavy toll, a chance for the improvement of conditions. With each successive wave of it, the movement of the Negro becomes more and more a mass movement toward the larger and the more democratic chance—in the Negro's case a deliberate flight not only from countryside to city, but from medieval America to modern.

Take Harlem as an instance of this. Here in Manhattan is not merely the largest Negro community in the world, but the first concentration in history of so many diverse elements of Negro life. It has attracted the African, the West Indian, the Negro American; has brought together the Negro of the North and the Negro of the South; the man from the city and the man from the town and village; the peasant, the student, the business man, the professional man, artist, poet, musician, adventurer and worker, preacher and criminal, exploiter and social outcast. Each group has come with its own separate motives and for its own special ends, but their greatest experience has been the finding of one another. Proscription and prejudice have thrown these dissimilar elements into a common area of contact and interaction. Within this area, race sympathy and unity have determined a further fusing of sentiment and experience. So what began in terms of segregation becomes more and more, as its elements mix and react, the laboratory of a great race-welding. Hitherto, it must be admitted that American Negroes have been a race more in name than in fact, or to be exact, more in sentiment than in experience. The chief bond between them has been that of a common condition rather than a common consciousness; a problem in common rather than a life in common. In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination. It is—or promises at least to be—a race capital. That is why our comparison is taken with those nascent centers of folk-expression and self-determination which are playing a creative part in the world today. Without pretense to their political significance, Harlem has the same role to play for the New Negro as Dublin has had for the New Ireland or Prague for the New Czechoslovakia.

1. Beetle notorious for destroying cotton crops.

Harlem, I grant you, isn't typical—but it is significant, it is prophetic. No sane observer, however sympathetic to the new trend, would contend that the great masses are articulate as yet, but they stir, they move, they are more than physically restless. The challenge of the new intellectuals among them is clear enough—the “race radicals” and realists who have broken with the old epoch of philanthropic guidance, sentimental appeal and protest. But are we after all only reading into the stirrings of a sleeping giant the dreams of an agitator? The answer is in the migrating peasant. It is the “man farthest down” who is most active in getting up. One of the most characteristic symptoms of this is the professional man, himself migrating to recapture his constituency after a vain effort to maintain in some Southern corner what for years back seemed an established living and clientele. The clergyman following his errant flock, the physician or lawyer trailing his clients, supply the true clues. In a real sense it is the rank and file who are leading, and the leaders who are following. A transformed and transforming psychology permeates the masses.

When the racial leaders of twenty years ago spoke of developing race-pride and stimulating race-consciousness, and of the desirability of race solidarity, they could not in any accurate degree have anticipated the abrupt feeling that has surged up and now pervades the awakened centers. [. . .] It is a social disservice to blunt the fact that the Negro of the Northern centers has reached a stage where tutelage, even of the most interested and well-intentioned sort, must give place to new relationships, where positive self-direction must be reckoned with in ever increasing measure. The American mind must reckon with a fundamentally changed Negro.

The Negro too, for his part, has idols of the tribe to smash. If on the one hand the white man has erred in making the Negro appear to be that which would excuse or extenuate his treatment of him, the Negro, in turn, has too often unnecessarily excused himself because of the way he has been treated. The intelligent Negro of today is resolved not to make discrimination an extenuation for his shortcomings in performance, individual or collective; he is trying to hold himself at par, neither inflated by sentimental allowances nor depreciated by current social discounts. For this he must know himself and be known for precisely what he is, and for that reason he welcomes the new scientific rather than the old sentimental interest. Sentimental interest in the Negro has ebbed. We used to lament this as the falling off of our friends; now we rejoice and pray to be delivered both from self-pity and condescension. The mind of each racial group has had a bitter weaning, apathy or hatred on one side matching disillusionment or resentment on the other; but they face each other today with the possibility at least of entirely new mutual attitudes. [. . .]

The fiction is that the life of the races is separate, and increasingly so. The fact is that they have touched too closely at the unfavorable and too lightly at the favorable levels.

While inter-racial councils have sprung up in the South, drawing on forward elements of both races, in the Northern cities manual laborers may brush elbows in their everyday work, but the community and business leaders have experienced no such interplay or far too little of it. These segments must achieve contact or the race situation in America becomes desperate. Fortunately this is happening. There is a growing realization that in social effort the cooperative basis must supplant long-distance philanthropy, and that the only safeguard for mass relations in the future must be provided in the carefully maintained contacts of the enlightened minorities of both race groups. In the intellectual realm a renewed and keen curiosity is replacing the recent apathy; the Negro is being carefully studied, not just talked about and discussed. In art and letters, instead of being wholly caricatured, he is being seriously portrayed and painted.

To all of this the New Negro is keenly responsive as an augury of a new democracy in American culture. He is contributing his share to the new social understanding. But the desire to be understood would never in itself have been sufficient to have opened so completely the protectively closed portals of the thinking Negro's mind. There is still too much possibility of being snubbed or patronized for that. It was rather the necessity for fuller, truer self-expression, the realization of the unwisdom of allowing social discrimination to segregate him mentally, and a counter-attitude to cramp and fetter his own living—and so the “spite-wall” that the intellectuals built over the “color-line” has happily been taken down. Much of this reopening of intellectual contacts has centered in New York and has been richly fruitful not merely in the enlarging of personal experience, but in the definite enrichment of American art and letters and in the clarifying of our common vision of the social tasks ahead.

The particular significance in the re-establishment of contact between the more advanced and representative classes is that it promises to offset some of the unfavorable reactions of the past, or at least to re-surface race contacts somewhat for the future. Subtly the conditions that are molding a New Negro are molding a new American attitude.

However, this new phase of things is delicate; it will call for less charity but more justice; less help, but infinitely closer understanding. This is indeed a critical stage of race relationships because of the likelihood, if the new temper is not understood, of engendering sharp group antagonism and a second crop of more calculated prejudice. In some quarters, it has already done so. Having weaned the Negro, public opinion cannot continue to paternalize. The Negro today is inevitably moving forward under the control largely of his own objectives. What are these objectives? Those of his outer life are happily already well and finally formulated, for they are none other than the ideals of American institutions and democracy. Those of his inner life are yet in process of formation, for the new psychology at present is more of a consensus of feeling than of opinion, of attitude rather than of program. Still some points seem to have crystallized.

Up to the present one may adequately describe the Negro's “inner objectives” as an attempt to repair a damaged group psychology and reshape a warped social perspective. Their realization has required a new mentality for the American Negro. And as it matures we begin to see its effects; at first, negative, iconoclastic, and then positive and constructive. In this new group psychology we note the lapse of sentimental appeal, then the development of a more positive self-respect and self-reliance; the repudiation of social dependence, and then the gradual recovery from hyper-sensitiveness and “touchy” nerves, the repudiation of the double standard of judgment with its special philanthropic allowances and then the sturdier desire for objective and scientific appraisal; and finally the rise from social disillusionment to race pride, from the sense of social debt to the responsibilities of social contribution, and offsetting the necessary working and commonsense acceptance of restricted conditions, the belief in ultimate esteem and recognition.

The Negro mind reaches out as yet to nothing but American wants, American ideas. But this forced attempt to build his Americanism on race values is a unique social experiment, and its ultimate success is impossible except through the fullest sharing of American culture and institutions. There should be no delusion about this. American nerves in sections unstrung with race hysteria are often fed the opiate that the trend of Negro advance is wholly separatist, and that the effect of its operation will be to encyst the Negro as a benign foreign body in the body politic. This cannot be—even if it were desirable. The racialism of the Negro is no limitation or reservation with respect to American life; it is only a constructive effort to build the obstructions in the stream of his progress into an efficient dam of social energy and power. Democracy itself is obstructed and stagnated to the extent that any of its channels are closed. Indeed they cannot be selectively closed. So the choice is not between one way for the Negro and another way for the rest, but between American institutions frustrated on the one hand and American ideals progressively fulfilled and realized on the other.

More and more, however, an intelligent realization of the great discrepancy between the American social creed and the American social practice forces upon the Negro the taking of the moral advantage that is his. Only the steady and sobering effect of a truly characteristic gentleness of spirit prevents the rapid rise of a definite cynicism and counter-hate and a defiant superiority feeling. Human as this reaction would be, the majority still deprecate its advent, and would gladly see it forestalled by the speedy amelioration of its causes. We wish our race pride to be a healthier, more positive achievement than a feeling based upon a realization of the shortcomings of others. But all paths toward the attainment of a sound social attitude have been difficult; only a relatively few enlightened minds have been able as the phrase puts it “to rise above” prejudice. The ordinary man has had until recently only a hard choice between the alternatives of supine and humiliating submission and stimulating but hurtful counter-prejudice. Fortunately from some inner, desperate resourcefulness has recently sprung up the simple expedient of fighting prejudice by mental passive resistance, in other words by trying to ignore it. For the few, this manna may perhaps be effective, but the masses cannot thrive upon it.

Fortunately there are constructive channels opening out into which the balked social feelings of the American Negro can flow freely.

Without them there would be much more pressure and danger than there is. These compensating interests are racial but in a new and enlarged way. One is the consciousness of acting as the advance-guard of the African peoples in their contact with Twentieth Century civilization; the other, the sense of a mission of rehabilitating the race in world esteem from that loss of prestige for which the fate and conditions of slavery have so largely been responsible. Harlem, as we shall see, is the center of both these movements; she is the home of the Negro's "Zionism."² The pulse of the Negro world has begun to beat in Harlem. A Negro newspaper carrying news material in English, French, and Spanish, gathered from all quarters of America, the West Indies, and Africa has maintained itself in Harlem for over five years. Two important magazines,³ both edited from New York, maintain their news and circulation consistently on a cosmopolitan scale. Under American auspices and backing, three pan-African congresses have been held abroad for the discussion of common interests, colonial questions, and the future cooperative development of Africa. In terms of the race question as a world problem, the Negro mind has leapt, so to speak, upon the parapets of prejudice and extended its cramped horizons. In so doing it has linked up with the growing group consciousness of the dark-peoples and is gradually learning their common interests. As one of our writers has recently put it: "It is imperative that we understand the white world in its relations to the non-white world." As with the Jew, persecution is making the Negro international.

As a world phenomenon this wider race consciousness is a different thing from the much asserted rising tide of color. Its inevitable causes are not of our making. The consequences are not necessarily damaging to the best interests of civilization. Whether it actually brings into being new Armadas of conflict or argosies⁴ of cultural exchange and enlightenment can only be decided by the attitude of the dominant races in an era of critical change. With the American Negro, his new internationalism is primarily an effort to recapture contact with the scattered peoples of African derivation. Garveyism⁵ may be a transient, if spectacular, phenomenon, but the possible role of the American Negro in the future development of Africa is one of the most constructive and universally helpful missions that any modern people can lay claim to.

It might not have been such a jolt had my five years' absence from Harlem been spent otherwise. But the study of medicine includes no courses in cabaretting; and, anyway, the Negro cabarets in Washington, where I studied, are all uncompromisingly black. Accordingly I was entirely unprepared for what I found when I returned to Harlem recently.

I remembered one place especially where my own crowd used to hold forth; and, hoping to find some old-timers there still, I sought it out one midnight. The old, familiar plunkety-plunk welcomed me from below as I entered. I descended the same old narrow stairs, came into the same smoke-misty basement, and found myself a chair at one of the ancient white-porcelain, mirror-smooth tables. I drew a deep breath and looked about, seeking familiar faces. "What a lot of 'fays!'"⁶ I thought, as I noticed the number of white guests. Presently I grew puzzled and began to stare, then I gaped—and gasped. I found myself wondering if this was the right place—if, indeed, this was Harlem at all. I suddenly became aware that, except for the waiters and members of the orchestra, I was the only Negro in the place.

After a while I left it and wandered about in a daze from night-club to night-club. I tried the Nest, Small's, Connie's Inn, the Capitol, Happy's, the Cotton Club. There was no mistake; my discovery was real and was repeatedly confirmed. No wonder my old crowd was not to be found in any of them. The best of Harlem's black cabarets have changed their names and turned white.

Such a discovery renders a moment's recollection irresistible. As irresistible as were the cabarets themselves to me seven or eight years ago. Just out of college in a town where cabarets were something only read about. A year of graduate work ahead. A Summer of rest at hand. Cabarets. Cabarets night after night, and one after another. There was no cover-charge then, and a fifteen-cent bottle of Whistle lasted an hour. It was just after the war⁷—the heroes were home—cabarets were the thing.

How the Lybia prospered in those happy days! It was the gathering place of the swellest Harlem set: if you didn't go to the Lybia, why, my dear, you just didn't belong. The people you saw at church in the morning you met at the Lybia at night. What romance in those war-tinged days and nights! Officers from Camp Upton,⁸ with pretty maids from Brooklyn! Gay lieutenants, handsome captains—all whirling the lively onestep. Poor non-coms⁹ completely ignored; what sensible girl wanted a corporal or even a sergeant? That white, old-fashioned house, standing alone in 138th street, near the corner of Seventh Avenue—doomed to be torn down a few months thence—how it shook with the dancing and laughter of the dark merry crowds!

But the first place really popular with my friends was a Chinese restaurant in 136th Street, which had been known as Hayne's Café and then became the Oriental. It occupied an entire house of three stories, and had carpeted floors and a quiet, superior air. There was excellent food and incredibly good tea and two unusual entertainers: a Cuban girl, who could so vary popular airs that they sounded like real music, and a slender little "brown" with a voice of silver and a way of singing a song that made you forget your food. One could dance in the Oriental if one liked, but one danced to a piano only, and wound one's way between linen-clad tables over velvety, noiseless floors.

6. Short for "ofays," a derogatory term for whites. 7. That is, World War I.

8. Military facility near Manhattan. 9. Noncommissioned officers.

Here we gathered: Fritz Pollard, All-American halfback,¹ selling Negro stock to prosperous Negro physicians; Henry Creamer and Turner Layton, who had written “After You’ve Gone” and a dozen more songs, and were going to write “Strut, Miss Lizzie;” Paul Robeson,² All-American end, on the point of tackling law, quite unaware that the stage would intervene; Preacher Harry Bragg, Harvard Jimmie MacLendon and a half a dozen others. Here at a little table, just inside the door, Bert Williams³ had supper every night, and afterward sometimes joined us upstairs and sang songs with us and lampooned the Actors’ Equity Association, which had barred him because of his color. Never did white guests come to the Oriental except as guests of Negroes. But the manager soon was stricken with a psychosis of some sort, became a black Jew, grew himself a bushy, square-cut beard, donned a skull-cap and abandoned the Oriental. And so we were robbed of our favorite resort, and thereafter became mere rounders.

II

Such places, those real Negro cabarets that we met in the course of our rounds! There was Edmonds’ in Fifth Avenue at 130th Street. It was a sure-enough honky-tonk, occupying the cellar of a saloon. It was the social center of what was then, and still is, Negro Harlem’s kitchen. Here a tall brown-skin girl, unmistakably the one guaranteed in the song to make a preacher lay his Bible down, used to sing and dance her own peculiar numbers, vesting them with her own originality. She was known simply as Ethel,⁴ and was a genuine drawing-card. She knew her importance, too. Other girls wore themselves ragged trying to rise above the inattentive din of conversation, and soon, literally, yelled themselves hoarse; eventually they lost whatever music there was in their voices and acquired that familiar throaty roughness which is so frequent among blues singers, and which, though admired as characteristically African, is as a matter of fact nothing but a form of chronic laryngitis. Other girls did these things, but not Ethel. She took it easy. She would stride with great leisure and self-assurance to the center of the floor, stand there with a half-contemptuous nonchalance, and wait. All would become silent at once. Then she’d begin her song, genuine blues, which, for all their humorous lines, emanated tragedy and heartbreak:

Woke up this mawnin’
The day was dawnin’
And I was sad and blue, so blue, Lord—
Didn’ have nobody
To tell my troubles to—

It was Ethel who first made popular the song, “Tryin’ to Teach My Good Man Right from Wrong,” in the slow, meditative measures in which she complained:

I’m gettin’ sick and tired of my railroad man
I’m gettin’ sick and tired of my railroad man—

I get him when I can.

It wasn't long before this song-bird escaped her dingy cage. Her name is a vaudeville attraction now, and she uses it all—Ethel Waters. Is there anyone who hasn't heard her sing "Shake That Thing!"?

There were the Lybia, then, and Hayne's, Connor's, the Oriental, Edmonds' and the Garden of Joy, each distinctive, standing for a type, some living up to their names, others living down to them, but all predominantly black. Regularly I made the rounds among these places and saw only incidental white people. I have seen them occasionally in numbers, but such parties were out on a lark. They weren't in their natural habitat and they often weren't any too comfortable.

But what of Barron's, you say? Certainly they were at home there. Yes, I know about Barron's. I have been turned away from Barron's because I was too dark to be welcome. I have been a member of a group that was told, "No more room," when we could see plenty of room. Negroes were never actually wanted in Barron's save to work. Dark skins were always discouraged or barred. In short, the fact about Barron's was this: it simply wasn't a Negro cabaret; it was a cabaret run by Negroes for whites. It wasn't even on the lists of those who lived in Harlem—they'd no more think of going there than of going to the Winter Garden Roof.⁵ But these other places were Negro through and through. Negroes supported them, not merely in now-and-then parties, but steadily, night after night.

Some think it's just a fad. White people have always more or less sought Negro entertainment as diversion. The old shows of the early nineteen hundreds, Williams and Walker⁶ and Cole and Johnson, are brought to mind as examples. The howling success—literally that—of J. Leubrie Hill⁷ around 1913 is another; on the road his "Darktown Follies" played in numerous white theatres. In Harlem it played at the black Lafayette and, behold, the Lafayette temporarily became white. And so now, it is held, we are observing merely one aspect of a meteoric phenomenon, which simply presents itself differently in different circumstances: Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson, Jean Toomer and Walter White, Charles Gilpin and Florence Mills⁸—"Green Thursday," "Porgy," "In Abraham's Bosom"⁹—Negro spirituals—the startling new African groups proposed for the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Negro stock is going up, and everybody's buying.

[. . .] It may be a season's whim, then, this sudden, contagious interest in everything Negro. If so, when I go into a familiar cabaret, or the place where a familiar cabaret used to be, and find it transformed and relatively colorless, I may be observing just one form that the season's whim has taken.

But suppose it is a fad—to say that explains nothing. How came the fad? What occasions the focusing of attention on this particular thing—rounds up and gathers these seasonal whims, and centers them about the Negro? Cabarets are peculiar, mind you. They're not like theatres and concert halls. You don't just go to a cabaret and sit back and wait to be entertained. You get out on the floor and join the pow-wow and help entertain yourself. Granted that white people have long enjoyed the Negro entertainment as a diversion, is it not something different, something more, when they bodily throw themselves into Negro entertainment in cabarets? "Now Negroes go to their own cabarets to see how white people act."

And what do we see? Why, we see them actually playing Negro games. I watch them in that epidemic Negroism, the Charleston. I look on and envy them. They camel and fish-tail and turkey, they geche and black-bottom and scronch, they skate and buzzard and mess-around¹—and they do them all better than I! This interest in the Negro is an active and participating interest. It is almost as if a traveler from the North stood watching an African tribe-dance, then suddenly found himself swept wildly into it, caught in its tidal rhythm.

Willingly would I be an outsider in this if I could know that I read it aright—that out of this change in the old familiar ways some finer thing may come. Is this interest akin to that of the Virginians on the veranda of a plantation's big-house—sitting genuinely spellbound as they hear the lugubrious strains floating up from the Negro quarters? Is it akin to that of the African explorer, Stanley,² leaving a village far behind, but halting in spite of himself to catch the boom of its distant drum? Is it significant of basic human responses, the effect of which, once admitted, will extend far beyond cabarets? Maybe these Nordics at last have tuned in on our wave-length. Maybe they are at last learning to speak our language.

*From Two Novels (1928)*³

Claude McKay's Home to Harlem [. . .] for the most part nauseates me, and after the dirtier parts of its filth I feel distinctly like taking a bath. This does not mean that the book is wholly bad. McKay is too great a poet to make any complete failure in writing. There are bits of Home to Harlem beautiful and fascinating: the continued changes upon the theme of the beauty of colored skins; the portrayal of the fascination of their new yearnings for each other which Negroes are developing. The chief character, Jake, has something appealing, and the glimpses of the Haitian, Ray, have all the materials of a great piece of fiction.

But it looks as though, despite this, McKay has set out to cater for that prurient demand on the part of white folk for a portrayal in Negroes of that utter licentiousness which conventional civilization holds white folk back from enjoying—if enjoyment it can be called. That which a certain decadent section of the white American world, centered particularly in New York, longs for with fierce and unrestrained passions, it wants to see written out in black and white, and saddled on black Harlem. This demand, as voiced by a number of New York publishers, McKay has certainly satisfied, and added much for good measure. He has used every art and emphasis to paint drunkenness, fighting, lascivious sexual promiscuity, and utter absence of restraint in as bold and as bright colors as he can.

[. . .] As a picture of Harlem life or of Negro life anywhere, it is, of course, nonsense. Untrue, not so much on account of its facts, but on account of its emphasis and glaring colors. I am sorry that the author of Harlem Shadows stooped to this. I sincerely hope that he will some day rise above it and give us in fiction the strong, well-knit as well as beautiful theme, that it seems to me he might do.

ZORA NEALE HURSTON

How It Feels to Be Colored Me (1928)

I am colored but I offer nothing in the way of extenuating circumstances except the fact that I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother's side was not an Indian chief.

I remember the very day that I became colored. Up to my thirteenth year I lived in the little Negro town of Eatonville, Florida. It is exclusively a colored town. The only white people I knew passed through the town going to or coming from Orlando. The native whites rode dusty horses, the Northern tourists chugged down the sandy village road in automobiles. The town knew the Southerners and never stopped cane chewing when they passed. But the Northerners were something else again. They were peered at cautiously from behind curtains by the timid. The more venturesome would come out on the porch to watch them go past and got just as much pleasure out of the tourists as the tourists got out of the village.

The front porch might seem a daring place for the rest of the town, but it was a gallery seat for me. My favorite place was atop the gate-post. Proscenium box⁴ for a born first-nighter. Not only did I enjoy the show, but I didn't mind the actors knowing that I liked it. I usually spoke to them in passing. I'd wave at them and when they returned my salute, I would say something like this: "Howdy-do-well-I-thank-you-where-you-goin'?" Usually automobile or the horse paused at this, and after a queer exchange of compliments, I would probably "go a piece of the way" with them, as we say in farthest Florida. If one of my family happened to come to the front in time to see me, of course negotiations would be rudely broken off. But even so, it is clear that I was the first "welcome-to-our-state" Floridian, and I hope the Miami Chamber of Commerce will please take notice.

During this period, white people differed from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there. They liked to hear me "speak pieces" and sing and wanted to see me dance the parse-me-la, and gave me generously of their small silver for doing these things, which seemed strange to me for I wanted to do them so much that I needed bribing to stop. Only they didn't know it. The colored people gave no dimes. They deplored any joyful tendencies in me, but I was their Zora nevertheless. I belonged to them, to the nearby hotels, to the county—everybody's Zora.

Zora Neale Hurston

But changes came in the family when I was thirteen, and I was sent to school in Jacksonville. I left Eatonville, the town of the oleanders, as Zora. When I disembarked from the river-boat at Jacksonville, she was no more. It seemed that I had suffered a sea change. I was not Zora of Orange County any more, I was now a little colored girl. I found it out in certain ways. In my heart as well as in the mirror, I became a fast⁵ brown—warranted not to rub nor run.

But I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul, nor lurking behind my eyes. I do not mind at all. I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a lowdown dirty deal and whose feelings are all hurt about it. Even in the helter-skelter skirmish that is my life, I have seen that the world is to the strong regardless of a little pigmentation more or less. No, I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife.⁶

6. Allusion to Shakespeare's The Merry Wives of Windsor: "Why, then the world's mine oyster, / Which I with sword will open" (2.2.4–5).

Someone is always at my elbow reminding me that I am the grand-daughter of slaves. It fails to register depression with me. Slavery is sixty years in the past. The operation was successful and the patient is doing well, thank you. The terrible struggle that made me an American out of a potential slave said "On the line!" The Reconstruction said "Get set!"; and the generation before said "Go!" I am off to a flying start and I must not halt in the stretch to look behind and weep. Slavery is the price I paid for civilization, and the choice was not with me. It is a bully adventure and worth all that I have paid through my ancestors for it. No one on earth ever had a greater chance for glory. The world to be won and nothing to be lost. It is thrilling to think—to know that for any act of mine, I shall get twice as much praise or twice as much blame. It is quite exciting to hold the center of the national stage, with the spectators not knowing whether to laugh or to weep.

The position of my white neighbor is much more difficult. No brown specter pulls up a chair beside me when I sit down to eat. No dark ghost thrusts its leg against mine in bed. The game of keeping what one has is never so exciting as the game of getting.

I do not always feel colored. Even now I often achieve the unconscious Zora of Eatonville before the Hegira.⁷ I feel most colored when I am thrown against a sharp white background.

For instance at Barnard.⁸ "Beside the waters of the Hudson" I feel my race. Among the thousand white persons, I am a dark rock surged upon, and overswept, but through it all, I remain myself. When covered by the waters, I am; and the ebb but reveals me again.

Sometimes it is the other way around. A white person is set down in our midst, but the contrast is just as sharp for me. For instance, when I sit in the drafty basement that is The New World Cabaret with a white person, my color comes. We enter chatting about any little nothing that we have in common and are seated by the jazz waiters. In the abrupt way that jazz orchestras have, this one plunges into a number. It loses no time in circumlocutions, but gets right down to business. It constricts the thorax and splits the heart with its tempo and narcotic harmonies. This orchestra grows rambunctious, rears on its hind legs and attacks the tonal veil with primitive fury, rending it, clawing it until it breaks through to the jungle beyond. I follow those heathen—follow them exultingly. I dance wildly inside myself; I yell within, I whoop; I shake my assegai⁹ above my head, I hurl it true to the mark yeeeeooww! I am in the jungle and living in the jungle way. My face is painted red and yellow and my body is painted blue. My pulse is throbbing like a war drum. I want to slaughter something—give pain, give death to what, I do not know. But the piece ends. The men of the orchestra wipe their lips and rest their fingers. I creep back slowly to the veneer we call civilization with the last tone and find the white friend sitting motionless in his seat, smoking calmly.

“Good music they have here,” he remarks, drumming the table with his fingertips.

Music. The great blobs of purple and red emotion have not touched him. He has only heard what I felt. He is far away and I see him but dimly across the ocean and the continent that have fallen between us. He is so pale with his whiteness then and I am so colored.

At certain times I have no race, I am me. When I set my hat at a certain angle and saunter down Seventh Avenue, Harlem City, feeling as snooty as the lions in front of the Forty-Second Street Library,¹ for instance. So far as my feelings are concerned, Peggy Hopkins Joyce on the Boule Mich² with her gorgeous raiment, stately carriage, knees knocking together in a most aristocratic manner, has nothing on me. The cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time. I am the eternal feminine with its string of beads.

I have no separate feeling about being an American citizen and colored. I am merely a fragment of the Great Soul that surges within the boundaries. My country, right or wrong.

Sometimes, I feel discriminated against, but it does not make me angry. It merely astonishes me. How can any deny themselves the pleasure of my company? It's beyond me.

But in the main, I feel like a brown bag of miscellany propped against a wall. Against a wall in company with other bags, white, red and yellow. Pour out the contents, and there is discovered a jumble of small things priceless and worthless. A first-water diamond,³ an empty spool, bits of broken glass, lengths of string, a key to a door long since crumbled away, a rusty knife-blade, old shoes saved for a road that never was and never will be, a nail bent under the weight of things too heavy for any nail, a dried flower or two still a little fragrant. In your hand is the brown bag. On the ground before you is the jumble it held—so much like the jumble in the bags, could they be emptied, that all might be dumped in a single heap and the bags refilled without altering the content of any greatly. A bit of colored glass more or less would not matter. Perhaps that is how the Great Stuffer of Bags filled them in the first place—who knows?

Harlem Literati

The summer of 1926, I lived in a rooming house on 137th Street, where Wallace Thurman and Harcourt Tynes⁴ also lived. Thurman was then managing editor of the Messenger, a Negro magazine that had a curious career. It began by being very radical, racial, and socialistic, just after the war. I believe it received a grant from the Garland Fund⁵ in its early days. Then it later became a kind of Negro society magazine and a plugger for Negro business, with photographs of prominent colored ladies and their nice homes in it. A. Philip Randolph, now President of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, Chandler Owen, and George S. Schuyler were connected with it. Schuyler's editorials, à la Mencken,⁶ were the most interesting things in the magazine, verbal brickbats that said sometimes one thing, sometimes another, but always vigorously. I asked Thurman what kind of magazine the Messenger was, and he said it reflected the policy of whoever paid off best at the time.

Anyway, the Messenger bought my first short stories. They paid me ten dollars a story. Wallace Thurman wrote me that they were very bad stories, but better than any others they could find, so he published them.

Thurman had recently come from California to New York. He was a strangely brilliant black boy, who had read everything, and whose critical mind could find something wrong with everything he read. I have no critical mind, so I usually either like a book or don't. But I am not capable of liking a book and then finding a million things wrong with it, too—as Thurman was capable of doing.

Thurman had read so many books because he could read eleven lines at a time. He would get from the library a great pile of volumes that would have taken me a year to read. But he would go through them in less than a week, and be able to discuss each one at great length with anybody. That was why, I suppose, he was later given a job as a reader at Macaulay's—the only Negro reader, so far as I know, to be employed by any of the larger publishing firms.

Wallace Thurman wanted to be a great writer, but none of his own work ever made him happy. The Blacker the Berry,⁷ his first book, was an important novel on a subject little dwelt upon in Negro fiction—the plight of the very dark Negro woman, who encounters in some communities a double wall of color prejudice within and without the race. His play, Harlem, considerably distorted for box office purposes, was, nevertheless, a compelling study—and the only one in the theater—of the impact of Harlem on a Negro family fresh from the South. And his Infants of the Spring, a superb and bitter study of the bohemian fringe of Harlem's literary and artistic life, is a compelling book.

But none of these things pleased Wallace Thurman. He wanted to be a very great writer, like Gorki or Thomas Mann,⁸ and he felt that he was merely a journalistic writer. His critical mind, comparing his pages to the thousands of other pages he had read, by Proust, Melville, Tolstoy, Galsworthy, Dostoyevski, Henry

So he contented himself by writing a great deal for money, laughing bitterly at his fabulously concocted “true stories,” creating two bad motion pictures¹ of the “Adults Only” type for Hollywood, drinking more and more gin, and then threatening to jump out of windows at people’s parties and kill himself.

During the summer of 1926, Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, John P. Davis, Bruce Nugent, Gwendolyn Bennett,² and I decided to publish “a Negro quarterly of the arts” to be called Fire—the idea being that it would burn up a lot of the old, dead conventional Negro-white ideas of the past, *épater le bourgeois*³ into a realization of the existence of the younger Negro writers and artists, and provide us with an outlet for publication not available in the limited pages of the small Negro magazines then existing, the Crisis, Opportunity, and the Messenger—the first two being house organs of inter-racial organizations, and the latter being God knows what.

Sweltering summer evenings we met to plan Fire. Each of the seven of us agreed to give fifty dollars to finance the first issue. Thurman was to edit it, John P. Davis to handle the business end, and Bruce Nugent to take charge of distribution. The rest of us were to serve as an editorial board to collect material, contribute our own work, and act in any useful way that we could.

I don’t know how Thurman persuaded the printer to let us have all the copies to distribute, but he did. I think Alain Locke, among others, signed notes guaranteeing payments. But since Thurman was the only one of the seven of us with a regular job, for the next three or four years his checks were constantly being attached and his income seized to pay for Fire. And whenever I sold a poem, mine went there, too—to Fire.

None of the older Negro intellectuals would have anything to do with Fire. Dr. DuBois⁴ in the Crisis roasted it. The Negro press called it all sorts of bad names, largely because of a green and purple story by Bruce Nugent, in the Oscar Wilde⁵ tradition, which we had included. Rean Graves, the critic for the Baltimore Afro-American, began his review by saying: “I have just tossed the first issue of Fire into the fire.” Commenting upon various of our contributors, he said: “Aaron Douglas who, in spite of himself and the meaningless grotesqueness of his creations, has gained a reputation as an artist, is permitted to spoil three perfectly good pages and a cover with his pen and ink hodge podge. beautiful poem in his 'From a Dark Tower,' but tries his best to obscure the thought in superfluous sentences. Langston Hughes displays his usual ability to say nothing in many words."

So Fire had plenty of cold water thrown on it by the colored critics. The white critics (except for an excellent editorial in the Bookman for November, 1926) scarcely noticed it at all. We had no way of getting it distributed to bookstands or news stands. Bruce Nugent took it around New York on foot and some of the Greenwich Village bookshops put it on display, and sold it for us. But then Bruce, who had no job, would collect the money and, on account of salary, eat it up before he got back to Harlem.

Finally, irony of ironies, several hundred copies of Fire were stored in the basement of an apartment where an actual fire occurred and the bulk of the whole issue was burned up. Even after that Thurman had to go on paying the printer.

Now Fire is a collector's item, and very difficult to get, being mostly ashes.

That taught me a lesson about little magazines. But since white folks had them, we Negroes thought we could have one, too. But we didn't have the money.

[. . .] About the future of Negro literature Thurman was very pessimistic. He thought the Negro vogue had made us all too conscious of ourselves, had flattered and spoiled us, and had provided too many easy opportunities for some of us to drink gin and more gin, on which he thought we would always be drunk. With his bitter sense of humor, he called the Harlem literati, the "niggerati."

Of this "niggerati," Zora Neale Hurston was certainly the most amusing. Only to reach a wider audience, need she ever write books—because she is a perfect book of entertainment in herself. In her youth she was always getting scholarships and things from wealthy white people, some of whom simply paid her just to sit around and represent the Negro race for them, she did it in such a racy fashion. She was full of side-splitting anecdotes, humorous tales, and tragicomic stories, remembered out of her life in the South as a daughter of a travelling minister of God. She could make you laugh one minute and cry the next. To many of her white friends, no doubt, she was a perfect "darkie," in the nice meaning they give the term—that is a naïve, childlike, sweet, humorous, and highly colored Negro.

But Miss Hurston was clever, too—a student who didn't let college give her a broad a and who had great scorn for all pretensions, academic or otherwise. That is why she was such a fine folk-lore collector,⁶ able to go among the people and never act as if she had been to school at all. Almost nobody else could stop the average Harlemit on Lenox Avenue and measure his head with a strange-looking, anthropological device and not get bawled out for the attempt, except Zora, who used to stop anyone whose head looked interesting, and measure it.

Harlem was like a great magnet for the Negro intellectual, pulling him from everywhere. Or perhaps the magnet was New York—but once in New York, he had to live in Harlem, for rooms were hardly to be found elsewhere unless one could pass for white or Mexican or Eurasian and perhaps live in the Village⁷—which always seemed to me a very arty locale, in spite of the many real artists and writers who lived there. Only a few of the New Negroes lived in the Village, Harlem being their real stamping ground.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Many poets of the Harlem Renaissance made extensive use of the sonnet form; this chapter contains such examples as Countee Cullen's FROM THE DARK TOWER, Helene Johnson's SONNET TO A NEGRO IN HARLEM, and Claude McKay's IF WE MUST DIE. (Another chapter includes McKay's THE HARLEM DANCER.) Write an essay in which you compare some of the sonnets written during the Harlem Renaissance. How do different approaches to the sonnet form signal different thematic concerns? What might attract these writers to the sonnet or make it an especially effective form in this context and for their purposes in particular poems?
2. In 1921, James Weldon Johnson wrote of "the need for Aframerican poets in the United States to work out a new and distinctive form of expression." Judging from the selections in this chapter, do you think that poets such as Langston Hughes and Claude McKay met the need articulated by Johnson? Write an essay in which you examine both traditionalism and innovation in the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. How distinct are the works of black and white poets during this period?
3. In The New Negro, Alain Locke declares, "In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination." Do poems such as Arna Bontemps's A BLACK MAN TALKS OF REAPING, Angelina Grimké's THE BLACK FINGER, and Langston Hughes's I, Too achieve a common social consciousness—Locke's "group expression"? What political effect do you think these poets hoped to achieve through their work? Write an essay in which you analyze the political ideas in the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance.
4. Some poems of the Harlem Renaissance—Langston Hughes's THE WEARY BLUES and Claude McKay's THE HARLEM DANCER, for example—are explicitly about music; others, such as Countee Cullen's SATURDAY'S CHILD, with its ballad form, and Angelina Grimké's improvisational TENEBRIS, take a distinctly musical approach. Write an essay about the interplay of words and music in the poetry of this period.
5. In his review of Claude McKay's Home to Harlem, W. E. B. Du Bois laments that McKay "stooped" to betraying the black cause by portraying "drunkenness, fighting, lascivious sexual promiscuity, and utter absence of restraint" in his novel's black characters. Do writers have a particular duty to portray positive role models? Do writers from ethnic groups engaged in social struggle have an obligation to participate in that struggle? Citing evidence from the selections in this chapter, write an essay in which you weigh the demands of artistic duty against the demands of artistic freedom.
6. What does it mean for a group of artists to be considered a "school"—that is, a group whose work appears to share common themes, styles, and goals? Write an essay in which you discuss whether or not the writers of the Harlem Renaissance spoke with a unified voice. Does a grouping like "the Harlem Renaissance" help our understanding of this period and the art it produced, or does it obscure the individual achievements of the artists?
7. Identify any two poets in this anthology whose work interests you and who lived and wrote in roughly the same time and place. (The biographies at the end of the Poetry section might be a helpful place to start.) Then do a bit of research. Did your two poets have similar backgrounds? Are they considered part of the same or competing "movements" or "schools"? Drawing on your research, write an essay in which you compare at least one poem by each poet and explore how the poems were each shaped by historical and cultural context. Alternatively, choose two poets in this anthology who wrote poems on similar topics or of the same type or genre (odes or sonnets, for example) but who lived and wrote in very different times and/or places. Then write a research essay exploring how historical and/or cultural context might shape the different ways in which each writer approaches the same topic or genre.

SAMPLE WRITING: RESEARCH ESSAY

As chapters 9, 23, and 28 suggest, essays about cultural and historical context must do more than simply report the facts about the context in or about which a poem (or any other literary text) is written. Rather, they must draw on such facts to illuminate the text, to show us something about how the text works and means that we might not otherwise see. Many such essays thus originate with the same broad, interpretive question: How does a particular text not only reflect but also respond to and comment on a specific historical moment and situation? To be effective, however, each essay must narrow this question, homing in on some particular difficulty or question endemic to the moment or situation and the literary text.

The following essay is a case in point. Reading Langston Hughes's poem I, Too in the context of the Harlem Renaissance, the essay focuses specifically on how the poem envisions the plight and possibilities of the black poet in 1920s and 1930s America, demonstrating the distinctiveness of Hughes's vision by comparing it to that of other Harlem Renaissance writers.

To do so, the essay's writer, Irene Morstan, draws upon primary and secondary sources she discovered online, as well as material included in chapter 23. What purpose does each source serve in the essay, or how exactly does Morstan use each source to make her argument? How effectively does she use her sources? integrate and balance textual and contextual analysis? To what aspects of the poem might she pay more attention?

"They'll See How Beautiful I Am": "I, Too" and the Harlem Renaissance

Langston Hughes begins his 1926 essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" with a statement made to him by another black poet: "I want to be a poet—not a Negro poet." Hughes takes this to mean that the poet wishes he were a white poet, and pities the poet for this. He believes that the black poet should accept his blackness. The goal for black poets should not be to sound like white poets but to celebrate and embrace their black identity.

Hughes was a central figure in a movement called the Harlem Renaissance, which was “a period of ten or fifteen years in the early twentieth century when an extraordinarily talented group of people came together . . . to celebrate and embody the awakening of a new African American consciousness” (Mays, “Cultural” 1065). The Norton Introduction to Literature states, “The Harlem Renaissance represented powerful assertions: that America had to include the voices of black Americans in order to find its own full definition and, equally, that artistic creativity . . . was essential to black Americans’ realization and assertion of their full humanity” (Mays, “Cultural” 1065). Hughes speaks to both of those assertions in his poem “I, Too.” He insists upon the place of the black poet, and person, at the American “table” and upon the power of the black poet to “sing.”

The opening of “I, Too” is a declaration of the black man as a poet, despite being historically excluded from such a title. In the first line of the poem “I, too, sing America,” Hughes indicates that the speaker is a poet. Hughes related poetry to music, suggesting that he thinks music making and writing poetry are related. Not only is the speaker a poet, but he is a black poet. By the second line of the poem the race of the speaker is clear; he refers to himself as the “darker brother.” The “too” in the first line implies that the speaker has been set apart from another group of people, that he has been excluded from “sing[ing] America.” However, the speaker is responding to this exclusion with an affirmative statement that he is both a black poet and part of the American family, despite being set aside by white people.

Refusing to be set aside was an important part of the Harlem Renaissance. James Weldon Johnson, in his preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry, says black poets moved away from writing in dialect to keep white people from thinking of them as “a happy-go-lucky, singing, shuffling, banjo-picking being or as a more or less pathetic figure” (1079). Black poets in the Harlem Renaissance did not want to be stereotyped by whites; they did not want to be Jim from Mark Twain’s Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Such stereotypes made black people easy to overlook because they were represented as caricatures of people. These figures did not accurately represent the black person as a complex human being capable of artistic achievement. Not all Harlem Renaissance poets responded to this in the same way. The author of “Literature of the Harlem Renaissance” states, “Countee Cullen insisted that the Black poet is a part of the universal community of all poets, while Langston Hughes asserted his unique racial qualities” (260). While Hughes, in “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain,” says that he does not believe that black people should give up any of the things associated with black identity, including writing in dialect, he does explore the dismissal of the black poet by the white audience through “I, Too.”

This theme of black exclusion surfaces in the second stanza where the speaker talks about how “They send me to eat in the kitchen / When company comes” (lines 3-4). Here “they” refers to white people who dismiss the black poet from the “table” (9). These lines suggest that the white people are perhaps ashamed of “the darker brother” and do not want him to be present in front of the other white guests, the “company.” Maybe they don’t even see him as a brother, just a servant. This reflects the place of the black artist in the 1920s and 1930s. While the black artist might occasionally be present, he was meant to be a source of entertainment for white people, not an equal. Rudolph Fisher discusses the white interest in Harlem in The Caucasian Storms Harlem, where he notes, "White people have always more or less sought Negro entertainment as diversion" (1087). Despite being suspicious of white peoples' impulses to go to Harlem nightclubs, Fisher hopes that this white interest in black artistry will be the beginning of "finer thing[s]" and that "they are at last learning to speak our language" (1088).

The speaker of "I, Too" also sees that finer things are on the horizon. Even though he has been sent to the kitchen, a place reminiscent of the institution of slavery where black slaves worked to feed their white masters, the speaker of the poem says, "I laugh, / And eat well, / And grow strong" (lines 5-7). This dismissal has not crushed his spirit, and "Tomorrow, / I'll sit at the table" (8-9). Hughes's speaker anticipates the time when the black poet will no longer be cast aside. Because of his strength and his spirit he is undeniable. In the future,

Nobody'll dare
Say to me,
"Eat in the kitchen" (11-13)

And the black spirit was undeniable during the Harlem Renaissance. The number of notable black authors and artists gathered in one place was incredible. During the 1920s and 1930s writers like Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Angelina Grimké, as well as Langston Hughes, were all in Harlem. This was one of the first times that black people from all over America were in one place together, as "more than 100,000 blacks migrated to Harlem during the 1920s" (Mays, "Cultural" 1066). Alain Locke, author of The New Negro, saw this as a turning point in black history and in the history of America, even arguing that it created a real black "race." In 1925, he wrote,

Hitherto, it must be admitted that American Negroes have been a race more in name than in fact, or to be exact, more in sentiment than in experience. The chief bond between them has been that of a common condition rather than a common consciousness; a problem in common rather than a life in common. In Harlem, Negro life is seizing upon its first chances for group expression and self-determination. (1080)

The Harlem Renaissance was a movement where black writers, even though they may have had some differences, joined together to create black art according to their own rules, not the rules of white people. Black artists had "grow[n] strong," and it is this strength that the speaker of "I, Too" sees as causing change between black and whites.

However, as hopeful as the speaker is, he acknowledges that this has not yet happened. By placing "then" on its own line and at the end of the sentence (line 14), Hughes highlights that these actions are yet to come. The "then" in the poem sounds wistful, as if the speaker gets very excited about the prospect of being acknowledged and respected, only to remember the difficulties that lie between the current state of affairs and the one dreamt of for the future. Racial inequality was still prevalent at the time of the Harlem Renaissance, and the situation did not improve for some time. During the 1920s and 1930s segregation was still normal. (Langston Hughes said that an African American who moved to New York “had to live in Harlem, for rooms were hardly to be found elsewhere unless one could pass for white or Mexican or Eurasian” [The Big Sea 1095], and Fisher says that blacks like him were surprisingly even excluded from some Harlem clubs [1087].) On the other hand, the isolation of the “then” on its own line also could be read as being firmly insistent that a positive change will come. This echoes the goal of the writers of the Harlem Renaissance, “to [raise] the aspirations of American blacks of all backgrounds and abilities” (Mays, “Cultural” 1068). In this reading, “then” is both a statement of faith about the future and a call to action about now.

These two readings reflect two different black views of Harlem Renaissance literature. Some people were cynical and did not believe that change had come or would. Langston Hughes recounts that “[a]bout the future of Negro literature [Wallace] Thurman was very pessimistic. He thought the Negro vogue had made us all too conscious of ourselves, had flattered and spoiled us, and had provided too many easy opportunities for some of us to drink gin and more gin, on which he thought we would always be drunk” (The Big Sea 1095). In contrast to this dark view of the Harlem Renaissance is novelist Zora Neale Hurston’s view of the position of black people in 1920s America. In “How It Feels to Be Colored Me,” she states, “I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul nor lurking behind my eyes. . . . I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a lowdown dirty deal. . . . I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife” (1090). Here Hurston is expressing that she is not brought down by the slavery of the past, but is making herself ready to make the world hers. Her view is the positive one found in Hughes’s poem.

Just as the writers of the Harlem Renaissance wanted their creative abilities to be appreciated, so they also wanted black people and culture to be appreciated and embraced by the American public. The speaker of “I, Too” makes this apparent at the end of the poem when he says,

Besides,
They’ll see how beautiful I am
And be ashamed—

I, too, am America. (lines 15-18)

The speaker is asserting that being black is being beautiful and that people who have discriminated against blacks will be ashamed of their behavior when they really see what black people are like. Not only are black people beautiful, they are part of America as well. The speaker of the poem makes this clear when he says that he is America. This “darker brother” is just as much a part of America as a white person (2), so he should not be excluded, either physically or literarily. Hughes, like many other writers of the Harlem Renaissance, is insisting that all Americans recognize the place of black people, both culturally and creatively, in the American identity.

Hughes speaks not only to white people in “I, Too” but also to other writers during the Harlem Renaissance. As is illustrated in the opening anecdote, Hughes was insistent about honoring blackness and common black life. He thought that all aspects of black life were worth celebrating, and “[u]nlike other notable black poets of the period” including Claude McKay and Countee Cullen “Hughes refused to differentiate between his personal experience and the common experience of black America. He wanted to tell the stories of his people in ways that reflected their actual culture, including both their suffering and their love of music, laughter, and language itself” (“Langston Hughes”). Hughes’s references to race and beauty throughout “I, Too” show that he was committed to representing black life in a positive way.

Langston Hughes and the writers of the Harlem Renaissance are an important part of American history and have had a lasting impact on American literature. The quality of their works and power of their message shaped American culture. Through creative pieces like “I, Too,” Hughes shows audiences how black literature and black people were valuable parts of the American identity.

24 | CRITICAL CONTEXTS: SYLVIA PLATH'S "DADDY"

As the previous Exploring Contexts chapters have suggested, poems draw on all kinds of earlier texts, experiences, and events. But they also produce new contexts of discussion and interpretation, ongoing conversations about the poems themselves. Different readers of poems see different things in them, so naturally a variety of interpretations and evaluations develop around any poem that is read repeatedly by various readers. Many of those interpretations are published in specialized journals and books (the selections that follow are all reprinted from published sources), and a kind of dialogue develops among readers, producing a body of commentary about the poem. Professional interpreters of texts are called literary critics, and the textual analysis they provide is called literary criticism—not because their work is necessarily negative or corrective, but because they ask hard, analytical, “critical” questions and interpret texts through a wide variety of literary, historical, biographical, psychological, aesthetic, moral, political, or social perspectives.

Your own interpretive work may seem to you more private and far removed from such professional writing about poems. But once you engage in class discussion or talk informally about a poem, you are practicing literary criticism—offering comments, analyzing, judging, putting the poem into some kind of perspective that makes it more intelligible. You are, in effect, joining the ongoing conversation about the poem. And when you write about the poem, you may often engage the opinions of others—your teacher, fellow students, or published critics. You may not have the experience or specific expertise of professional critics, but you can respond to their work and use it in your own.

There are many ways to engage literary criticism and put it to work for you. The most common is to draw on published work for specific information about the poem: glossings of particular terms; explanations of references or situations you don't recognize; accounts of how, when, and under what circumstances the poem was written. Such material can also serve as a springboard for your own interpretation, as you build on what someone else has argued or, if you disagree, use that argument as a point of departure.

When you use the work of others, you must give full credit, carefully indicating the sources of all direct quotations and all borrowed ideas. You must always tell your reader exactly how to find the material you quote, paraphrase, or summarize. Usually, you do this through careful notes and a list of citations (that is, a bibliography) at the end of your paper. (See ch. 34 for help with citation and documentation.)

It is usually best to do your own extensive analysis of a poem before consulting other critics. Your own reading experience gives you a legitimate perspective. You always want to take in new information and to challenge both your first impressions and your considered analyses—but don't be too quick simply to adopt somebody else's ideas. The best way to test the views of others is to compare them critically to your own conclusions, which you might then want to supplement, refine, extend, or even scrap altogether. You can sharpen your skills by testing your views against those of people with extensive interpretive experience. As you will discover, even the experts disagree. One measure of a poem's greatness is its ability to stimulate disagreement and a broad range of interpretation.

Judged by that standard, the poem featured in this chapter is among the very greatest of the twentieth century. First published posthumously in 1965 and famously declared "monstrous" by distinguished Jewish American critic Irving Howe, Sylvia Plath's DADDY has generated countless interpretations and unusually heated debate among a wide array of readers. As the rash of newspaper, magazine, and Web articles inspired by the fiftieth anniversary of Plath's suicide in 2013 suggest, moreover, it is a debate that is still very much alive. This chapter invites you to enter that debate: Beginning with the poem itself (which is where we hope you, too, will begin), it features excerpts from several especially influential commentaries published over the last fifty years (including Howe's), as well as an exercise and "Suggestions for Writing" designed to help you develop your own informed response to both the poem and its critical context.

SYLVIA PLATH

Daddy

You do not do, you do not do
 Any more, black shoe
 In which I have lived like a foot
 For thirty years, poor and white,
 5 Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.

Daddy, I have had to kill you.
 You died before I had time—
 Marble-heavy, a bag full of God,
 Ghastly statue with one gray toe¹
 10 Big as a Frisco seal

And a head in the freakish Atlantic
 Where it pours bean green over blue
 In the waters off beautiful Nauset.²
 I used to pray to recover you.

In the German tongue, in the Polish town⁴
 Scraped flat by the roller
 Of wars, wars, wars.
 But the name of the town is common.

 It stuck in a barb wire snare.
 Ich,⁵ ich, ich, ich,
 I could hardly speak.
 I thought every German was you.

Preparing a Response to Critical Contexts: An Exercise

Before you read the criticism on Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" reprinted in this chapter, carefully read the poem itself several times. Ask all the analytical questions you have found useful in other cases: Who is speaking? to whom? when? under what conditions? What is the full situation? What kind of language does the poem use? How does the poem use metaphor? allusion? historical reference? What strategies of rhythm and sound does the poem use? What is the poem's tone? When was the poem written, and how does it reflect its time? What do you know about the person who wrote it? In what ways is this poem like others you have read by this poet or by this poet's contemporaries?

Once you have a preliminary "reading" of your own and have noted answers to these questions, look at the selections that follow. In order to come up with ideas for an essay incorporating the selections, you might follow these basic steps:

- Read each critical piece carefully and keep close track of all the things with which you agree and (even more important) disagree.
- Look specifically for information and facts that are new to you; examine and question the information carefully.
- Look for points of disagreement among the critics, make a list of the most important issues raised, and look for the parts of the poem over which disagreements occur.
- Once you have prepared your notes and absorbed some of the criticism, how do you participate in the debate about Sylvia Plath's poem? Here are some possible topics for an essay that draws on published criticism:
 - Your essay could show that others have overlooked or misinterpreted something significant. Do critics ignore something in or about the poem that should be explored? Do they make some observation or claim in passing that seems worthy of further consideration?
 - Your essay could be an overview of critical trends in the study of this poem, making clear which interpretations you find helpful, and where your own interpretation differs from others. Sort the critics into two or three groups according to their interpretation of "Daddy." Which critics place the most emphasis on Plath's psychology, personal experience, and self-expression? Which critics stress her development as a poet with a specific style? Which critics highlight her social criticism, either of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust or of sexism and women's oppression, or both? (See "Critical Approaches" for help identifying and describing the approaches of these critics or groups of critics.)
- In one or two sentences, write a thesis statement expressing your views on various critical approaches, such as the following:

- Criticism of Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" has gone too far with a biographical approach, whereas myth criticism would facilitate a better understanding of the poem.
- The life of Sylvia Plath provides a key to a reading of her poem "Daddy." As suggested by critics (including George Steiner, A. Alvarez, and Steven Gould Axelrod) and biographical sources, the poem expresses violent emotional aspects of her life, including her unresolved attachment to her father, Otto Plath; her power struggle with her husband, Ted Hughes; and her suicide attempt.
- Feminist readings of Sylvia Plath's "Daddy" have taken different approaches: Some focus on biographical evidence of Plath's experience as a woman, whereas others, such as Margaret Homans's "A Feminine Tradition," consider a "literal" identification of the woman poet with the female speaker of the poem to be a reinforcement of the idea that women can never escape their personal, physical lives. This essay balances these feminist approaches to "Daddy," examining it as a semi-autobiographical dramatic monologue: The speaker responds to some experiences Plath had as a daughter and wife, but the poem is not wholly autobiographical.

CRITICAL EXCERPTS

GEORGE STEINER

From Dying Is an Art (1967)⁵

Sylvia Plath's last poems have already passed into legend as both representative of our present tone of emotional life and unique in their implacable, harsh brilliance [. . .].

The spell does not lie wholly in the poems themselves. The suicide of Sylvia Plath at the age of thirty-one in 1963, and the personality of this young woman who had come from Massachusetts to study and live in England (where she married Ted Hughes, himself a gifted poet), are vital parts of it. To those who knew her and to the greatly enlarged circle who were electrified by her last poems and sudden death, she had come to signify the specific honesties and risks of the poet's condition. Her personal style, and the price in private harrowing she so obviously paid to achieve the intensity and candor of her principal poems, have taken on their own dramatic authority.

All this makes it difficult to judge the poems. I mean that the vehemence and intimacy of the verse is such as to constitute a very powerful rhetoric of sincerity. The poems play on our nerves with their own proud nakedness, making claims so immediate and sharply urged that the reader flinches, embarrassed by the routine discretions and evasions of his own sensibility. Yet if these poems are to take life among us, if they are to be more than exhibits in the history of modern psychological stress, they must be read with all the intelligence and scruple we can muster. They are too honest, they have cost too much, to be yielded to myth.

It requires no biographical impertinence to realize that Sylvia Plath's life was harried by bouts of physical pain, that she sometimes looked on the accumulated exactions of her own nerve and body as "a trash / To annihilate each decade."⁶ She was haunted by the piecemeal, strung-together mechanics of the flesh. [. . .] The hospital ward was her exemplary ground:

My patent leather overnight case like a black pillbox,
My husband and child smiling out of the family photo;
Their smiles catch onto my skin, little smiling hooks.⁷

This brokenness, so sharply feminine and contemporary, is, I think, her principal realization [. . .]. This new frankness of women about the specific hurts and tangles of their nervous-physiological makeup is as vital to the poetry of Sylvia Plath as it is to the tracts of Simone de Beauvoir⁸ or to the novels of Edna O'Brien and Brigid Brophy.⁹ Women speak out as never before [. . .].

Where Emily Dickinson could—indeed was obliged to—shut the door on the riot and humiliations of the flesh, thus achieving her particular dry lightness, Sylvia Plath "fully assumed her own condition." This alone would assure her of a place in modern literature. But she took one step further, assuming a burden that was not naturally or necessarily hers.

Born in Boston in 1932 of German and Austrian parents, Sylvia Plath had no personal, immediate contact with the world of the concentration camps. I may be mistaken, but so far as I know there was nothing Jewish in her background. But her last, greatest poems culminate in an act of identification, of total communion with those tortured and massacred. [Here Steiner quotes lines 31–40 of "Daddy."]

Sylvia Plath is only one of a number of young contemporary poets, novelists, and playwrights, themselves in no way implicated in the actual holocaust, who have done most to counter the general inclination to forget the death camps. Perhaps it is only those who had no part in the events who can focus on them rationally and imaginatively; to those who experienced the thing, it has lost the hard edges of possibility, it has stepped outside the real.

Committing the whole of her poetic and formal authority to the metaphor, to the mask of language, Sylvia Plath became a woman being transported to Auschwitz on the death trains. The notorious shards of massacre seemed to enter into her own being:

A cake of soap,
A wedding ring,
A gold filling.¹

In “Daddy” she wrote one of the very few poems I know of in any language to come near the last horror. It achieves the classic act of generalization, translating a private, obviously intolerable hurt into a code of plain statement, of instantaneously public images which concern us all. It is the “Guernica”² of modern poetry. And it is both histrionic and, in some ways, “arty,” as is Picasso’s outcry.

Are these final poems entirely legitimate? In what sense does anyone, himself uninvolved and long after the event, commit a subtle larceny when he invokes the echoes and trappings of Auschwitz and appropriates an enormity of ready emotion to his own private design? Was there latent in Sylvia Plath’s sensibility, as in that of many of us who remember only by fiat of imagination, a fearful envy, a dim resentment at not having been there, of having missed the rendezvous with hell? In “Lady Lazarus” and “Daddy” the realization seems to me so complete, the sheer rawness and control so great, that only irresistible need could have brought it off. These poems take tremendous risks, extending Sylvia Plath’s essentially austere manner to the very limit. They are a bitter triumph, proof of the capacity of poetry to give to reality the greater permanence of the imagined. She could not return from them.

A. ALVAREZ

*From Sylvia Plath (1968)*³

The reasons for Sylvia Plath's images are always there, though sometimes you have to work hard to find them. She is, in short, always in intelligent control of her feelings. Her work bears out her theories:

I think my poems come immediately out of the sensuous and emotional experiences I have, but I must say I cannot sympathise with these cries from the heart that are informed by nothing except a needle or a knife or whatever it is. I believe that one should be able to control and manipulate experiences, even the most terrifying—like madness, being tortured, this kind of experience—and one should be able to manipulate these experiences with an informed and intelligent mind. I think that personal experience shouldn't be a kind of shut box and mirror-looking narcissistic experience. I believe it should be generally relevant, to such things as Hiroshima and Dachau, and so on.

It seems to me that it was only by her determination both to face her most inward and terrifying experiences and to use her intelligence in doing so—so as not to be overwhelmed by them—that she managed to write these extraordinary last poems, which are at once deeply autobiographical and yet detached, generally relevant.

[. . .] She assumes the suffering of all the modern victims. Above all, she becomes an imaginary Jew. I think this is a vitally important element in her work. For two reasons. First, because anyone whose subject is suffering has a ready-made modern example of hell on earth in the concentration camps. And what matters in them is not so much the physical torture—since sadism is general and perennial—but the way modern, as it were industrial, techniques can be used to destroy utterly the human identity. [. . .] This anonymity of pain, which makes all dignity impossible, was Sylvia Plath's subject. Second, she seemed convinced, in these last poems, that the root of her suffering was the death of her father, whom she loved, who abandoned her, and who dragged her after him into death. And in her fantasies her father was pure German, pure Aryan, pure anti-semite.

It all comes together in the most powerful of her last poems, "Daddy," about which she wrote the following bleak note:

The poem is spoken by a girl with an Electra complex. Her father died while she thought he was God. Her case is complicated by the fact that her father was also a Nazi and her mother very possibly part Jewish. In the daughter the two strains marry and paralyse each other—she has to act out the awful little allegory once over before she is free of it.⁴

3. A. Alvarez, "Sylvia Plath." Beyond All This Fiddle, Penguin, 1968, pp. 56–57.

4. From the introductory notes to "New Poems," a reading prepared for the BBC Third Programme but never broadcast [Alvarez's note]. Electra complex is the psychoanalytic term for a girl's sense of competition with her mother for her father's affection, coined by Carl Jung (1875–1961) and alluding to the eponymous heroine of Sophocles's tragedy Electra. In the play, Electra and her brother conspire to kill their mother to avenge their father's murder.

[. . .] What comes through most powerfully, I think, is the terrible unforgivingness of her verse, the continual sense not so much of violence—although there is a good deal of that—as of violent resentment that this should have been done to her. What she does in the poem is, with a weird detachment, to turn the violence against herself so as to show that she can equal her oppressors with her self-inflicted oppression. And this is the strategy of the concentration camps. When suffering is there whatever you do, by inflicting it upon yourself you achieve your identity, you set yourself free.

Yet the tone of the poem, like its psychological mechanisms, is not single or simple, and she uses a great deal of skill to keep it complex. Basically, her trick is to tell this horror story in a verse form as insistently jaunty and ritualistic as a nursery rhyme. And this helps her to maintain towards all the protagonists—her father, her husband and herself—a note of hard and sardonic anger, as though she were almost amused that her own suffering should be so extreme, so grotesque. [. . .] When she first read me the poem a few days after she wrote it, she called it a piece of “light verse.” It obviously isn’t, yet equally obviously it also isn’t the racking personal confession that a mere description or précis of it might make it sound.

Yet neither is it unchangingly vindictive or angry. The whole poem works on one single, returning note and rhyme, echoing from start to finish:

You do not do, you do not do . . .
 . . . I used to pray to recover you.
 Ach, du . . .

There is a kind of cooing tenderness in this which complicates the other, more savage note of resentment. It brings in an element of pity, less for herself and her own suffering than for the person who made her suffer. Despite everything, “Daddy” is a love poem.

IRVING HOWE

From The Plath Celebration: A Partial Dissent (1973)⁵

Sylvia Plath’s most famous poem, adored by many sons and daughters, is “Daddy.” It is a poem with an affecting theme, the feelings of the speaker as she regathers the pain of her father’s premature death and her persuasion that he has betrayed her by dying:

I was ten when they buried you.
 At twenty I tried to die
 And get back, back, back to you.

In the poem Sylvia Plath identifies the father (we recall his German birth) with the Nazis (“Panzer-man, panzer-man, O You”) and flares out with assaults

5. Irving Howe, “The Plath Celebration: A Partial Dissent.” 1973. The Critical Point of Literature and Culture, Horizon, 1977, pp. 231–33. All footnotes have been added by the editor.

for which nothing in the poem (nor, so far as we know, in Sylvia Plath's own life) offers any warrant: "A cleft in your chin instead of your foot / But no less a devil for that. . . ." Nor does anything in the poem offer warrant, other than the free-flowing hysteria of the speaker, for the assault of such lines as, "There's a stake in your fat black heart / And the villagers never liked you." [. . .]

What we have here is a revenge fantasy, feeding upon filial love-hatred, and thereby mostly of clinical interest. But seemingly aware that the merely clinical can't provide the materials for a satisfying poem, Sylvia Plath tries to enlarge upon the personal plight, give meaning to the personal outcry, by fancying the girl as victim of a Nazi father: "An engine, an engine / Chuffing me off like a Jew. . . ."

The more sophisticated admirers of this poem may say that I fail to see it as a dramatic presentation, a monologue spoken by a disturbed girl not necessarily to be identified with Sylvia Plath, despite the similarities of detail between the events of the poem and the events of her life. I cannot accept this view. The personal-confessional element, strident and undisciplined, is simply too obtrusive to suppose the poem no more than a dramatic picture of a certain style of disturbance. If, however, we did accept such a reading of "Daddy," we would fatally narrow its claims to emotional or moral significance, for we would be confining it to a mere vivid imagining of a pathological state. That, surely, is not how its admirers really take the poem.

It is clearly not how the critic George Steiner takes the poem when he calls it "the 'Guernica' of modern poetry."⁶ But then, in an astonishing turn, he asks: "In what sense does anyone, himself uninvolved and long after the event, commit a subtle larceny when he invokes the echoes and trappings of Auschwitz and appropriates an enormity of ready emotion to his own private design?" The question is devastating to his early comparison with "Guernica." Picasso's painting objectifies the horrors of Guernica, through the distancing of art; no one can suppose that he shares or participates in them. Plath's poem aggrandizes on the "enormity of ready emotion" invoked by references to the concentration camps, in behalf of an ill-controlled if occasionally brilliant outburst. There is something monstrous, utterly disproportionate, when tangled emotions about one's father are deliberately compared with the historical fate of the European Jews; something sad, if the comparison is made spontaneously. "Daddy" persuades once again, through the force of negative example, of how accurate T. S. Eliot was in saying, "The more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates."⁷

JUDITH KROLL

*From Rituals of Exorcism: "Daddy" (1976)*⁸

Poems explicitly about the protagonist's father, read in order of composition, show that the attitude toward him evolves from nostalgic mournfulness, regret, and guilt, to resentment and a bitter resolve to break his hold on her. [. . .]

The recital of the myth in "Daddy" ends in a ritual intended to cancel the earlier "sacred marriage" which has suffocated her:

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot
For thirty years, poor and white,
Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.⁹

In this image of passive and victimized domesticity, the speaker implicitly compares her past self to the "old woman who lived in a shoe" who "didn't know what to do"; now, however, she makes it clear that she does know what to do.

As a preamble to the exorcism, [. . .] Daddy must be cast in this new light, transformed from god to devil, if he is to be successfully expelled, but there must also be some real basis for it. To be effectively exposed, he must first appear as godly. But the speaker soon shows that she now attributes his godliness in part to his authoritarianism and personal inaccessibility—qualities which became intensified through his death, and which later became transferred to "a model of you"—her husband. [. . .] Loving a man literally or metaphorically dead [. . .] becomes a kind of persecution or punishment; and so, by the end of the incantation, Daddy deserves to be cast out. The "black telephone . . . off at the root," conveys the finality of the intended exorcism.

The "venomousness," ambiguous from the beginning, is not the whole story. "Daddy" is not primarily a poem of "father-hatred" or abuse as Robert Lowell, Elizabeth Hardwick, and others have contended. The need for exorcising her father's ghost lies, after all, in the extremity of her attachment to him. Alvarez very justly remarks that [. . .] "'Daddy' is a love poem."¹ [. . .] The love is not merely conveyed by the rhythm and sound of the poem, it is a necessary part of the poem's meaning, a part of the logic of its act.

The exorcism serves another purpose because through it she attempts to reject the pattern of being abandoned and made to suffer by a god, a man who is "chock-full of power": she creates "a model of you"—an image of her father—and marries this proxy. Then she kills both father and husband at once, magically

9. When Plath introduced "Daddy" as being about "a girl with an Electra complex" (with, in effect, the female version of an Oedipus complex), she gave a clue to what may be a play on words in the poem. "Oedipus" means "swell-foot," and therefore the speaker's identification of herself as a "foot" may be a private way of saying "I am Oedipus" and incorporating into the poem an allusion to the Electra complex.

1. Alvarez, "Sylvia Plath" [see p. 1110].

using each as the other's representative.² Each death entails that of the other: the stake in her father's heart also kills the "vampire who said he was you"; and the killing of her marriage (for which she now claims to take responsibility, as she does for having allowed her marriage to perpetuate, by proxy, her relationship to her father) finally permits Daddy to "lie back." The marriage to and killing of her father by proxy are acts of what Frazer³ calls "sympathetic magic," in which "things act on each other at a distance through a secret sympathy." [. . .]

Plath was familiar with and used such ideas. [. . .] The notion that "as the image suffers, so does the man"—affecting the real subject through a proxy—nicely describes marriage to a model of Daddy, and explains why "If I've killed one man, I've killed two." The earlier attempt of the speaker in "Daddy" to recover her father also involved sympathetic magic; she had tried to rejoin him by dying and becoming like him:

At twenty I tried to die
And get back, back, back to you.

She finally exorcises her father as if he were a scapegoat invested with the evils of her spoiled history. Frazer's discussion of rituals in which the dying god is also a scapegoat is germane here. He conjectures that two originally separate rituals merged. [. . . T]he father in "Daddy" may well be described as such a divine scapegoat figure.

5. In Greek mythology, Thanatos is a personification of death.

6. According to psychologist Carl Jung (1875–1961), a reservoir of memories and images shared by all, but inaccessible to the conscious mind.

Early in the poem, the ritual gets off on the wrong foot both literally and figuratively. A sudden rhythmic break midway through the first stanza interrupts the insistent and mesmeric chant of the poet's own freedom:

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot
For thirty years, poor and white,
Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.

The break suggests, on the one hand, that the nursery-rhyme world of contained terror is here abandoned; on the other, that the poet-exorcist's mesmeric control is superficial, founded in a shaky faith and an unsure heart—the worst possible state for the strong, disciplined exorcist.

At first she kills her father succinctly with her own words, demythologizing him to a ludicrous piece of statuary that is hardly a Poseidon or the Colossus of Rhodes.⁷ [. . .]

Then as she tries to patch together the narrative of him, his tribal myth (the “common” town, the “German tongue,” the war-scraped culture), she begins to lose her own powers of description to a senseless Germanic prattle (“The tongue stuck in my jaw. / It stuck in a barb wire snare. / Ich, ich, ich, ich”). The individual man is absorbed by his inhuman archetype, the “panzer man,” “an engine / Chuffing me off like a Jew.” Losing the exorcist's power that binds the spirit and then casts out the demon, she is the classic helpless victim of the swastika man. As she calls up her own picture of him as a devil, he refuses to adopt this stereotype. Instead he jumbles his trademark:

A cleft in your chin instead of your foot
But no less a devil for that, no not Any less the black man who
Bit my pretty red heart in two.

The overt Nazi-Jew allegory throughout the poem suggests that, by a simple inversion of power, father and daughter grow more alike. But when she tries to imitate his action of dying, making all the appropriate grand gestures, she once again fails: “but they pulled me out of the sack, / And they stuck me together with glue.” She retreats to a safe world of icons and replicas, but even the doll image she constructs turns out to be “the vampire who said he was you.” At last, she abandons her father to the collective unconscious where it is he who is finally recognized (“they always knew it was you”). She is lost, impersonally absorbed by his irate persecutors, bereft of both her power and her conjuror's discipline, and possessed by the incensed villagers. The exorcist's ritual, one of purifying, cleansing, commanding silence and then ordering the evil spirit's departure, has dwindled to a comic picture from the heart of darkness. Mad villagers stamp on the devil-vampire creation. [. . .]

[. . .] It would seem that the real victim is the poet-performer who, despite her straining toward identification with the public events of holocaust and

7. One of the seven wonders of the ancient world, a gigantic statue of the Greek sun god, Helios. Poseidon: the chief sea god in the Greek pantheon.

destruction of World War II, becomes more murderously persecuting than the "panzer-man" who smothered her, and who abandoned her with a paradoxical love, guilt, and fear. [. . .]

The failure of the exorcism and the emotional ambivalence are echoed in the curious rhythm. The incantatory safety of the nursery-rhyme thump (seemingly one of controlled, familiar terrors) also suggests some sinister brooding by its repetition. The poem opens with a suspiciously emphatic protest, a kind of psychological whistling-in-the-dark. As it proceeds, "Daddy"'s continuous life-rhythms—the assonance, consonance, and especially the sustained oo sounds—triumph over either the personal or the cultural-historical imagery. The sheer sense of organic life in the interwoven sounds carries the verse forward in boisterous spirit and communicates an underlying feeling of comedy that is also echoed in the repeated failure of the speaker to perform her exorcism.

Ultimately, "Daddy" is like an emotional, psychological, and historical autopsy, a final report. There is no real progress. The poet is in the same place in the beginning as in the end. [. . .] Although it seems that the speaker has moved from identification with the persecuted to identity as persecutor, Jew to vampire-killer, powerless to powerful, she has simply enacted a performance that allows her to live with what is unchangeable. She has used her art to stave off suffocation, and performs her self-contempt with a degree of bravado.⁸

MARGARET HOMANS

From A Feminine Tradition (1982)⁹

The current belief in a literal "I" present in poetry is responsible for the popular superstition that Sylvia Plath's death was the purposeful completion of her poetry's project, the assumption being that if the speaker is precisely the same as the biographical Plath, the poetry's self-destructive violence is directed toward Plath herself, not toward an imagined speaker. This reading of Plath is unfair to the woman and, by calling it merely unmediated self-expression, obscures her poetry's real power. In poem after poem depicting or wishing for physical violence, the imagery of violence is part of a symmetrical figurative system, and death is figured as a way of achieving rebirth or some other transcendence.¹ Plath's project may not thus be very different from that of [Emily] Dickinson, who speaks quite often from beyond the grave, reimagining and repossessing death as her own in order to dispel the terrors of literal death. However, within that figurative system the poet embraces a self-destructive program that must soon have been poetically terminal, even if it did not bring about the actual death.

Several of Plath's late poems come to terms with a father figure (who may include the poetic fathers she acknowledges in The Colossus), whose crime, no different from that identified by nineteenth-century women, is of attempting to transform the feminine self into objects.

"Daddy" uses Nazi imagery to make the same accusation about objectification brought against men as oppressors in "Lady Lazarus" and makes the corollary accusation against the father (and the husband modelled after him) that objectification has silenced her: "I never could talk to you. / . . . I could hardly speak." In this context defiance and retribution take the form of her speaking, but again this counterattack is counterproductive. Punning on the expression "being through" to mean both establishing a telephone connection and being finished, she at once makes and conclusively severs communication:

So daddy, I'm finally through.
The black telephone's off at the root,
The voices just can't worm through.

The poem concludes, "Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I'm through." Suppressing the power of the one who silenced her, she simultaneously returns herself to the silence that the poem came into being to protest.

PAMELA J. ANNAS

From A Disturbance in Mirrors: The Poetry of Sylvia Plath (1988)²

The particular sexual metaphor in "Daddy" is sado-masochism, which stands for the authority structure of a patriarchal and war-making society. [. . .] "Daddy" is an analysis of the structure of the society in which the individual is enmeshed. Intertwined with the image of sadist and masochist in "Daddy" is a parallel image of vampire and victim. In "Daddy," father, husband, and a larger patriarchal and competitive authority structure, which the speaker of the poem sees as having been responsible for the various imperialisms of the twentieth century, all melt together and become demonic, finally a gigantic vampire figure. In the modulation from one image to another to form an accumulated image that is characteristic of many of Plath's late poems, the male figure at the center of "Daddy" takes four major forms: the statue, the Gestapo officer, the professor, and the vampire. The poem begins, however, with an image of a black shoe, an image which, like the black shoe in "The Munich Mannequins" and like the black suit in "The Applicant," can be seen to stand for corporate man. The second stanza of the poem refers back to the title poem of The Colossus, where the speaker's father, representative of a gigantic male other, so dominated her world that her horizon was bounded by his scattered pieces. [. . .] Here the image of her father, grown larger than the earlier Colossus of Rhodes, stretches across and subsumes the whole of the United States, from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean.

The next seven stanzas of "Daddy" construct the image of the Gestapo officer, using her family background—her parents were both of German origin—to mediate between her personal sense of suffocation and the social history of the Nazi invasions. The black shoe of the first stanza in which she says she has been wedged like a foot "barely daring to breathe" becomes in stanza ten, at the end of the Nazi section, a larger social image of suffocation: "Not God but a swastika / So black no sky could squeak through." The Gestapo figure recurs briefly three stanzas later as the speaker of the poem transfers the image from father to husband and incidentally suggests that the victim has some control in a brutalized association—at least to the extent she chooses to be there.³ "I made a model of you, . . . And I said I do, I do." The Gestapo figure becomes "Herr Professor" in stanza eleven, an actual image of Plath's father, and also an image of what has for centuries been seen as the prototypical and even ideal relationship between a man and a woman.⁴ The professor, who is a man, talks and is active; the woman, who is a student, listens and is passive. [. . .] But Plath places this image between the images of Nazi/Jew and vampire/victim so that it becomes the center of a series. Indeed, the image of daddy as teacher turns almost immediately into a devil/demon/vampire. [. . .]

The last two stanzas of "Daddy" are like the conclusion of "Lady Lazarus" in their assertion that the speaker of the poem is breaking out of the cycle and that, in order to do so, she must turn on and kill Herr God, Herr Lucifer in the one poem, and Daddy in his final metamorphosis as vampire in the other poem [. . .].

The cycle of victim/vampire is, left alone, a closed and repetitious cycle, like the repeated suicides of "Lady Lazarus." According to the legends and the Hollywood film versions of these legends we all grew up on, once consumed by a vampire, one dies and is reborn a vampire and preys upon others, who in their turn die and become vampires. The vampire imagery in Sylvia Plath's poetry intersects on one level with her World War II imagery and its exploitation and victimization and on another level intersects with her images of a bureaucratic, fragmented, and dead—in the sense of numbed and unaware—society. The connections are sometimes confused, but certainly World War II is often imaged in her poetry as a kind of grisly, vampiric feast. [. . .]

The whole of "Daddy" is an exorcism to banish the demon, put a stake through the vampire's heart, and thus break the cycle of vampire → victim. It is crucial to the poem that the exorcism is accomplished through communal action by the “villagers.” The rhythm of the poem is powerfully and deliberately primitive: a child’s chant, a formal curse. The hard sounds, short lines, and repeated rhymes of “do,” “you,” “Jew,” and “through” give a hard pounding quality to the poem that is close to the sound of a heart beat. [. . .]

Judith Lewis Herman, in Father-Daughter Incest (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981), discusses the history of the suppression of incest beginning with Freud and continuing into contemporary psychological literature, the attribution of reports of incest to hysterical female oedipal fantasizing or, when the fact of incest is impossible to deny, assigning blame to the victim: what Herman calls the Seductive Daughter and/or the Collusive Mother (Chapter 1, "A Common Occurrence"). Writing in the early 1960s and familiar with some of these attitudes, [. . .] Plath assigns some culpability to the victim.

Purity, which is what exorcism aims at, is for Plath an ambiguous concept. On the one hand it means integrity of self, wholeness rather than fragmentation, an unspoiled state of being, rest, perfection, aesthetic beauty, and loss of self through transformation into some reborn other. On the other hand, it also means absence, isolation, blindness, a kind of autism which shuts out the world, stasis and death, and a loss of self through dispersal into some other. In “Lady Lazarus” and “Fever 103°” the emphasis is on exorcising the poet’s previous selves, though within a social context that makes that unlikely. “Daddy,” however, is a purification of the world; in “Daddy” it is the various avatars of the other—the male figure who represents the patriarchal society she lives in—that are being exorcised. [. . .] The more the speaker of the poems defines her situation as desperate, the more violent and vengeful becomes the agent of purification and transformation.

STEVEN GOULD AXELROD

From Sylvia Plath: The Wound and the Cure of Words (1990)⁵

Although this poem too [“Daddy”] has traditionally been read as “personal” (Aird 78) or “confessional” (M. L. Rosenthal 82), Margaret Homans has more recently suggested that it concerns a woman’s dislocated relations to speech (Women Writers 220–21). Plath herself introduced it on the BBC as the opposite of confession, as a constructed fiction: “Here is a poem spoken by a girl with an Electra complex. [. . .]” (CP 293).⁶ [. . .] However we interpret Plath’s preface, we must agree that “Daddy” is dramatic and allegorical, since its details depart freely from the facts of her biography. In this poem she [. . .] figures her unresolved conflicts with paternal authority as a textual issue. Significantly, her father was a published writer, and his successor, her husband, was also a writer. Her preface asserts that the poem concerns a young woman’s paralyzing self-division, which she can defeat only through allegorical representation. Recalling that paralysis was one of Plath’s main tropes for literary incapacity, we begin to see that the poem evokes the female poet’s anxiety of authorship and specifically Plath’s strategy of delivering herself from that anxiety by making it the topic of her discourse. Viewed from this perspective, “Daddy” enacts the woman poet’s struggle with “daddy-poetry.” It represents her effort to reject the “buried male muse” from her invention process and the “jealous gods” from her audience (J 223; CP 179).⁷

Plath wrote "Daddy" several months after Hughes left her, on the day she learned that he had agreed to a divorce (October 12, 1962). George Brown and Tirril Harris have shown that early loss makes one especially vulnerable to subsequent loss (Bowlby 250–59), and Plath seems to have defended against depression by almost literally throwing herself into her poetry. She followed "Daddy" with a host of poems that she considered her greatest achievement to date: "Medusa," "The Jailer," "Lady Lazarus," "Ariel," the bee sequence, and others. The letters she wrote to her mother and brother on the day of "Daddy," and then again four days later, brim with a sense of artistic self-discovery: "Writing like mad. . . . Terrific stuff, as if domesticity had choked me" (LH 466).⁸ Composing at the "still blue, almost eternal hour before the baby's cry, before the glassy music of the milkman, setting his bottles" (quoted in Alvarez, Savage God 21), she experienced an "enormous" surge in creative energy (LH 467). [. . . S]he wrote "Daddy" to demonstrate the existence of her voice, which had been silent or subservient for so long. She wrote it to prove her "genius" (LH 468).

Plath projected her struggle for textual identity onto the figure of a partly Jewish young woman who learns to express her anger at the patriarch and at his language of male mastery, which is as foreign to her as German, as "obscene" as murder (st. 6),⁹ and as meaningless as "gobbledygoo" (st. 9). [. . .] At a basic level, "Daddy" concerns its own violent, transgressive birth as a text, its origin in a culture that regards it as illegitimate—a judgment the speaker hurls back on the patriarch himself when she labels him a bastard (st. 16). Plath's unaccommodating worldview, which was validated by much in her childhood and adult experience, led her to understand literary tradition not as an expanding universe of beneficial influence [. . .] but as a closed universe in which every addition required a corresponding subtraction [. . .]. If Plath's speaker was to be born as a poet, a patriarch must die.

As in "The Colossus," the father here appears as a force or an object rather than as a person. Initially he takes the form of an immense "black shoe," capable of stamping on his victim (st. 1). Immediately thereafter he becomes a marble "statue" (st. 2) [. . .]. He then transforms into Nazi Germany (st. 6–7, 9–10), the archetypal totalitarian state. [. . .] Eventually the father declines in stature from God (st. 2) to a devil (st. 11) to a dying vampire (st. 15). Perhaps he shrinks under the force of his victim's denunciation, which de-creates him as a power as it creates him as a figure. But whatever his size, he never assumes human dimensions, aspirations, and relations—except when posing as a teacher in a photograph (st. 11). Like the colossus, he remains figurative and symbolic, not individual.

[. . . Unlike the father figure in "The Colossus,"] "Daddy" remains silent, apart from the gobbledygoo attributed to him once (st. 9). He uses his mouth primarily for biting and for drinking blood. The poem emphasizes his feet and, implicitly, his phallus. He is a "black shoe" (st. 1), a statue with "one gray toe" (st. 2), a "boot" (st. 10). [. . . The speaker] is herself silenced by his shoe: "I never could talk to you" (st. 5). Daddy is [. . .] a male censor. His boot in the face of "every woman" is presumably lodged in her mouth (st. 10). He stands for all the elements in the literary situation and in the female ephebe's¹ internalization of it, that prevent her from producing any words at all, even copied or subservient ones. Appropriately, Daddy can be killed only by being stamped on: he lives and dies by force, not language. If "The Colossus" tells a tale of the patriarch's speech, [. . .] "Daddy" tells a tale of the daughter's effort to speak.

Thus we are led to another important difference between the two poems. The "I" of "The Colossus" acquires her identity only through serving her "father," whereas the "I" of "Daddy" actuates her gift only through opposition to him. The later poem precisely inscribes the plot of Plath's dream novel of 1958: "a girl's search for the dead father—for an outside authority which must be developed, instead, from the inside" (J 258). As the child of a Nazi, the girl could "hardly speak" (st. 6), but as a Jew she begins "to talk" and to acquire an identity (st. 7). In Plath's allegory, the outsider Jew corresponds to "the rebel, the artist, the odd" (JP 55),² and particularly to the woman artist. Otto Rank's Beyond Psychology, which had a lasting influence on her, explicitly compares women to Jews, since "woman . . . has suffered from the very beginning a fate similar to that of the Jew, namely, suppression, slavery, confinement, and subsequent persecution" (287–88). Rank, whose discourse I would consider tainted by anti-Semitism, argues that Jews speak a language [. . .] that differs essentially from the language of the majority cultures in which they find themselves (191, 281–84). He analogously [. . .] argues that woman speaks in a language different from man's, and that as a result of man's denial of woman's world, "woman's 'native tongue' has hitherto been unknown or at least unheard" (248). [. . . H]is idea of linguistic difference based on gender and his analogy between Jewish and female speech seem to have embedded themselves in the substructure of "Daddy" (and in many of Plath's other texts as well). For Plath, as later for Adrienne Rich, the Holocaust and the patriarchy's silencing of women were linked outcomes of the masculinist interpretation of the world. Political insurrection and female self-assertion also interlaced symbolically. In "Daddy," Plath's speaker finds her voice and motive by identifying herself as antithetical to her Fascist father. [. . .] Previously devoted to the patriarch—both in "The Colossus" and in memories evoked in "Daddy" of trying to "get back" to him (st. 12)—she now seeks only to escape from him and to see him destroyed.

Plath has unleashed the anger, normal in mourning as well as in revolt, that she suppressed in the earlier poem. But she has done so at a cost. Let us consider her childlike speaking voice. The language of "Daddy," beginning with its title, is often regressive. The "I" articulates herself by moving backwards in time, using the language of nursery rhymes and fairy tales (the little old woman who lived in a shoe, the black man of the forest). Such language accords with a child's conception of the world, not an adult's. Plath's assault on the language of "daddy-poetry" has turned inward, on the language of her own poem, which teeters precariously on the edge of a preverbal abyss—represented by the eerie, keening "oo" sound with which a majority of the verses end. And then let us consider the play on "through" at the poem's conclusion. Although that last line allows for multiple readings, one interpretation is that the "I" has unconsciously carried out her father's wish: her discourse, by transforming itself into cathartic oversimplifications, has undone itself.

Yet the poem does contain its verbal violence by means more productive than silence. In a letter to her brother, Plath referred to "Daddy" as "gruesome" (LH 472), while on almost the same day she described it to A. Alvarez as a piece of "light verse" (Alvarez, Beyond 56). She later read it on the BBC in a highly ironic tone of voice. The poem's unique spell derives from its rhetorical complexity: its variegated and perhaps bizarre fusion of the horrendous and the comic. As [Margaret] Uroff has remarked, it both shares and remains detached from the fixation of its protagonist (159). [. . .] Plath's speaker uses potentially self-mocking melodramatic terms to describe both her opponent ("so black no sky could squeak through" [st. 10]) and herself ("poor and white" [st. 1]). While this aboriginal speaker quite literally expresses black-and-white thinking, her civilized double possesses a sensibility sophisticated enough to subject such thinking to irony. Thus the poem expresses feelings that it simultaneously parodies—it may be parodying the very idea of feeling. The tension between erudition and simplicity in the speaker's voice appears in her pairings that juxtapose adult with childlike diction: "breathe or Achoo," "your Luftwaffe, your gobbledygoo" (st. 1, 9). She can expound on such adult topics as Taroc packs, Viennese beer, and Tyrolean snowfall; can specify death camps by name; and can employ an adult vocabulary of "recover," "ancestress," "Aryan," "Meinkampf," "obscene," and "bastard." Yet she also has recourse to a more primitive lexicon that includes "chuffing," "your black heart," and "my pretty red heart." She proves herself capable of careful intellectual discriminations ("so I never could tell" [st. 5]), conventionalized description ("beautiful Nauset" [st. 3]), and moral analogy ("if I've killed one man, I've killed two" [st. 15]), while also exhibiting regressive fantasies (vampires), repetitions ("wars, wars, wars" [st. 4]), and inarticulateness ("panzer-man, panzer-man, O You—" [st. 9]). She oscillates between calm reflection ("You stand at the blackboard, daddy, / In the picture I have of you" [st. 11]) and mad incoherence ("Ich, ich, ich, ich" [st. 6]). Her sophisticated language puts her wild language in an ironic perspective, removing the discourse from the control of the archaic self who understands experience only in extreme terms.

The ironies in "Daddy" proliferate in unexpected ways, however. When the speaker proclaims categorically that "every woman adores a Fascist" (st. 10), she is subjecting her victimization to irony by suggesting that sufferers choose, or at least accommodate themselves to, their suffering. But she is also subjecting her authority to irony, since her claim about "every woman" is transparently false. It simply parodies patriarchal commonplaces, such as those advanced by Helene Deutsch concerning "feminine masochism" (192–99, 245–85). [. . .] Plath's mother wished that Plath would write about "decent, courageous people" (LH 477), and she herself heard an inner voice demanding that she be a perfect "paragon" in her language and feeling (J 176). But in the speaker of "Daddy," she inscribed the opposite of such a paragon: a divided self whose veneer of civilization is breached and infected by unhealthy instincts.

Plath's irony cuts both ways. At the same time that the speaker's sophisticated voice undercuts her childish voice, reducing its melodrama to comedy, the childish or maddened voice undercuts the pretensions of the sophisticated voice, revealing the extremity of suffering masked by its ironies. While demonstrating the inadequacy of thinking and feeling in opposites, the poem implies that such a mode can locate truths denied more complex cognitive and affective systems. The very moderation of the normal adult intelligence, its tolerance of ambiguity, its defenses against the primal energies of the id, results in falsification. Reflecting Schiller's³ idea that the creative artist experiences a "momentary and passing madness" (quoted by Freud in a passage of The Interpretation of Dreams [193] that Plath underscored), "Daddy" gives voice to that madness. Yet the poem's sophisticated awareness, its comic vision, probably wins out in the end, since the poem concludes by curtailing the power of its extreme discourse [. . .]. Furthermore, Plath distanced herself from the poem's aboriginal voice by introducing her text as "a poem spoken by a girl with an Electra complex"—that is, as a study of the girl's pathology rather than her father's—and as an allegory that will "free" her from that pathology. She also distanced herself by reading the poem in a tone that emphasized its irony. And finally, she distanced herself by laying the poem's wild voice permanently to rest after October. The aboriginal vision was indeed purged. "Daddy" represents not Dickinson's madness that is divinest sense,⁴ but rather an entry into a style of discourse and a mastery of it. [. . .]

Plath's poetic revolt in "Daddy" liberated her pent-up creativity, but the momentary success sustained her little more than self-sacrifice had done. "Daddy" became another stage in her development, an unrepeatable experiment, a vocal opening that closed itself at once. The poem is not an elegy for the power of "daddy-poetry" but for the powers of speech Plath discovered in composing it.

When we consider "Daddy" generically, a further range of implications presents itself. Although we could profitably consider the poem as the dramatic monologue Plath called it in her BBC broadcast, let us regard it instead as the kind of poem most readers have taken it to be: a domestic poem. [. . .] I shall define the domestic poem as one that represents and comments on a protagonist's relationship to one or more family members, usually a parent, child, or spouse. To focus our discussion even further, I shall emphasize poetry that specifically concerns a father.

In the 1950s the "domestic poem" proper appeared on the scene, with its own conventions and expectations, and with its own complex cultural and literary reasons for being. Perhaps [. . .] its precise timing depended on a reaction against modernism's aesthetic of impersonality.⁵ Theodore Roethke wrote several early poems that initiated the genre: "My Papa's Waltz" (1948), "The Lost Son" (1948), and "Where Knock Is Open Wide" (1951). [Robert] Lowell's "Life Studies" sequence (1959) was, and is, the genre's most prominent landmark. [. . .] In all these poems, the parent-child relationship serves as a locus for psychological investigation. In many of them it also serves as a means of representing the acquisition of poetic identity and of exploring the bounds of textuality itself. [. . .] The

4. One Emily Dickinson poem begins, "Much Madness is divinest Sense— / To a discerning Eye— / Much Sense—the starkest Madness."

5. In "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), modernist poet T. S. Eliot articulates an "impersonal theory of poetry," arguing, "the more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates."

"domestic poem" became a system of signs in which each individual text's adherence to the system and deviations within the system produced its particular literary meaning.

During Plath's trying time of 1958–59 [. . .] she struggled [. . .] to "break into a new line of poetry" (J 321). As always, her method was to "read others and think hard" (J 302). The two male poets she read most intently, the two who most instructed her, were Roethke and Lowell.

In 1959 [when she attended Lowell's Boston University poetry courses] Plath did not consciously attempt to write in the domestic poem genre, perhaps because she was not yet ready to assume her majority. [. . .] But by fall 1962, when she had already lost so much, she was ready to chance tackling poetic tradition, and specifically her chief male instructors, Roethke and Lowell. In "Daddy" she achieved her victory in two ways. First, as we have seen, she symbolically assaults a father figure who is identified with male control of language. All her anxiety of influence comes to the fore in the poem: her sense of belatedness, her awareness of constraint, her fears of inadequacy, her furious need to overcome her dependency, her guilt at her own aggressivity. Since the precursors "do not do / Any more" (st. 1), she wishes to escape their paralyzing influence and to empty the "bag full of God" that has kept her tongue stuck in her jaw for so long (st. 2, 5). The father whose power she attacks is not simply Roethke or Lowell, or even Hughes or Otto Plath, but a literary character who includes reference to all of them as categories of masculine authority. [. . .]

In addition to killing the father in its fictional plot, the poem seeks to discredit the forefathers through its status as poetic act. Taking a genre established by Roethke and Lowell, "Daddy" fundamentally alters it through antithesis and parody. Like all strong poems, it transforms its genre and therefore the way we perceive the precursive examples [. . .]. Her poem attempts to conclude the genre, to represent the final possible stroke, or at the very least to inaugurate some new and important genre, of which the whole domestic genre was but a foreshadowing.

"Daddy" swerves sharply from its precursors, curtailing their power. It turns the psychological depth of Roethke's poem and the ironically detached surface of Lowell's poem into a fury of denunciation, an extravagance of emotion, an exaggeration of acts and effects, perhaps revealing the subtexts of both precursors. [. . .] It unmasks Roethke's implicitly oppressive father figure as a monster and Lowell's sophisticated comedy as slapstick. It transforms the domestic genre alternately into a horror show, encapsulating every political, cultural, and familial atrocity of the age, and a theater of cruelty, evoking nervous laughter. "Daddy" takes the genre as far as it can go—and then further.

From The Poetics of Torture: The Spectacle of Sylvia Plath's Poetry* (2004)⁶

Plath's poetry reacts against the absence, especially for women, of a public space, indeed a language for debate, wherein one might make visible and deconstruct the given order of things. In the following, I argue that Plath deliberately blurs the borders between the public and the private in two of the most celebrated, controversial, and critiqued of her poems: "Daddy" and "Lady Lazarus." Transforming the conventional female body of the 1950s into a kind of transgressive dialect, Plath makes her personae speak in and to a public realm dominated by male desires. [. . .] In order to bring their private selves into the public realm, the speakers in "Daddy" and "Lady Lazarus" become public performers and rebellious exaggerators [. . .]. They [. . .] may have trouble communicating (as we will see most obviously in "Daddy"), but this serves to reveal their public voicelessness. Plath's speakers should not be read as pathological case studies; rather it is the culture, written on their bodies, which is expressed as pathological. Likewise, their acts of rebellion almost necessarily contain an unacceptable, self-destructive side. In various ways, Plath brashly pairs the private with the public, to the point where the personal all but dissolves into a ludicrous public performance or event, with the body as displayed object.

This desire in Plath's poetry to trace the connection between the private and the public has not been explored in any depth in Plath criticism.⁷ Instead, most criticism reads "Daddy" and "Lady Lazarus" around the psychology of Plath's life, if not exclusively as biography, then as the feminist struggles of a victorious woman over a man or men. For example, critics regard the irrepressible "Lady Lazarus" as "a triumph of vitality" (Broe 175); [. . .] a wonderful, "searingly self-confident" (Van Dyne 55) exhibition of the speaker's "true identity as a triumphant resurrecting goddess, the fully liberated, fiery true self . . ." (Kroll 118–9) [. . .]. Plath's poetry [. . .] does not so much demonstrate the crushing of the authentic or "real" self by the patriarchal, as show the role of (social) fantasy in the construction of the subject. More than an attack on the male (or in particular her husband or father), her poetry confronts the mentality of the status quo that accepts the ideology of the individual and notions of the natural, or even the personal, self. She unveils and critiques the private, the hidden, and the normalized by parodying various public discourses of power (gendered male), while portraying her personae as objects of those discourses and, thereby, both the agents and the spectacles of punishment.

By radically redefining herself in terms of historically grounded, collective worlds, Plath (whether justified or not) successfully displaces the solitary, private individual. When identifying herself with the concentration camp Jew, she compares herself to a community, just as she identifies her father and husband, who play the tormenting Nazis, as part of an historical political organization. In all of this, Plath suggests that her own contemporary experience—everyday conceptions of femininity, individualism, and the privacy of the family—conforms to collective patterns. She fights the disappearance of the public, its retreat to the privacy of the home, and "seriality" in general.⁸ One cannot see the whole from these little pockets of private perception. Stressing, then, the collective

7. Plath criticism still contains her within the private framework of the individual: looking at her as a confessional poet, reading her poetry as biography or psychological case study. Recent criticism has explored the exceptional fascination readers have with her life. Elisabeth Bronfen, for one, believes that Plath's "life and her poetry are so inextricably implicated that we can do nothing but read her poetry within the biographical appraisal that has reworked her life for us" (7). Some critics (including Bronfen) despair over this reductive approach to reading Plath's poetry. Bruce Bawer concludes that "the real interest lies not in Plath's art but in her life" (19). See Jacqueline Rose, Al Strangeways, and Linda Wagner-Martin for a few book-length discussions on the subject.

8. "Seriality," a term Sartre develops in Critique of Dialectical Reason, describes a mode of social interaction in which members of a group cannot see their profound connection to one another. Sartre gives the example of a grouping of people waiting for a bus at a bus stop: "[W]e are concerned here with a plurality of isolations: these people do not care about or speak to each other and, in general, they do not look at one another; they exist side by side alongside a bus stop" (256). The individual "constitutes himself in the gathering as an objective element of a series" (266).

engineering of so-called “private experience,” Plath charts a metaphorical map, linking invisible worlds to the cultural processes that inform them.

“Daddy,” notoriously, re-stages secret family conflicts between parents and children, husbands and wives. It lifts a veil covering shameful social relations. And just as significantly, Plath “talks back.” The opening lines [1–5] vividly picture a claustrophobic domestic space [. . .]. This (cultural) space allows for little movement or even speech—she can’t “breathe or Achoo.” For Plath, the domestic realm stands out in the open, but unnoticed, hidden, or—as the poem suggests—underfoot. Plath wants to dismantle the interiority of the “shoe”-house, revealing its contents. As the progression of “Daddy” underscores, her new theatre is external, a decidedly worldly place, full of worldly struggles and a worldly language: “Atlantic” (11), “Polish town[s]” (16), “wars” (18), “Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen” (33), “[t]he snows of the Tyrol, the clear beer of Vienna” (36), “swastika[s]” (46), “Fascist[s]” (48), and so forth.

In “Daddy,” private “family matters” link up with large historical struggles, social organizations, and linguistic systems. Moving from the private, “shoe”-world to the just as stifling political world, consciousness can grasp the machinery that produces and oppresses it. The German language acts like a repressive mechanical power, bearing down on the collective body:

And the language obscene

An engine, an engine
Chuffing me off like a Jew.
A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.
I began to talk like a Jew.
I think I may well be a Jew. (30–5)

In general, Plath suggests the power of language (“an engine”) to subject the self. But more specifically, she implies that certain styles of discourse violate body and soul more than others. She emphasizes the word “obscene” by placing it at the end of the stanza. To her, German is “the language obscene,” but the word “obscene,” falling where it does, also introduces her own words: as if to suggest her situation and her metaphors are indecent. Through such audacious, dramatic comparisons, Plath pictures human relationships as violent and grotesque spectacles, giving individual, private relationships public currency. At the same time, by having to force the domestic into the public arena, she highlights how these relationships normally remain serialized and closed off from social life.

Within this world of conflict, Plath, as I suggested earlier, “talks back,” fantasizing possible alternatives to the pact of silence common among families. She occupies the position of speechlessness, but she struggles to respond:

I never could talk to you.
The tongue stuck in my jaw.

It stuck in a barb wire snare.
Ich, ich, ich, ich,
I could hardly speak. (24–8)

Even though she may stutter—a shameful defect?—the persona does not hide her deficiency but gives voice to her fear and anger. Her fixed “ich” may also be seen to mirror the stuttering repetition of the oppressor’s language (“An engine, an engine"), which "chuffs" out the same sound over and over again, revealing itself as a homogenizing, mechanical force. She responds in kind, with her similarly aggressive "obscene" language: She speaks crudely, and in a most unlady-like way, of her "Polack friend" (20) and says to her father, "Daddy, daddy, you bastard" (80). By speaking not only "the language obscene" but also the actual German language ("Ich, ich, ich, ich"), the persona demonstrates that, even as she attempts to escape her oppressor's (male) language, it makes heavy claims on her. It may even suggest her complicity.⁹ Her underlying desire to be desired by her father ("[e]very woman adores a fascist" [48]) has caused her, at times, to play along with the terms of his game, living within the rigid configurations of his language. "Daddy" embodies tremendous socio-psychological tension: for Plath utilizes a language of mastery¹ (clarity, directness, multiple worldly allusions) that she simultaneously subverts with her startling array of marginal voices (with nursery rhymes, baby talk, speech defects, "hysteria"). [. . .] Plath dramatizes both her imprisonment in the oppressor's script—doing the important work of laying out dominant discursive codes—and the important points of resistance, on the margins.

Within these boundaries, her persona fantasizes herself as powerful, overpowering her tormentors, as when she imagines killing them ("If I've killed one man, I've killed two—" [71]), even driving a stake into her father's heart. Significantly, in the final act, she desires a collective judgment of this drama:

And the villagers never liked you.
They are dancing and stamping on you.
They always knew it was you. (77–9)

She does not want to be alone in her condemnation of the Other. For Plath, this collective problem deserves a collective response, and she aims to give it one.

It should be noted, especially in the case of Plath, whose biography attracts so much attention, how she moves from the literary universe to the "real world." Jacqueline Rose tells how an "old friend wrote Plath's mother on publication of the poem in the review of Ariel in Time in 1966 to insist that Plath's father had been nothing like the image in the poem" (229). As this quotation demonstrates, Plath's poems, intentionally or not, perform a sort of "talk back" or "back talk," a rudely public, counter-discourse that rejects the family code of silence. By making feelings and ideas public, Plath risks a great deal. She risks banishment by her family and by a public anxious to preserve the status quo of middle-class family life.

In "Daddy," Plath reframes the private in terms of a public discourse, framing personal, family conflicts within larger cultural processes (language, homogenization, technology, politics). Making abstract processes concrete, she gives human faces to collective activities, forcing them into a dramatic, conflictual dialogue. In

9. Various critics have made similar observations. Janice Markey, for one, writes, "Plath makes it clear in this poem that the exploitation of women in a patriarchal society is in part due to women's compliance in the sado-masochism involved" (16). In The Psychic Life of Power, Judith Butler offers a psychological justification for the woman's willingness and desire to be oppressed, arguing that we all discover sexual pleasure within the power structures that dominate us.

1. According to Alice Suskin Ostriker, "[c]ontrol, impersonality, and dispassionateness are supposedly normative, masculine virtues" (88–9) and what characterizes "the oppressor's language" (168), along with Plath's poetic style here.

much of her late poetry, Plath repeatedly imagines a fragile self (very often feminized), subject to inhuman, and specifically modern, processes of rationalization (i.e., where the self is “paved over” by logic, statistics, uniformity, etc., processes that are most often viewed, by her, as patriarchal). [. . . F]or Plath, rationalized worlds eliminate any form of public stage. [. . .] Against this absence of public forum, Plath [. . .] exposes and challenges the deep rift between non-public and public types of discourse, between individual and collective experiences and responses.

[Plath's] personae expose both the contemporary social organization and themselves as constructed, rather than simply given or natural. Their identities, therefore, have the potential to be countered and reconfigured. The shape and meaning of human being is open for debate and change. [. . .] Both “Lady Lazarus” and “Daddy” work out where power can be located, as well as pointing out how this society has become a “serial” one, within which the self cannot gain a view of the whole. Plath stands outside, views, and addresses the very community she silently, passively inhabited. The poems confront the community by staging dramas of punishment. These spectacles of torture, although educational, are simultaneously self-destructive, as the speakers in both poems desire their own deaths. And yet, through these self-flagellating, suicidal personae, we may see diverse aspects of constructed female identity.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. In his essay DYING IS AN ART, George Steiner argues that Plath's poems "are too honest, they have cost too much, to be yielded to myth." Do you think that DADDY is an "honest" poem? Write an essay exploring what "honesty" means in modern poetry and whether or not DADDY is an "honest" poem. Draw on DADDY and the critical essays found in this chapter, citing them when appropriate.
2. Several of the critics in this chapter make competing claims about the meaning and significance of the form of DADDY, particularly its nursery-rhyme-like qualities. Using those claims as a springboard, write an essay in which you make your own argument about the relationship between form and content in DADDY.
3. In THE PLATH CELEBRATION: A PARTIAL DISSENT, Irving Howe argues, "There is something monstrous, utterly disproportionate, when tangled emotions about one's father are deliberately compared with the historical fate of the European Jews." Is Plath's personal, artistic use of a great historical tragedy truly "monstrous," as Howe says, or is it acceptable and effective, as other critics here contend? Write an essay in which you discuss the appropriateness and effects of Plath's references to the Holocaust, being sure to relate your interpretation to those of the critics in this chapter.
4. Mary Lynn Broe, Judith Kroll, Margaret Homans, Pamela Annas, and Steven Gould Axelrod all claim that DADDY portrays the speaker's attempt to successfully "exorcise" one demon or another, though they disagree both about what or who that demon is and about whether and how that exorcism (not the poem) succeeds. Using their arguments as a starting point, write an essay in which you offer your own interpretation of the process of exorcism enacted in the poem.
5. In SYLVIA PLATH, A. Alvarez quotes Plath's own interpretation of DADDY as a poem "spoken by a girl with an Electra complex." (Other articles also mention this statement.) Research the term Electra complex, which originated with Sigmund Freud. Is it useful to interpret DADDY through the lens of the Electra complex? Citing critics included in this chapter, write an essay in which you discuss Plath's Freudian explanation of DADDY.
6. In SYLVIA PLATH: THE WOUND AND THE CURE OF WORDS, Steven Gould Axelrod argues that DADDY is a response to "the domestic poem" created in the late 1940s and 1950s by American male poets, especially poems such as Theodore Roethke's MY PAPA'S WALTZ that depict fathers and sons. Write an essay comparing Plath's and Roethke's poems, drawing on, and in one way or another responding to, Axelrod's arguments. Do you agree, for example, with his claim that where one poem represents the father figure as merely "implicitly oppressive," the other "unmasks" him as a "monster"? Alternatively, might Axelrod be right that reading DADDY changes forever the way we read MY PAPA'S WALTZ? How and why so, or not?
7. Is DADDY a "feminist" poem? Citing the essays by Margaret Homans and other critics in this chapter, write an essay in which you explore the validity of a feminist interpretation.

About suffering they were never wrong,
The Old Masters: how well they understood
Its human position; how it takes place
While someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along;

5 How, when the aged are reverently, passionately waiting
For the miraculous birth, there always must be Children who did not specially want it to happen, skating
On a pond at the edge of the wood:
They never forgot

10 That even the dreadful martyrdom must run its course
Anyhow in a corner, some untidy spot
Where the dogs go on with their doggy life and the torturer's horse
Scratches its innocent behind on a tree.

 15 Quite leisurely from the disaster; the plowman may
 Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry,
 But for him it was not an important failure; the sun shone
 As it had to on the white legs disappearing into the green
 Water; and the expensive delicate ship that must have seen 20 Something amazing, a boy falling out of the sky,
 Had somewhere to get to and sailed calmly on.

ROBERT BROWNING

My Last Duchess

*Ferrara*³

- That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
 Looking as if she were alive. I call
 That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's⁴ hands
 Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
 5 Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
 "Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read
 Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
 The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
 But to myself they turned (since none puts by 10 The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)
 And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
 How such a glance came there; so, not the first
 Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
 Her husband's presence only, called that spot
 15 Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps
 Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
 Must never hope to reproduce the faint
 Half-flush that dies along her throat": such stuff
 20 Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
 For calling up that spot of joy. She had
 A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
 Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er
 She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

2. Landscape with the Fall of Icarus by Pieter Bruegel the Elder (1525?–69), located in the Brussels museum. According to Greek myth, Daedalus and his son, Icarus, escaped from imprisonment by using homemade wings of feathers and wax; but when Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax melted, and he fell into the sea and drowned. In the Bruegel painting the central figure is a peasant plowing, and several other figures are more immediately noticeable than Icarus, who, disappearing into the sea, is easy to miss in the lower right-hand corner.

3. Alfonso II, Duke of Ferrara in Italy in the mid-sixteenth century, is the presumed speaker of this dramatic monologue, which is loosely based on historical events. When the duke's first wife—whom he had married when she was fourteen—died at seventeen under suspicious circumstances, he negotiated through an agent (this poem's auditor) for marriage to the niece of the count of Tyrol in Austria.

4. Frà Pandolf is, like Claus (line 56), fictitious.

- 25 Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,
 The dropping of the daylight in the West,
 The bough of cherries some officious fool
 Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
 She rode with round the terrace—all and each 30 Would draw from her alike the approving speech,
 Or blush, at least. She thanked men,—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
 My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
 With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
 35 This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
 In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
 Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
 Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let 40 Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
 Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
 —E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt, Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without 45 Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;
 Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
 As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
 The company below, then. I repeat,
 The Count your master's known munificence
 50 Is ample warrant that no just pretense
 Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
 Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
 At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
 55 Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
 Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

Alzheimer's

- He stands at the door, a crazy old man
 Back from the hospital, his mind rattling
 Like the suitcase, swinging from his hand,
 That contains shaving cream, a piggy bank,
 5 A book he sometimes pretends to read,
 His clothes. On the brick wall beside him
 Roses and columbine slug it out for space, claw the mortar.
 The sun is shining, as it does late in the afternoon
 In England, after rain.
 10 Sun hardens the house, reifies it,
 Strikes the iron grillwork like a smithy
 And sparks fly off, burning in the bushes—
 The rosebushes—

- While the white wood trim defines solidity in space.
- 15 This is his house. He remembers it as his,
Remembers the walkway he built between the front room
And the garage, the rhododendron he planted in back,
The car he used to drive. He remembers himself,
A younger man, in a tweed hat, a man who loved
- 20 Music. There is no time for that now. No time for music,
The peculiar screeching of strings, the luxurious
Fiddling with emotion.
Other things have become more urgent.
Other matters are now of greater import, have more
- 25 Consequence, must be attended to. The first Thing he must do, now that he is home, is decide who
This woman is, this old, white-haired woman
Standing here in the doorway,
Welcoming him in.

Kubla Khan

*Or, a Vision in a Dream*⁵

- In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
- 5 Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
- 10 And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!⁶
A savage place! as holy and enchanted
- 15 As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!⁷
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
A mighty fountain momentarily⁸ was forced,

5. Coleridge claimed that he wrote this fragment immediately after waking from an opium dream and that after he was interrupted by a visitor he was unable to finish the poem.

6. That is, from side to side beneath a cover of cedar trees.

7. In a famous and often-imitated German ballad, the lady Lenore is carried off on horseback by the specter of her lover and married to him at his grave. 8. Suddenly.

- 20 Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst
 Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
 Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:
 And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever
 It flung up momentarily the sacred river.
- 25 Five miles meandering with a mazy motion
 Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
 Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
 And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean:
 And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far
- 30 Ancestral voices prophesying war!
- The shadow of the dome of pleasure
 Floated midway on the waves;
 Where was heard the mingled measure
 From the fountain and the caves.
- 35 It was a miracle of rare device,
 A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!
- A damsel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw:
 It was an Abyssinian maid,
 40 And on her dulcimer she played,
 Singing of Mount Abora.
 Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight 'twould win me,
- 45 That with music loud and long,
 I would build that dome in air,
 That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
 And all who heard should see them there,
 And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
- 50 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
 Weave a circle round him thrice,
 And close your eyes with holy dread,
 For he on honey-dew hath fed,
 And drunk the milk of Paradise.

JOHN DONNE

Death, be not proud

- Death, be not proud, though some have callèd thee
 Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
 For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
 Die not, poor Death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
- 5 From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures² be,
 Much pleasure; then from thee much more must flow,
 And soonest³ our best men with thee do go,
 Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.⁴
- Thou art slave to Fate, Chance, kings, and desperate men,
 10 And dost with Poison, War, and Sickness dwell;
 And poppy or charms can make us sleep as well,
 And better than thy stroke; why swell'st⁵ thou then?
 One short sleep past, we wake eternally
 And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

The Good-Morrow

I wonder, by my troth, what thou and I
 Did, till we loved? Were we not weaned till then
 But sucked on country pleasures, childishy?
 Or snorted in the seven sleepers' den?⁶
 5 'Twas so; but⁷ this, all pleasures fancies be.
 If ever any beauty I did see,
 Which I desired, and got,⁸ 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good morrow to our waking souls,
 Which watch not one another out of fear;
 10 For love all love of other sights controls,
 And makes one little room an everywhere.
 Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
 Let maps to other,⁹ worlds on worlds have shown:
 Let us possess one world; each hath one, and is one.

15 My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,¹
 And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
 Where can we find two better hemispheres,
 Without sharp North, without declining West?
 Whatever dies was not mixed equally;²
 20 If our two loves be one, or thou and I
 Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.

Song

Go, and catch a falling star,
 Get with child a mandrake root,³
 Tell me, where all past years are,
 Or who cleft the devil's foot,
 5 Teach me to hear mermaids singing
 Or to keep off envy's stinging,
 And find
 What wind
 Serves to advance an honest mind.
 10 If thou beest born to strange sights,⁴
 Things invisible to see,
 Ride ten thousand days and nights,
 Till age snow white hairs on thee;

 And swear
 No where
 Lives a woman true, and fair.
- If thou find'st one, let me know:
 20 Such a pilgrimage were sweet.
 Yet do not, I would not go,
 Though at next door we might meet:
 Though she were true when you met her,
 And last till you write your letter,
 25 Yet she
 Will be
 False, ere I come, to two, or three.

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning

- As virtuous men pass mildly away,
 And whisper to their souls to go,
 Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
 "The breath goes now," and some say, "No,"
- 5 So let us melt, and make no noise,
 No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;
 'Twere profanation of our joys
 To tell the laity our love.
- Moving of the earth⁵ brings harms and fears,
 10 Men reckon what it did and meant;
 But trepidation of the spheres,⁶
 Though greater far, is innocent.
- Dull sublunary⁷ lovers' love
 (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
 15 Absence, because it doth remove Those things which elemented⁸ it.
- But we, by a love so much refined
 That our selves know not what it is,
 Inter-assured of the mind,
 20 Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.
- Our two souls therefore, which are one,
 Though I must go, endure not yet

5. Earthquakes.

6. Renaissance theory that the celestial spheres trembled and thus caused unexpected variations in their orbits. Such movements are "innocent" because earthlings do not observe or fret about them.

7. Below the moon—that is, changeable. According to the traditional cosmology that Donne invokes here, the moon is the dividing line between the immutable celestial world and the mutable earthly one.

8. Comprised, made up its elements.

A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

25 If they be two, they are two so
 As stiff twin compasses are two:
 Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
 To move, but doth, if the other do;

And though it in the center sit,
 30 Yet when the other far doth roam,
 It leans, and hearkens after it,
 And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
 Like the other foot, obliquely run;
 35 Thy firmness makes my circle⁹ just,
 And makes me end where I begun.

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR

We Wear the Mask

We wear the mask that grins and lies,
It hides our cheeks and shades our eyes,—
This debt we pay to human guile;
With torn and bleeding hearts we smile,
5 And mouth with myriad subtleties.

Why should the world be over-wise,
In counting all our tears and sighs?
Nay, let them only see us, while
We wear the mask.

10 We smile, but, O great Christ, our cries
To thee from tortured souls arise.
We sing, but oh the clay is vile
Beneath our feet, and long the mile;
But let the world dream otherwise,
15 We wear the mask!

T. S. ELIOT

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock

S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse a persona che mai tornasse al mondo, questa fiamma staria senza più scosse.

9. Traditional symbol of perfection.

*Ma per ciò che giammai di questo fondo non tornò vivo alcun, s'i'odo il vero, senza tema d'infamia ti rispondo.*¹

- Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherised upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
5 The muttering retreats
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
10 To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .
Oh, do not ask, "What is it?"
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.²

- 15 The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes,
The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes,
Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,
20 Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time³

For the yellow smoke that slides along the street

- 25 Rubbing its back upon the window-panes;
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days⁴ of hands
30 That lift and drop a question on your plate;
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

1. From Dante, Inferno (27.61–66): "If I thought that my reply would be / to one who would ever return to the world, / this flame would stay without further movement; // but since none has ever returned alive from this depth, / if what I hear is true, / I answer you without fear of infamy." The words are spoken by the character Guido da Montefeltro—imprisoned in flame in the depths of hell as a punishment for giving false counsel—to Dante, whom da Montefeltro believes will never return from his journey into the inferno. 2. Italian artist Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564).

3. Echo of Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress" (1681; p. 808), which famously begins, "Had we but world enough, and time / This coyness, lady, were no crime."

4. Works and Days is a poem composed about 700 BCE by the Greek writer Hesiod; lamenting the moral decay of the present, it celebrates simple life and hard work, especially agricultural labor.

- 35 In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.
- And indeed there will be time
To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"
Time to turn back and descend the stair,
- 40 With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
(They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!")
My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
(They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!")
- 45 Do I dare
Disturb the universe?
In a minute there is time
For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.
- For I have known them all already, known them all—
- 50 Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons,
I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
I know the voices dying with a dying fall
Beneath the music from a farther room.
So how should I presume?
- 55 And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
Then how should I begin
- 60 To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?
And how should I presume?
- And I have known the arms already, known them all—Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
(But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!)
- 65 Is it perfume from a dress
That makes me so digress?
Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
And should I then presume?
And how should I begin?

- 70 Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets
And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

- 75 And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
Smoothed by long fingers,

Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
 Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
 Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
 80 Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis?
 But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed, Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,⁵
 I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
 I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
 85 And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
 And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
 Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
 90 Would it have been worth while,
 To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
 To have squeezed the universe into a ball⁶
 To roll it towards some overwhelming question,
 To say: "I am Lazarus, come from the dead,"⁷
 95 Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all"—
 If one, settling a pillow by her head,
 Should say: "That is not what I meant at all.
 That is not it, at all."

And would it have been worth it, after all,
 100 Would it have been worth while,
 After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
 After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
 And this, and so much more?—
 It is impossible to say just what I mean!
 105 But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:
 Would it have been worth while
 If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
 And turning toward the window, should say:
 "That is not it at all,
 110 That is not what I meant, at all."

No! I am not Prince Hamlet,⁸ nor was meant to be;
 Am an attendant lord, one that will do
 To swell a progress,⁹ start a scene or two,

5. Like John the Baptist; at a banquet, King Herod has the prophet's head delivered on a plate to Salome, the woman who requested his execution (Mark 6.17–28; Matt. 14.3–11).

6. Another echo of "To His Coy Mistress": "Let us roll all our strength and all / Our sweetness up into one ball, / And tear our pleasures with rough strife / Thorough the iron gates of life" (lines 41–44; p. 809).

7. The New Testament relates the story of Jesus raising Lazarus from the dead in John 11.1–44.

8. Protagonist of Shakespeare's tragedy Hamlet (p. 1396), who is indecisive for much of the play.

9. Journey of a royal or noble person, or the representation of such a journey onstage as part of a play (as was common in Shakespeare's age).

- Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,
 115 Deferential, glad to be of use,
 Politic, cautious, and meticulous;
 Full of high sentence,¹ but a bit obtuse;
 At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
 Almost, at times, the Fool.
- 120 I grow old . . . I grow old . . .
 I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.
- Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
 I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.
 I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.
- 125 I do not think that they will sing to me.
- I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
 Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
 When the wind blows the water white and black.
- We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
 130 By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown
 Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

ROBERT FROST

Fire and Ice

- Some say the world will end in fire,
 Some say in ice.
 From what I've tasted of desire
 I hold with those who favor fire.
- 5 But if it had to perish twice,
 I think I know enough of hate
 To say that for destruction ice
 Is also great
 And would suffice.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening

- Whose woods these are I think I know.
 His house is in the village though;
 He will not see me stopping here
 To watch his woods fill up with snow.
- 5 My little horse must think it queer
 To stop without a farmhouse near

1. Sententious; that is, he tends to speak in a pompous, formal manner.

Between the woods and frozen lake
The darkest evening of the year.

- He gives his harness bells a shake
10 To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound's the sweep
Of easy wind and downy flake.

- The woods are lovely, dark, and deep,
But I have promises to keep,
15 And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

SEAMUS HEANEY

Digging

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.

- Under my window, a clean rasping sound
When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
5 My father, digging. I look down

Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
Bends low, comes up twenty years away
Stooping in rhythm through potato drills²
Where he was digging.

- 10 The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
To scatter new potatoes that we picked
Loving their cool hardness in our hands.

- 15 By God, the old man could handle a spade.
Just like his old man.

My grandfather cut more turf³ in a day
Than any other man on Toner's bog.
Once I carried him milk in a bottle

- 20 Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up
To drink it, then fell to right away
Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods
Over his shoulder, going down and down
For the good turf. Digging.

- 25 The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap
Of soggy peat, the curt cuts of an edge
Through living roots awaken in my head.
But I've no spade to follow men like them.

2. Small furrows in which seeds are sown.

3. Peat cut into slabs and dried to be used as fuel in stoves and furnaces.

Between my finger and my thumb
 30 The squat pen rests.
 I'll dig with it.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

God's Grandeur

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
 It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;⁴
 It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
 Crushed. Why do men then now not reck his rod?⁵
 5 Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
 And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
 And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
 Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
 And for all this, nature is never spent;
 10 There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
 And though the last lights off the black West went
 Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
 Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
 World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

Spring and Fall

to a young child

Márgarét áre you gríeving⁶
 Over Goldengrove unleaving?
 Leáves, like the things of man, you
 With your fresh thoughts care for, can you?
 5 Áh! ás the heart grows older
 It will-come to such sights colder
 By and by, nor spare a sigh
 Though worlds of wanwood leafmeal⁷ lie;
 And yet you wíll weep and know why.
 10 Now no matter, child, the name:
 Sórrow's spríngs áre the same.
 Nor mouth had, no nor mind, expressed

4. "I mean foil in its sense of leaf or tinsel [. . .]. Shaken goldfoil gives off broad glares like sheet lightning and also, and this is true of nothing else, owing to its zig-zag dints and creasings and network of small many cornered facets, a sort of fork lightning too" (Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, edited by C. C. Abbott, 1955, p. 169). 5. Heed his authority.

6. Hopkins's own accent markings.

7. Broken up, leaf by leaf (analogous to "piecemeal"). Wanwood: pale, gloomy woods.

- What heart heard of, ghost⁸ guessed:
 It is the blight man was born for,
 15 It is Margaret you mourn for.

BEN JONSON

On My First Son

- Farewell, thou child of my right hand,⁹ and joy;
 My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy:
 Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
 Exacted by thy fate, on the just¹ day.
 5 O could I lose all father now! for why
 Will man lament the state he should envy,
 To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
 And, if no other misery, yet age?
 Rest in soft peace, and asked, say, "Here doth lie
 10 Ben Jonson his² best piece of poetry."
 For whose sake henceforth all his vows be such
 As what he loves may never like too much.
- 1616

JOHN KEATS

Ode on a Grecian Urn

I

- Thou still unravished bride of quietness,
 Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
 Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
 A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
 5 What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape
 Of deities or mortals, or of both,
 In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?³
 What men or gods are these? What maidens loath?
 What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
 10 What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

II

- Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
 Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
 Not to the sensual⁴ ear, but, more endeared,

8. Soul. 9. Literal translation of the son's name, Benjamin. 1. Exact; the son died on his seventh birthday, in 1603. 2. That is, Ben Jonson's (this was a common Renaissance form of the possessive). 3. Arcadia. Tempe is a beautiful valley near Mt. Olympus in Greece, and the valleys ("dales") of Arcadia are a picturesque section of the Peloponnesus; both came to be associated with the pastoral ideal. 4. Of the senses, as distinguished from the "ear" of the spirit or imagination.

Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:

- 15 Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
 Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
 Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
 Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
 She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
 20 For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

III

- Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
 Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
 And, happy melodist, unwearied,
 For ever piping songs for ever new;
 25 More happy love! more happy, happy love!
 For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
 For ever panting, and for ever young;
 All breathing human passion far above,
 That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
 30 A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

Greek vase featuring Hercules driving a bull to sacrifice, c. 525–520 BCE

IV

- Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
 To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
 Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
 And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
 35 What little town by river or sea shore,
 Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
 Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn?
 And, little town, thy streets for evermore

Will silent be; and not a soul to tell 40 Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

V

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede⁵
 Of marble men and maidens overwrought,⁶
 With forest branches and the trodden weed;
 Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought 45 As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!
 When old age shall this generation waste,
 Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
 Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
 Beauty is truth, truth beauty⁷—that is all
 50 Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

To Autumn

I

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
 Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
 Conspiring with him how to load and bless
 With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eves run;
 5 To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees,
 And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
 To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
 With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
 And still more, later flowers for the bees,
 10 Until they think warm days will never cease,
 For Summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

II

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
 Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
 Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
 15 Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind,⁸
 Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,
 Drowsed with the fume of poppies, while thy hook⁹
 Spares the next swath and all its twined flowers:
 And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep 20 Steady thy laden head across a brook;
 Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
 Thou watchest the last oozy hours by hours.

5. Woven pattern. Attic: Attica was the district of ancient Greece surrounding Athens.

6. Ornaented all over.

7. In some printings of the poem, "Beauty is truth, truth beauty" is in quotation marks, and in some texts it is not, leading to critical disagreements about whether the last line and a half are also inscribed on the urn or spoken by the poem's speaker.

8. Which sifts the grain from the chaff. 9. Scythe or sickle.

III

- Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
 Think not of them, thou hast thy music too—
 25 While barrèd clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
 And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
 Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
 Among the river shallows,¹ borne aloft
 Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
 30 And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn;²
 Hedge-cricket sing; and now with treble soft
 The red-breast whistles from a garden-croft;³
 And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

Facing It

- My black face fades,
 hiding inside the black granite.
 I said I wouldn't,
 dammit: No tears.
 5 I'm stone. I'm flesh.
 My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey, the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way—I'm inside
 10 the Vietnam Veterans Memorial⁴ again, depending on the light to make a difference.
 I go down the 58,022 names, half-expecting to find
 15 my own in letters like smoke.
 I touch the name Andrew Johnson;⁵
 I see the booby trap's white flash.
 Names shimmer on a woman's blouse
 but when she walks away
 20 the names stay on the wall.
 Brushstrokes flash, a red bird's wings cutting across my stare.

1. Shallows. 2. Domain. 3. Enclosed garden near a house.

4. Designed by Yale undergraduate Maya Ying Lin, this Washington, D.C., memorial features two black, highly reflective stone walls, each almost 247 feet long, etched with the names of servicemen declared either missing or killed in action during the Vietnam conflict.

5. Soldier from Komunyakaa's hometown, Bogalusa, Louisiana. He shared the name of the U.S. president who, after succeeding the recently assassinated Abraham Lincoln in 1865, both vetoed bills designed to stop Southern states from depriving freed slaves of their civil liberties and opposed passage of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) granting citizenship to African Americans.

The sky. A plane in the sky.
 A white vet's image floats
 25 closer to me, then his eyes look through mine. I'm a window.
 He's lost his right arm inside the stone. In the black mirror a woman's trying to erase names:
 No, she's brushing a boy's hair.

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

From "Facing It" (2000)*

Now, as I think back to 1984, when I wrote "Facing It," with the humidity hanging over New Orleans [. . .] in early summer, I remember that it seemed several lifetimes from those fiery years in Vietnam. [. . .] I had meditated on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial as if the century's blues songs had been solidified into something monumental and concrete. Our wailing, our ranting, our singing of spirituals and kaddish and rock anthems, it was all captured and refined into a shaped destiny that attempted to portray personal and public feelings about war and human loss. It became a shrine overnight: a blackness that plays with light—a reflected motion in the stone that balances a dance between grass and sky. Whoever faces the granite becomes a part of it. The reflections move into and through each other. A dance between the dead and the living. Even in its heft and weight, emotionally and physically, it still seems to defy immediate description, constantly incorporating into its shape all the new reflections and shapes brought to it: one of the poignant shrines of the twentieth century. LINDA PASTAN

To a Daughter Leaving Home

When I taught you at eight to ride
 a bicycle, loping along beside you
 5 as you wobbled away
 on two round wheels,
 my own mouth rounding
 in surprise when you pulled ahead down the curved 10 path of the park,
 I kept waiting for the thud of your crash as I
 sprinted to catch up, 15 while you grew smaller, more breakable with distance,
 pumping, pumping
 for your life, screaming
 20 with laughter,
 the hair flapping
 behind you like a handkerchief waving goodbye.

MARGE PIERCY

Barbie Doll

This girlchild was born as usual and presented dolls that did pee-pee and miniature GE stoves and irons and wee lipsticks the color of cherry candy.

 5 Then in the magic of puberty, a classmate said:
 You have a great big nose and fat legs.

She was healthy, tested intelligent,
 possessed strong arms and back,
 abundant sexual drive and manual dexterity.
 10 She went to and fro apologizing.
 Everyone saw a fat nose on thick legs.

She was advised to play coy, exhorted to come on hearty,
 exercise, diet, smile and wheedle.
 15 Her good nature wore out like a fan belt.
 So she cut off her nose and her legs and offered them up.

In the casket displayed on satin she lay 20 with the undertaker's cosmetics painted on,
 a turned-up putty nose,
 dressed in a pink and white nightie.
 Doesn't she look pretty? everyone said.
 Consummation at last.
 25 To every woman a happy ending.

SYLVIA PLATH

Lady Lazarus

I have done it again.
 One year in every ten
 I manage it—

A sort of walking miracle, my skin
 5 Bright as a Nazi lampshade,
 My right foot

A paperweight,
 My face a featureless, fine
 Jew linen.⁶

10 Peel off the napkin
 O my enemy.
 Do I terrify?—

6. During World War II, prisoners in some Nazi camps were gassed to death and their body parts then turned into objects such as lampshades and paperweights.

- The nose, the eye pits, the full set of teeth?
 The sour breath
 15 Will vanish in a day.
 Soon, soon the flesh
 The grave cave ate will be
 At home on me
 And I a smiling woman.
 20 I am only thirty.
 And like the cat I have nine times to die.
 This is Number Three.
 What a trash
 To annihilate each decade.
 25 What a million filaments.
 The peanut-crunching crowd
 Shoves in to see
 Them unwrap me hand and foot—
 The big strip tease.
 30 Gentlemen, ladies
 These are my hands
 My knees.
 I may be skin and bone,
 Nevertheless, I am the same, identical woman.
 35 The first time it happened I was ten.
 It was an accident.
 The second time I meant
 To last it out and not come back at all.
 I rocked shut
 40 As a seashell.
 They had to call and call
 And pick the worms off me like sticky pearls.
 Dying
 Is an art, like everything else.
 45 I do it exceptionally well.
 I do it so it feels like hell.
 I do it so it feels real.
 I guess you could say I've a call.
 It's easy enough to do it in a cell.
 50 It's easy enough to do it and stay put.
 It's the theatrical
 Comeback in broad day
 To the same place, the same face, the same brute
 Amused shout:

- 55 "A miracle!"
 That knocks me out.
 There is a charge
 For the eyeing of my scars, there is a charge
 For the hearing of my heart—
- 60 It really goes.
 And there is a charge, a very large charge
 For a word or a touch
 Or a bit of blood
 Or a piece of my hair or my clothes.
- 65 So, so Herr Doktor.
 So, Herr Enemy.
 I am your opus,
 I am your valuable,
 The pure gold baby
- 70 That melts to a shriek.
 I turn and burn.
 Do not think I underestimate your great concern
 Ash, ash—
 You poke and stir.
- 75 Flesh, bone, there is nothing there—
 A cake of soap,
 A wedding ring,
 A gold filling.
 Herr God, Herr Lucifer
- 80 Beware
 Beware.
 Out of the ash
 I rise with my red hair
 And I eat men like air.

Morning Song

- Love set you going like a fat gold watch.
 The midwife slapped your footsoles, and your bald cry
 Took its place among the elements.
- Our voices echo, magnifying your arrival. New statue.
- 5 In a drafty museum, your nakedness
 Shadows our safety. We stand round blankly as walls.
- I'm no more your mother
 Than the cloud that distils a mirror to reflect its own slow Effacement at the wind's hand.

- Back into the chamber turning, all my soul within me burning,
 Soon I heard again a tapping somewhat louder than before.
 "Surely," said I, "surely that is something at my window lattice;
 Let me see, then, what thereat is, and this mystery explore—35 Let my heart be still a moment and this mystery explore;—
 'Tis the wind and nothing more!"
- Open here I flung the shutter, when, with many a flirt and flutter,
 In there stepped a stately raven of the saintly days of yore;
 Not the least obeisance made he; not an instant stopped or stayed he;
 40 But, with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door—
 Perched upon a bust of Pallas⁷ just above my chamber door—
 Perched, and sat, and nothing more.
- Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling,
 By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,
 45 "Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou," I said, "art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient raven wandering from the Nightly shore—
 Tell me what thy lordly name is on the Night's Plutonian⁸ shore!"
 Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."
- Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly, 50 Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore,
 For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door—
 Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door,
 With such name as "Nevermore."
- 55 But the raven, sitting lonely on the placid bust, spoke only
 That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour.
 Nothing farther then he uttered—not a feather then he fluttered—
 Till I scarcely more than muttered "Other friends have flown before—
 On the morrow he will leave me, as my hopes have flown before."
 60 Then the bird said "Nevermore."
- Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken,
 "Doubtless," said I, "what it utters is its only stock and store
 Caught from some unhappy master whom unmerciful Disaster
 Followed fast and followed faster till his songs one burden bore—
 65 Till the dirges of his Hope that melancholy burden bore
 Of 'Never—nevermore.'"
- But the raven still beguiling all my sad soul into smiling,
 Straight I wheeled a cushioned seat in front of bird and bust and door;
 Then, upon the velvet sinking, I betook myself to linking 70 Fancy unto fancy, thinking what this ominous bird of yore—
 What this grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore Meant in croaking "Nevermore."
- This I sat engaged in guessing, but no syllable expressing
 To the fowl whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom's core;
 75 This and more I sat divining, with my head at ease reclining
 On the cushion's velvet lining that the lamplight gloated o'er,

7. Athena, Greek goddess of wisdom. 8. Dark; Pluto was the ancient Greek god of the underworld.

But whose velvet violet lining with the lamplight gloating o'er,
She shall press, ah, nevermore!

Then, methought, the air grew denser, perfumed from an unseen censer 80 Swung by angels whose faint foot-falls tinkled on the tufted floor.
 "Wretch," I cried, "thy God hath lent thee—by these angels he hath sent thee

Respite—respite and nepenthe⁹ from thy memories of Lenore!
 Quaff, oh quaff this kind nepenthe and forget this lost Lenore!"
 Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."

85 "Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil!—prophet still, if bird or devil!—
 Whether Tempter sent, or whether tempest tossed thee here ashore,
 Desolate, yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted—
 On this home by Horror haunted—tell me truly, I implore—
 Is there—is there balm in Gilead?¹—tell me—tell me, I implore!"
 90 Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."

"Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil—prophet still, if bird or devil!
 By that Heaven that bends above us—by that God we both adore—
 Tell this soul with sorrow laden if, within the distant Aidenn,²
 It shall clasp a sainted maiden whom the angels name Lenore—95 Clasp a rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore."
 Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."

"Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend!" I shrieked upstarting—
 "Get thee back into the tempest and the Night's Plutonian shore!
 Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!
 100 Leave my loneliness unbroken!—quit the bust above my door!
 Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!"
 Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."

And the raven, never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting
 On the pallid bust of Pallas just above my chamber door;
 105 And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming,
 And the lamp-light o'er him streaming throws his shadow on the floor;
 And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor
 Shall be lifted—nevermore!

EZRA POUND

The River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter

(after Rihaku)³

While my hair was still cut straight across my forehead
 I played about the front gate, pulling flowers.

9. Drug reputed by the Greeks to cause forgetfulness or sorrow (pronounced "ne-PEN-thee").

1. See Jeremiah 8.22. 2. Eden.

3. Japanese name for Li Po, an eighth-century Chinese poet. Pound's poem is based on one by Li Po, which Pound read in translation.

You came by on bamboo stilts, playing horse,
 You walked about my seat, playing with blue plums.
 5 And we went on living in the village of Chokan:
 Two small people, without dislike or suspicion.

At fourteen I married My Lord you.
 I never laughed, being bashful.
 Lowering my head, I looked at the wall.
 10 Called to, a thousand times, I never looked back.

At fifteen I stopped scowling,
 I desired my dust to be mingled with yours
 For ever and for ever and for ever.
 Why should I climb the look out?

15 At sixteen you departed,
 You went into far Ku-to-yen, by the river of swirling eddies,
 And you have been gone five months.
 The monkeys make sorrowful noise overhead.

You dragged your feet when you went out.
 20 By the gate now, the moss is grown, the different mosses,
 Too deep to clear them away!

The leaves fall early this autumn, in wind.
 The paired butterflies are already yellow with August
 Over the grass in the West garden;

25 They hurt me. I grow older.
 If you are coming down through the narrows of the river Kiang,
 Please let me know beforehand,
 And I will come out to meet you
 As far as Cho-fu-Sa.

Goblin Market

Morning and evening
 Maids heard the goblins cry:
 "Come buy our orchard fruits,
 Come buy, come buy:
 5 Apples and quinces,
 Lemons and oranges,
 Plump unpecked cherries,
 Melons and raspberries,
 Bloom-down-cheeked peaches,
 10 Swart⁴-headed mulberries,
 Wild free-born cranberries,

- Crab-apples, dewberries,
 Pine-apples, blackberries,
 Apricots, strawberries;—
 15 All ripe together
 In summer weather,— Morns that pass by,
 Fair eves that fly;
 Come buy, come buy:
 20 Our grapes fresh from the vine,
 Pomegranates full and fine,
 Dates and sharp bullaces,
 Rare pears and greengages,
 Damsons⁵ and bilberries, 25 Taste them and try:
 Currants and gooseberries,
 Bright-fire-like barberries,
 Figs to fill your mouth,
 Citrons from the South,
 30 Sweet to tongue and sound to eye;
 Come buy, come buy.”

 Evening by evening
 Among the brookside rushes,
 Laura bowed her head to hear,
 35 Lizzie veiled her blushes:
 Crouching close together
 In the cooling weather,
 With clasping arms and cautioning lips,
 With tingling cheeks and finger tips.
 40 “Lie close,” Laura said,
 Pricking up her golden head:
 “We must not look at goblin men,
 We must not buy their fruits:
 Who knows upon what soil they fed
 45 Their hungry thirsty roots?”
 “Come buy,” call the goblins
 Hobbling down the glen.
 “Oh,” cried Lizzie, “Laura, Laura,
 You should not peep at goblin men.”
 50 Lizzie covered up her eyes,
 Covered close lest they should look;
 Laura reared her glossy head,
 And whispered like the restless brook:
 “Look, Lizzie, look, Lizzie,
 55 Down the glen tramp little men.
 One hauls a basket,
 One bears a plate,
 One lugs a golden dish

5. Plums; “bullaces” (line 22) and “greengages” (23) are other varieties of the same fruit.

- Of many pounds weight.
 60 How fair the vine must grow
 Whose grapes are so luscious;
 How warm the wind must blow
 Thro' those fruit bushes."
 "No," said Lizzie: "No, no, no;
 65 Their offers should not charm us,
 Their evil gifts would harm us."
 She thrust a dimpled finger
 In each ear, shut eyes and ran:
 Curious Laura chose to linger
 70 Wondering at each merchant man.
 One had a cat's face,
 One whisked a tail,
 One tramped at a rat's pace,
 One crawled like a snail,
 75 One like a wombat prowled obtuse and furry,
 One like a ratel⁶ tumbled hurry skurry.
 She heard a voice like voice of doves
 Cooing all together:
 They sounded kind and full of loves
 80 In the pleasant weather.
 Laura stretched her gleaming neck
 Like a rush-imbedded swan,
 Like a lily from the beck,⁷
 Like a moonlit poplar branch,
 85 Like a vessel at the launch
 When its last restraint is gone.
 Backwards up the mossy glen
 Turned and trooped the goblin men,
 With their shrill repeated cry,
 90 "Come buy, come buy."
 When they reached where Laura was
 They stood stock still upon the moss,
 Leering at each other,
 Brother with queer brother;
 95 Signalling each other,
 Brother with sly brother.
 One set his basket down,
 One reared⁸ his plate;
 One began to weave a crown
 100 Of tendrils, leaves and rough nuts brown
 (Men sell not such in any town);
 One heaved the golden weight
 Of dish and fruit to offer her:
 "Come buy, come buy," was still their cry.

6. Badger-like mammal native to Asia and Africa (pronounced "RAY-tl").

7. Stream. 8. Raised.

- 105 Laura stared but did not stir,
 Longed but had no money:
 The whisk-tailed merchant bade her taste
 In tones as smooth as honey,
 The cat-faced purr'd,
 110 The rat-paced spoke a word
 Of welcome, and the snail-paced even was heard;
 One parrot-voiced and jolly
 Cried "Pretty Goblin" still⁹ for "Pretty Polly;"—
 One whistled like a bird.
- 115 But sweet-tooth Laura spoke in haste:
 "Good folk, I have no coin;
 To take were to purloin:
 I have no copper in my purse,
 I have no silver either,
 120 And all my gold is on the furze!¹
 That shakes in windy weather
 Above the rusty heather."
 "You have much gold upon your head,"
 They answered all together:
 125 "Buy from us with a golden curl."
 She clipped a precious golden lock,
 She dropped a tear more rare than pearl,
 Then sucked their fruit globes fair or red:
 Sweeter than honey from the rock,²
 130 Stronger than man-rejoicing wine,
 Clearer than water flowed that juice;
 She never tasted such before,
 How should it cloy with length of use?
 She sucked and sucked and sucked the more
 135 Fruits which that unknown orchard bore;
 She sucked until her lips were sore;
 Then flung the emptied rinds away
 But gathered up one kernel-stone,
 And knew not was it night or day
 140 As she turned home alone.
- Lizzie met her at the gate
 Full of wise upbraidings:
 "Dear, you should not stay so late,
 Twilight is not good for maidens;
 145 Should not loiter in the glen
 In the haunts of goblin men.
 Do you not remember Jeanie,
 How she met them in the moonlight,

9. Always. 1. Spiny shrub with yellow flowers.

2. See Psalms 81.16: "He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee."

- Took their gifts both choice and many,
 150 Ate their fruits and wore their flowers
 Plucked from bowers
 Where summer ripens at all hours?
 But ever in the noonlight
 She pined and pined away;
 155 Sought them by night and day,
 Found them no more but dwindled and grew grey;
 Then fell with the first snow,
 While to this day no grass will grow
 Where she lies low:
 160 I planted daisies there a year ago
 That never blow.³
 You should not loiter so.”
 “Nay, hush,” said Laura:
 “Nay, hush, my sister:
 165 I ate and ate my fill,
 Yet my mouth waters still;
 Tomorrow night I will Buy more:” and kissed her:
 “Have done with sorrow;
 170 I’ll bring you plums tomorrow
 Fresh on their mother twigs,
 Cherries worth getting;
 You cannot think what figs
 My teeth have met in,
 175 What melons icy-cold
 Piled on a dish of gold
 Too huge for me to hold,
 What peaches with a velvet nap,
 Pellucid⁴ grapes without one seed:
 180 Odorous indeed must be the mead
 Whereon they grow, and pure the wave they drink
 With lilies at the brink,
 And sugar-sweet their sap.”

 Golden head by golden head,
 185 Like two pigeons in one nest
 Folded in each other’s wings,
 They lay down in their curtained bed:
 Like two blossoms on one stem,
 Like two flakes of new-fall’n snow,
 190 Like two wands of ivory
 Tipped with gold for awful⁵ kings.
 Moon and stars gazed in at them,
 Wind sang to them lullaby,
 Lumbering owls forbore to fly,
 195 Not a bat flapped to and fro
 Round their rest:

3. Bloom. 4. Translucent. 5. Awe-inspiring.

Cheek to cheek and breast to breast
Locked together in one nest.

- Early in the morning
 200 When the first cock crowd his warning,
 Neat like bees, as sweet and busy,
 Laura rose with Lizzie:
 Fetched in honey, milked the cows,
 Aired and set to rights the house,
 205 Kneaded cakes of whitest wheat,
 Cakes for dainty mouths to eat,
 Next churned butter, whipped up cream,
 Fed their poultry, sat and sewed;
 Talked as modest maidens should:
 210 Lizzie with an open heart,
 Laura in an absent dream,
 One content, one sick in part;

One warbling for the mere bright day's delight,
 One longing for the night.
 215 At length slow evening came:
 They went with pitchers to the reedy brook;
 Lizzie most placid in her look,
 Laura most like a leaping flame.
 They drew the gurgling water from its deep;
 220 Lizzie plucked purple and rich golden flags,⁶
 Then turning homewards said: "The sunset flushes
 Those furthest loftiest crags;
 Come, Laura, not another maiden lags,
 No wilful squirrel wags,
 225 The beasts and birds are fast asleep."
 But Laura loitered still among the rushes
 And said the bank was steep.

And said the hour was early still,
 The dew not fall'n, the wind not chill:
 230 Listening ever, but not catching
 The customary cry,
 "Come buy, come buy,"
 With its iterated jingle
 Of sugar-baited words:
 235 Not for all her watching
 Once discerning even one goblin
 Racing, whisking, tumbling, hobbling;
 Let alone the herds
 That used to tramp along the glen,
 240 In groups or single,
 Of brisk fruit-merchant men.
 Till Lizzie urged, "O Laura, come;
 I hear the fruit-call but I dare not look:
 You should not loiter longer at this brook:
 245 Come with me home.
 The stars rise, the moon bends her arc,
 Each glowworm winks her spark,
 Let us get home before the night grows dark:
 For clouds may gather
 250 Tho' this is summer weather,
 Put out the lights and drench us thro';
 Then if we lost our way what should we do?"
 Laura turned cold as stone
 To find her sister heard that cry alone,
 255 That goblin cry,
 "Come buy our fruits, come buy."
 Must she then buy no more such dainty fruit?
 Must she no more such succous⁷ pasture find,
 Gone deaf and blind?

6. Irises. 7. Juicy.

- 260 Her tree of life drooped from the root:
 She said not one word in her heart's sore ache;
 But peering thro' the dimness, nought discerning,
 Trudged home, her pitcher dripping all the way;
 So crept to bed, and lay
 265 Silent till Lizzie slept;
 Then sat up in a passionate yearning,
 And gnashed her teeth for baulked desire, and wept
 As if her heart would break.

 Day after day, night after night,
 270 Laura kept watch in vain
 In sullen silence of exceeding pain.
 She never caught again the goblin cry:
 "Come buy, come buy;"—
 She never spied the goblin men
 275 Hawking their fruits along the glen:
 But when the noon waxed bright
 Her hair grew thin and gray;
 She dwindled, as the fair full moon doth turn
 To swift decay and burn
 280 Her fire away.

 One day remembering her kernel-stone
 She set it by a wall that faced the south;
 Dewed it with tears, hoped for a root,
 Watched for a waxing shoot,
 285 But there came none;
 It never saw the sun,
 It never felt the trickling moisture run:
 While with sunk eyes and faded mouth
 She dreamed of melons, as a traveler sees 290 False waves in desert drouth
 With shade of leaf-crowned trees,
 And burns the thirstier in the sandful breeze.

 She no more swept the house,
 Tended the fowls or cows,
 295 Fetched honey, kneaded cakes of wheat,
 Brought water from the brook:
 But sat down listless in the chimney-nook
 And would not eat.

 Tender Lizzie could not bear
 300 To watch her sister's cankerous⁸ care
 Yet not to share.
 She night and morning
 Caught the goblins' cry:
 "Come buy our orchard fruits,
 305 Come buy, come buy:"—

8. Corroding.

- Beside the brook, along the glen,
 She heard the tramp of goblin men,
 The voice and stir
 Poor Laura could not hear;
 310 Longed to buy fruit to comfort her,
 But feared to pay too dear.
 She thought of Jeanie in her grave,
 Who should have been a bride;
 But who for joys brides hope to have 315 Fell sick and died
 In her gay prime,
 In earliest Winter time,
 With the first glazing rime,
 With the first snow-fall of crisp Winter time.
 320 Till Laura dwindling
 Seemed knocking at Death's door:
 Then Lizzie weighed⁹ no more
 Better and worse;
 But put a silver penny in her purse,
 325 Kissed Laura, crossed the heath with clumps of furze
 At twilight, halted by the brook:
 And for the first time in her life
 Began to listen and look.
 Laughed every goblin
 330 When they spied her peeping:
 Came towards her hobbling,
 Flying, running, leaping,
 Puffing and blowing,
 Chuckling, clapping, crowing,
 335 Clucking and gobbling,
 Mopping and mowing,¹
 Full of airs and graces,
 Pulling wry faces,
 Demure grimaces,
 340 Cat-like and rat-like,
 Ratel- and wombat-like,
 Snail-paced in a hurry,
 Parrot-voiced and whistler,
 Helter skelter, hurry skurry,
 345 Chattering like magpies,
 Fluttering like pigeons,
 Gliding like fishes,—
 Hugged her and kissed her,
 Squeezed and caressed her:
 350 Stretched up their dishes,
 Panniers,² and plates:
 "Look at our apples

9. Evaluated, considered. 1. Making faces. 2. Baskets for carrying provisions.

Russet and dun,
 Bob at our cherries,
 355 Bite at our peaches,
 Citrons and dates,
 Grapes for the asking,
 Pears red with basking
 Out in the sun,
 360 Plums on their twigs;
 Pluck them and suck them,
 Pomegranates, figs."—

 "Good folk," said Lizzie,
 Mindful of Jeanie:
 365 "Give me much and many:"—
 Held out her apron,
 Tossed them her penny.
 "Nay, take a seat with us,
 Honour and eat with us," 370 They answered grinning:
 "Our feast is but beginning.
 Night yet is early,
 Warm and dew-pearly,
 Wakeful and starry:
 375 Such fruits as these
 No man can carry;
 Half their bloom would fly,
 Half their dew would dry,
 Half their flavour would pass by.
 380 Sit down and feast with us,
 Be welcome guest with us,
 Cheer you and rest with us."—
 "Thank you," said Lizzie: "But one waits
 At home alone for me:
 385 So without further parleying,
 If you will not sell me any
 Of your fruits tho' much and many,
 Give me back my silver penny
 I tossed you for a fee."—
 390 They began to scratch their pates,
 No longer wagging, purring,
 But visibly demurring,
 Grunting and snarling.
 One called her proud,
 395 Cross-grained, uncivil;
 Their tones waxed loud,
 Their looks were evil.
 Lashing their tails
 They trod and hustled her,
 400 Elbowed and jostled her,
 Clawed with their nails,

- Barking, mewing, hissing, mocking,
 Tore her gown and soiled her stocking,
 Twitched her hair out by the roots,
 405 Stamped upon her tender feet,
 Held her hands and squeezed their fruits
 Against her mouth to make her eat.
 White and golden Lizzie stood,
 Like a lily in a flood,— 410 Like a rock of blue-veined stone
 Lashed by tides obstreperously,—
 Like a beacon left alone
 In a hoary roaring sea,
 Sending up a golden fire,—
 415 Like a fruit-crowned orange-tree
 White with blossoms honey-sweet
 Sore beset by wasp and bee,—
 Like a royal virgin town
 Topped with gilded dome and spire
 420 Close beleaguered by a fleet
 Mad to tug her standard down.

 One may lead a horse to water,
 Twenty cannot make him drink.
 Tho' the goblins cuffed and caught her,
 425 Coaxed and fought her,
 Bullied and besought her,
 Scratched her, pinched her black as ink,
 Kicked and knocked her,
 Mauled and mocked her,
 430 Lizzie uttered not a word;
 Would not open lip from lip
 Lest they should cram a mouthful in:
 But laughed in heart to feel the drip
 Of juice that syrugged all her face,
 435 And lodged in dimples of her chin,
 And streaked her neck which quaked like curd.
 At last the evil people
 Worn out by her resistance
 Flung back her penny, kicked their fruit
 440 Along whichever road they took,
 Not leaving root or stone or shoot;
 Some writhed into the ground,
 Some dived into the brook
 With ring and ripple,
 445 Some scudded on the gale without a sound,
 Some vanished in the distance.
 In a smart, ache, tingle,
 Lizzie went her way;
 Knew not was it night or day;
 450 Sprang up the bank, tore thro' the furze,

Threaded copse and dingle,³
 And heard her penny jingle
 Bouncing in her purse,
 Its bounce was music to her ear.
 455 She ran and ran
 As if she feared some goblin man
 Dogged her with gibe or curse
 Or something worse:
 But not one goblin skurried after,
 460 Nor was she pricked by fear;
 The kind heart made her windy-paced
 That urged her home quite out of breath with haste
 And inward laughter.

She cried "Laura," up the garden,
 465 "Did you miss me?
 Come and kiss me.
 Never mind my bruises,
 Hug me, kiss me, suck my juices
 Squeezed from goblin fruits for you,
 470 Goblin pulp and goblin dew.
 Eat me, drink me, love me;⁴
 Laura, make much of me:
 For your sake I have braved the glen
 And had to do with goblin merchant men."

475 Laura started from her chair,
 Flung her arms up in the air,
 Clutched her hair:
 "Lizzie, Lizzie, have you tasted
 For my sake the fruit forbidden?
 480 Must your light like mine be hidden,
 Your young life like mine be wasted,
 Undone in mine undoing
 And ruined in my ruin,
 Thirsty, cankered, goblin-ridden?"—
 485 She clung about her sister,
 Kissed and kissed and kissed her:
 Tears once again
 Refreshed her shrunken eyes,
 Dropping like rain
 490 After long sultry drouth;
 Shaking with aguish⁵ fear, and pain,
 She kissed and kissed her with a hungry mouth.

Her lips began to scorch,
 That juice was wormwood⁶ to her tongue,

3. Deep wooded valley or dell. Copse: small cluster of trees.

4. Echo of Jesus's words at the Last Supper: See Mark 14.22–24 and Luke 22.19–20.

5. Feverish.

6. Bitter-tasting woody shrub sometimes used in medicine, as well as in vermouth and absinthe.

- 495 She loathed the feast:
 Writhing as one possessed she leaped and sung,
 Rent all her robe, and wrung
 Her hands in lamentable haste,
 And beat her breast.
- 500 Her locks streamed like the torch
 Borne by a racer at full speed,
 Or like the mane of horses in their flight,
 Or like an eagle when she stems the light
 Straight toward the sun,
- 505 Or like a caged thing freed,
 Or like a flying flag when armies run.

 Swift fire spread thro' her veins, knocked at her heart,
 Met the fire smouldering there
 And overbore its lesser flame;
- 510 She gorged on bitterness without a name:
 Ah! fool, to choose such part
 Of soul-consuming care!
 Sense failed in the mortal strife:
 Like the watch-tower of a town
- 515 Which an earthquake shatters down,
 Like a lightning-stricken mast,
 Like a wind-uprooted tree
 Spun about,
 Like a foam-topped waterspout
- 520 Cast down headlong in the sea,
 She fell at last;
 Pleasure past and anguish past,
 Is it death or is it life?

 Life out of death.
- 525 That night long Lizzie watched by her,
 Counted her pulse's flagging stir,
 Felt for her breath,
 Held water to her lips, and cooled her face
 With tears and fanning leaves:
- 530 But when the first birds chirped about their eaves,
 And early reapers plodded to the place
 Of golden sheaves,
 And dew-wet grass
 Bowed in the morning winds so brisk to pass,
- 535 And new buds with new day
 Opened of cup-like lilies on the stream,
 Laura awoke as from a dream,
 Laughed in the innocent old way,
 Hugged Lizzie but not⁷ twice or thrice;
- 540 Her gleaming locks showed not one thread of grey,

7. Not only.

Her breath was sweet as May
And light danced in her eyes.

Days, weeks, months, years
Afterwards, when both were wives
545 With children of their own;
Their mother-hearts beset with fears,
Their lives bound up in tender lives;
Laura would call the little ones
And tell them of her early prime,
550 Those pleasant days long gone
Of not-returning time:
Would talk about the haunted glen,
The wicked, quaint⁸ fruit-merchant men,
Their fruits like honey to the throat
555 But poison in the blood;
(Men sell not such in any town:)
Would tell them how her sister stood
In deadly peril to do her good,
And win the fiery antidote:
560 Then joining hands to little hands
Would bid them cling together,
“For there is no friend like a sister
In calm or stormy weather;
To cheer one on the tedious way,
565 To fetch one if one goes astray,
To lift one if one totters down,
To strengthen whilst one stands.”

WALLACE STEVENS

Anecdote of the Jar

I placed a jar in Tennessee,
And round it was, upon a hill.
It made the slovenly wilderness
Surround that hill.

5 The wilderness rose up to it,
And sprawled around, no longer wild.
The jar was round upon the ground
And tall and of a port in air.

It took dominion everywhere.
10 The jar was gray and bare.

8. Strange.

It did not give of bird or bush,
Like nothing else in Tennessee.

The Emperor of Ice-Cream

- Call the roller of big cigars,
The muscular one, and bid him whip
In kitchen cups concupiscent curds.⁹
Let the wenches dawdle in such dress
5 As they are used to wear, and let the boys
Bring flowers in last month's newspapers.
Let be be finale of seem.¹
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.
- Take from the dresser of deal,
10 Lacking the three glass knobs, that sheet
On which she embroidered fantails² once
And spread it so as to cover her face.
If her horny feet protrude, they come
To show how cold she is, and dumb.
15 Let the lamp affix its beam.
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

Ulysses³

- It little profits that an idle king,
By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
Matched with an aged wife,⁴ mete and dole
Unequal laws unto a savage race,
5 That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not me.

I cannot rest from travel; I will drink
Life to the lees.⁵ All times I have enjoyed

9. "The words 'concupiscent curds' have no genealogy; they are merely expressive: at least, I hope they are expressive. They express the concupiscence of life, but, by contrast with the things in relation to them in the poem, they express or accentuate life's destitution, and it is this that gives them something more than a cheap lustre" (Wallace Stevens, Letters. Edited by Holly Stevens, U of California P, 1996, p. 500).

1. "The true sense of Let be be the finale of seem is let being become the conclusion or denouement of appearing to be: in short, icecream is an absolute good. The poem is obviously not about icecream, but about being as distinguished from seeming to be" (Letters 341).

2. Fantail pigeons.

3. After the Trojan War ended, Ulysses (or Odysseus), king of Ithaca and one of the war's Greek heroes, returned to his island home (line 34). Homer's account of the situation appears in book 11 of The Odyssey, but Dante's account of Ulysses in canto 26 of the Inferno is the more immediate background of Tennyson's poem. 4. Penelope.

5. That is, all the way down to the bottom of the cup.

Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those
 That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when 10 Through scudding drifts the rainy Hyades⁶
 Vexed the dim sea. I am become a name;
 For always roaming with a hungry heart
 Much have I seen and known—cities of men
 And manners, climates, councils, governments,
 15 Myself not least, but honored of them all—
 And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
 Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
 I am a part of all that I have met;
 Yet all experience is an arch wherethrough
 20 Gleams that untraveled world, whose margin fades
 For ever and for ever when I move.
 How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
 To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
 As though to breathe were life. Life piled on life
 25 Were all too little, and of one to me
 Little remains; but every hour is saved
 From that eternal silence, something more,
 A bringer of new things; and vile it were
 For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
 30 And this gray spirit yearning in desire
 To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
 Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.

This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
 To whom I leave the scepter and the isle—
 35 Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfill
 This labor, by slow prudence to make mild
 A rugged people, and through soft degrees
 Subdue them to the useful and the good.
 Most blameless is he, centered in the sphere
 40 Of common duties, decent not to fail
 In offices of tenderness, and pay
 Meet adoration to my household gods,
 When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.

There lies the port; the vessel puffs her sail:
 45 There gloom the dark, broad seas. My mariners,
 Souls that have toiled, and wrought, and thought with me—
 That ever with a frolic welcome took
 The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
 Free hearts, free foreheads—you and I are old;
 50 Old age hath yet his honor and his toil.
 Death closes all; but something ere the end,
 Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
 Not unbecoming men that strove with Gods.
 The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks;

6. Group of stars believed to predict the rain when they rose at the same time as the sun.

- 55 The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the deep Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends,
 'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
 Push off, and sitting well in order smite
 The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
 60 To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
 Of all the western stars, until I die.
 It may be that the gulfs will wash us down;⁷
 It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,⁸
 And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
 65 Though much is taken, much abides; and though
 We are not now that strength which in old days
 Moved earth and heaven, that which we are, we are:
 One equal temper of heroic hearts,
 Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will 70 To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

WALT WHITMAN

Facing West from California's Shores

- Facing west from California's shores,
 Inquiring, tireless, seeking what is yet unfound,
 I, a child, very old, over waves, towards the house of maternity,⁹ the land of migrations, look afar,
 Look off the shores of my Western sea, the circle almost circled;
 5 For starting westward from Hindustan, from the vales of Kashmere,
 From Asia, from the north, from the God, the sage, and the hero,
 From the south, from the flowery peninsulas and the spice islands,
 Long having wander'd since, round the earth having wander'd,
 Now I face home again, very pleas'd and joyous;
 10 (But where is what I started for so long ago?
 And why is it yet unfound?)

RICHARD WILBUR

Love Calls Us to the Things of This World

- The eyes open to a cry of pulleys,
 And spirited from sleep, the astounded soul
 Hangs for a moment bodiless and simple
 As false dawn.
 5 Outside the open window
 The morning air is all awash with angels.

7. Beyond the Gulf of Gibraltar was supposed to lie a chasm that led to Hades, the underworld.

8. Elysium, the Islands of the Blessed, where heroes like Achilles (line 64) go after death.

9. Asia, as the supposed birthplace of the human race.

Some are in bed-sheets, some are in blouses,
 Some are in smocks: but truly there they are.
 Now they are rising together in calm swells
 10 Of halcyon¹ feeling, filling whatever they wear
 With the deep joy of their impersonal breathing;
 Now they are flying in place, conveying
 The terrible speed of their omnipresence, moving
 And staying like white water; and now of a sudden 15 They swoon down into so rapt a quiet
 That nobody seems to be there.

The soul shrinks

From all that it is about to remember,
 From the punctual rape of every blessed day,
 20 And cries,
 "Oh, let there be nothing on earth but laundry,
 Nothing but rosy hands in the rising steam
 And clear dances done in the sight of heaven."

Yet, as the sun acknowledges
 25 With a warm look the world's hunks and colors,
 The soul descends once more in bitter love
 To accept the waking body, saying now
 In a changed voice as the man yawns and rises,
 "Bring them down from their ruddy gallows;
 30 Let there be clean linen for the backs of thieves;
 Let lovers go fresh and sweet to be undone,
 And the heaviest nuns walk in a pure floating
 Of dark habits,
 keeping their difficult balance."

Biographical Sketches: Poets

Sketches are included for all poets represented by two or more poems.

MAYA ANGELOU (1928–2014)

Alongside the brother who nicknamed her “Maya,” St. Louis–born Marguerite Ann Johnson was raised mainly by her grandmother, in Jim Crow–era Arkansas, and by her mother, in San Francisco. Raped at age eight, she refused to speak for five years after her rapist’s murder, nurturing her love of language through the work of writers ranging from Shakespeare and Dickens to the Harlem Renaissance poets. Bearing her only son just weeks after graduating from high school, Johnson worked as short-order cook, car paint stripper, streetcar conductor, and sex worker before launching her career as dancer-singer-actress “Maya Angelou.” Though she would act and sing professionally all her life, in the 1960s Angelou also branched out, joining the Harlem Writers Guild, working as a civil-rights activist, and living briefly in Egypt and West Africa before penning (at James Baldwin’s urging) I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings (1970). The first and most acclaimed of her six memoirs, it takes its title from Paul Laurence Dunbar’s poem “Sympathy.” In 1971 Angelou made her own poetic debut, with Just Give Me a Cool Drink of Water ’fore I Diie. Though best known as an autobiographer and poet, Angelou was also an essayist; the creator of children’s books, cookbooks, and her own line of Hallmark greeting cards; a playwright, screenwriter, and composer; a film director; a teacher; and a public speaker renowned for her regal demeanor and deep, sonorous voice. Angelou’s greatest fame came well after age sixty, thanks partly to two famous fans—Oprah Winfrey, who frequently used her television show and magazine to celebrate her “mentor-mother-sister-friend,” and Bill Clinton, who, in 1993, invited Angelou to become only the second poet in American history (after Robert Frost) to recite her work at a presidential inauguration. Granted the Presidential Medal of Freedom, her nation’s highest civilian honor, some eighteen years later, Angelou once described all her writing as forwarding the same “thesis” her remarkable life arguably did: “We may encounter many defeats, but we must not be defeated.”

W. H. AUDEN (1907–73)

Wystan Hugh Auden was born in York, England, to a medical officer and a nurse. Intending at first to become a scientist, Auden studied at Oxford University, where he became the center of the “Oxford Group” of poets and leftist intellectuals. His travels during the 1930s led him to Germany, Iceland, China, Spain (where he was an ambulance driver in the civil war), and the United States (where he taught at various universities and, in 1946, became a naturalized citizen). A prolific writer of poems, plays, essays, and criticism, Auden won the Pulitzer Prize in 1948 for his collection of poems The Age of Anxiety, set in a New York City bar. Late in life he returned to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he was writer in residence. He is regarded as a masterly poet of political and intellectual conscience as well as one of the twentieth century’s greatest lyric craftsmen.

BASHŌ (1644–94)

Born Matsuo Munefusa, the second son of a low-ranking provincial samurai, the haiku poet who came to be known as Bashō at first put aside his literary interests and entered into service with the local ruling military house. In 1666, following the feudal lord’s death, Bashō left for Edo (now Tokyo), the military capital of the shogun’s new government, to pursue a career as a professional poet. He supported himself as a teacher and editor of other people's poetry but ultimately developed a following and a sizable group of students. A seasoned traveler, Bashō maintained an austere existence on the road and at home, casting himself in travel narratives such as Oku no hosomichi (The Narrow Road to the Interior, 1694) as a pilgrim devoted to nature and Zen.

ELIZABETH BISHOP (1911–79)

Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, Elizabeth Bishop endured the death of her father before she was a year old and the institutionalization of her mother four years later. Bishop was raised first by her maternal grandmother in Nova Scotia, then by her paternal grandparents back in Worcester. At Vassar College she met the poet Marianne Moore, who encouraged her to give up plans for medical school and pursue a career in poetry. Bishop traveled through Canada, Europe, and South America, finally settling in Rio de Janeiro, where she lived for nearly twenty years. Her four volumes of poetry are North and South (1946); A Cold Spring (1955), which won the Pulitzer Prize; Questions of Travel (1965); and Geography III (1976), which won the National Book Critics' Circle Award.

WILLIAM BLAKE (1757–1828)

The son of a London haberdasher and his wife, William Blake studied drawing at ten and at fourteen began a seven-year apprenticeship to an engraver. After a first book of poems, Poetical Sketches (1783), he began experimenting with what he called "illuminated printing"—the words and pictures of each page were engraved in relief on copper, which was used to print sheets that were then partly colored by hand—a laborious and time-consuming process that resulted in books of singular beauty, no two of which are exactly alike. His great Songs of Innocence and of Experience (1794) was produced in this manner, as were his increasingly mythic and prophetic books, including The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793), The Four Zoas (1803), Milton (1804), and Jerusalem (1809). Blake devoted his later life to pictorial art, illustrating Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, the Book of Job, and Dante's Divine Comedy, on which he was hard at work when he died.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)

Gwendolyn Brooks was born in Topeka, Kansas, and raised in Chicago, where she began writing poetry at the age of seven, and where she graduated from Wilson Junior College in 1936. Shortly after beginning her formal study of modern poetry at Chicago's Southside Community Art Center, Brooks produced her first book of poems, A Street in Bronzeville (1945). With her second volume, Annie Allen (1949), she became the first African American to win the Pulitzer Prize. Though her early work focused on what Langston Hughes called the "ordinary aspects of black life," during the mid-1960s she devoted her poetry to raising African American consciousness and to social activism. In 1968, she was named the Poet Laureate of Illinois; in 1985, she became the first black woman ever to serve as poetry consultant to the Library of Congress.

JUDITH ORTIZ COFER (1952–2016)

Born in Hormigueros, Puerto Rico, Judith Ortiz Cofer just two years later moved with her family, first to New Jersey and later to Georgia, experiences that would inspire much of her later fiction and poetry. "How can you inject passion and purpose into your work if it has no roots?" she asked, avowing that her own roots included a long line of women storytellers who "infected" her at a very early age with the desire to tell stories both on and off the page. After earning an MA at Florida Atlantic University (1977), Ortiz Cofer returned to Georgia, teaching at the University of Georgia for over 26 years. Among her numerous publications are The Line of the Sun (1989), a novel in which a young girl relates the history of her ne'er-do-well uncle's emigration from Puerto Rico; the poetry collection A Love Story Beginning in Spanish (2005); The Latin Deli: Prose and Poetry (1993); and the memoir In the Cruel Country: Notes for an Elegy (2015).

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772–1834)

Born in the small town of Ottery St. Mary in rural Devonshire, England, Samuel Taylor Coleridge is among the greatest and most original of the nineteenth-century Romantic poets. He wrote three of the most haunting and powerful poems in English—The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), Christabel (1816), and “Kubla Khan” (1816)—as well as immensely influential literary criticism and a treatise on biology. In 1795, in the midst of a failed experiment to establish a “Pantisocracy” (his form of ideal community), he met William Wordsworth, and in 1798 they jointly published their enormously influential Lyrical Ballads. Coleridge’s physical ailments, addiction to opium, and profound sense of despair made his life difficult and tumultuous and certainly affected his work. Still, he remains a central figure in English literature.

BILLY COLLINS (b. 1941)

Sometimes described as “the most popular poet in America,” Billy Collins enjoys the sort of celebrity status usually reserved for Hollywood actors like his friend Bill Murray, reportedly signing six-figure contracts for books in progress. As U.S. Poet Laureate (2001–03), Collins both refused to publish and hence profit from his poem “The Names,” written in honor of the victims of the 9/11 attacks, and initiated philanthropic projects like Poetry 180, aimed at exciting high schoolers’ interest in poetry. Born in New York City, Collins credits his mother with awakening his love of poetry and teaching him the importance of “reading poetry as poetry [. . .] as a set of sounds set to rhythm”—lessons reinforced by his studies at the College of Holy Cross and the University of California–Riverside. Though Collins began publishing his work in the 1980s, it wasn’t until 1991 that his book Questions About Angels thrust him into the spotlight. Since that time, he has published numerous collections, including The Art of Drowning (1995), Taking off Emily Dickinson’s Clothes (2000), Ballistics (2008), and The Rain in Portugal (2016). By his own account “unashamedly” “suburban,” “domestic,” and “middle class,” Collins’s deceptively simple poetry uses the material of the everyday to, as one reader put it, “help us feel the mystery of being alive.”

MARTHA COLLINS (b. 1940)

Nebraska-born poet, teacher, translator, and editor Martha Collins grew up in Des Moines, Iowa, the late and only child of a pharmacist who wanted her to be a doctor and of a pianist who fostered the love of music that still, she says, ensures “I usually hear the music of a poem before I begin to understand it.” In the process of earning three degrees in English literature—a Stanford BA (1962) and an MA and PhD from the University of Iowa (1965, 1971)—Collins discovered, in her words, “that I didn’t want to write about writers—I wanted to be one.” Citing as inspirations poets as diverse as Wallace Stevens, Gwendolyn Brooks, John Ashbery, and Emily Dickinson—whom, she says, “taught me to care about everything I see,” as well as “every word I write”—Collins published her first poetry collection, The Catastrophe of Rainbows, in 1985. In addition to later collections such as The Arrangement of Space (1991), Some Things Words Can Do (1998), White Papers (2012), and Day unto Day (2014), Collins’s award-winning body of work includes three books of poetry translated from the Vietnamese; Blue Front (2006), a book-length poem inspired by a lynching her father witnessed in Cairo, Illinois when he was only five; and Admit One: An American Scrapbook (2016), a history of scientific racism.

COUNTEE CULLEN (1903–46)

During his own lifetime, Countee Cullen was the most celebrated and honored poet of the Harlem Renaissance, and he claimed New York City as his birthplace. In fact, he may have been born in Louisville, Kentucky, and the circumstances of his childhood adoption by the Reverend Frederick Cullen remain obscure. It is certain, though, that the poet received a good education at New York’s DeWitt Clinton High School and then New York University. After receiving his MA at Harvard, Cullen returned to New York in 1926 and soon established himself as the leading figure in the Harlem literary world, winning numerous awards for his poetry and editing the influential monthly column “The Dark Tower” for Opportunity: Journal of Negro Life. A playwright, novelist, translator, and anthologist, Cullen is best remembered as a poet; his work is collected in My Soul’s High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance (1991).

E. E. CUMMINGS (1894–1962)

Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, the son of a Congregationalist minister, Edward Estlin Cummings attended Harvard University, where he wrote poetry in the Pre-Raphaelite and Metaphysical traditions. He joined the ambulance corps in France the day after the United States entered World War I but was imprisoned by the French due to his outspoken opposition to the war; he transmuted the experience into his first literary success, the novel The Enormous Room (1922). After the war, Cummings established himself as a poet and artist in New York City's Greenwich Village, made frequent trips to France and New Hampshire, and showed little interest in wealth or his growing celebrity. His variety of Modernism is distinguished by its playfulness, its formal experimentation, its lyrical directness, and its celebration of the individual.

EMILY DICKINSON (1830–86)

From childhood on, Emily Dickinson led a sequestered and obscure life. Yet her verse has traveled far beyond the cultured yet relatively circumscribed environment in which she lived: her room, her father's house, her family, a few close friends, and the small town of Amherst, Massachusetts. Indeed, along with Walt Whitman, her far more public contemporary, she all but invented American poetry. Born in Amherst, the daughter of a respected lawyer whom she revered ("His heart was pure and terrible," she once wrote), Dickinson studied for less than a year at the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, returning permanently to her family home. She became more and more reclusive, dressing only in white, seeing no visitors, yet working ceaselessly at her poems—nearly eighteen hundred in all, only a few of which were published during her lifetime. After her death, her sister Lavinia discovered the rest in a trunk, neatly bound into packets with blue ribbons—among the most important bodies of work in all of American literature.

JOHN DONNE (1572–1631)

The first and greatest of the English writers who came to be known as the Metaphysical poets, John Donne wrote in a revolutionary style that combined highly intellectual conceits with complex, compressed phrasing. Born into an old Roman Catholic family at a time when Catholics were subject to constant harassment and barred from many forms of employment, Donne quietly abandoned his religion and pursued a promising legal career until a politically disastrous marriage ruined his worldly hopes. He struggled for years to support a large family; impoverished and despairing, he even wrote a treatise (Biathanatos) on the lawfulness of suicide. King James (who had ambitions for him as a preacher) eventually pressured Donne to take Anglican orders in 1615, and Donne became one of the great sermonizers of his day, rising to the position of dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1621. Donne's private devotions (Meditations) were published in 1624, and he continued to write poetry until a few years before his death.

PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR (1872–1906)

The son of former slaves, Paul Laurence Dunbar was born in Dayton, Ohio. He attended a white high school, where he showed an early talent for writing and was elected class president. Unable to afford further education, he then worked as an elevator operator, writing poems and newspaper articles in his spare time. Dunbar took out a loan to subsidize the printing of his first book, Oak and Ivy (1893), but with the publication of Majors and Minors (1895) and Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896), his growing reputation enabled him to support himself by writing and lecturing. Though acclaimed during his lifetime for his lyrical use of rural black dialect in volumes such as Candle-Lightin' Time (1902), Dunbar was later criticized for adopting "white" literary conventions and for supposedly pandering to racist images of slaves and ex-slaves. He wrote novels and short stories in addition to poetry and dealt frankly with racial injustice in works such as The Sport of the Gods (1903) and The Fourth of July and Race Outrages (1903).

MARTÍN ESPADA (b. 1957)

At the age of thirteen, Martín Espada moved with his family to a Long Island neighborhood where they were the only Puerto Ricans, an experience he describes as "more traumatic than anything that ever happened to me on the so-called mean streets" of the racially diverse Brooklyn neighborhood he previously called home. By working everywhere from a bar and a ballpark to a primate lab and a transient hotel, Espada put himself through college, graduating from the University of Wisconsin–Madison with a BA in history. After earning a law degree at Northeastern University, in Boston, he went to work as a lawyer, specializing first in bilingual education, later in housing law. From age twenty, however, Espada was also writing poetry, inspired initially by a family friend's gift of both an anthology of Latin American revolutionary poetry and the prediction that "Tri tambien seras poeta" ("You will also become a poet"). Featuring barrio photos taken by his father, a community activist, Espada's first collection, The Immigrant Iceboy's Bolero, appeared in 1982. But it was his third, prize-winning book, Rebellion Is the Circle of a Lover's Hand (1990), that led the New York Times to predict he would be "the Latino poet of his generation." In the years since, Espada has done much to earn that title, securing a professorship at the University of Massachusetts–Amherst (in 1993) and publishing not only poetry collections ranging from City of Coughing and Dead Radiators (1993) to The Republic of Poetry (2006, a finalist for the Pulitzer) but also books of essays including Zapata's Disciple (1998), anthologies of Latino and Chicano poetry, and translations. What drives all that work, says Espada, is the same commitment he had as a lawyer: "to speak on behalf of" all those who lack not the ability but the "opportunity" to "speak for themselves."

ROBERT FROST (1874–1963)

Though his poetry identifies Frost with rural New England, he was born and lived to the age of eleven in San Francisco, California. Moving to New England after his father's death, Frost studied classics in high school, entered and dropped out of both Dartmouth and Harvard, and spent difficult years as an unrecognized poet before his first book, A Boy's Will (1913), was accepted and published in England. Frost's character was full of contradiction—he held "that we get forward as much by hating as by loving"—yet by the end of his long life he was one of the most honored poets of his time, as well as the most widely read. In 1961, two years before his death, he was invited to read a poem at John F. Kennedy's presidential inauguration ceremony. Frost's poems—masterfully crafted, sometimes deceptively simple—are collected in The Poetry of Robert Frost (1969).

ALLEN GINSBERG (1926–97)

After a childhood in Paterson, New Jersey, overshadowed by his mother's mental illness, Allen Ginsberg enrolled at Columbia University, intent upon following his father's advice by becoming a labor lawyer. At the center of a circle that included Lucien Carr,

Jack Kerouac, William S. Burroughs, and Neal Cassady, Ginsberg became interested in experimental poetry and alternative lifestyles. He graduated in 1948 and then joined the literary scene in San Francisco, California. In 1956, he published Howl and Other Poems, with an introduction by his mentor William Carlos Williams. The title poem, which condemns bourgeois culture and celebrates the emerging counterculture, became a manifesto for the Beat movement and catapulted Ginsberg to fame. Deeply involved in radical politics and Eastern spiritualism, Ginsberg went on to write such prose works as Declaration of Independence for Dr. Timothy Leary (1971) in addition to many volumes of poetry.

ANGELINA GRIMKÉ (1880–1958)

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, Angelina Grimké was the descendent of black slaves, white slaveholders, free blacks, and prominent white abolitionists, including her namesake, Angelina Weld Grimké. As a child, Angelina was abandoned by her white mother, whose middle-class family disapproved of her marriage to Archibald Grimké, a biracial lawyer and author who eventually became vice president of the NAACP. Grimké graduated from the Boston Normal School of Gymnastics in 1902 and then moved with her father to Washington, D.C., where she worked as a teacher and began to write poetry, essays, short stories, and plays. By the 1920s, she was publishing her work in the leading journals and anthologies of the Harlem Renaissance—The Crisis, Opportunity, Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925), Countee Cullen's Caroling Dusk (1927), and Robert Kerlin's Negro Poets and Their Poems (1928). Much of her finest writing can be found in Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké (1991).

JOY HARJO (b. 1951)

Tulsa-born author and musician Joy Harjo (née Foster) traces her affinity for aural and visual art to the women in her immediate family and to the long line of Native American leaders and orators from whom she descends. A cook and waitress with an eighth-grade education, Harjo's mother loved the poetry of William Blake, penned songs, and performed with a country swing band. Though Harjo's father—a mechanic and sheet-metal worker who battled alcoholism—abandoned the family when she and her three siblings were very young, his mother and sister were painters whose art adorned her childhood home. Intent on following in their footsteps and escaping an abusive stepfather, Harjo attended the Institute of American Indian Arts in Santa Fe, New Mexico, the boarding school where a “suicidal” teenager was, she says, first “given permission to be an Indian artist,” “given permission to be human.” She graduated in 1968, the same year she gave birth to her first child. Two years later, she became “Joy Harjo,” adopting her paternal grandmother and favorite aunt’s surname and enrolling as a member of the Muskogee Nation. A single mother of two by age 21, Harjo worked odd jobs while pursuing her education. Inspired by mentors including Simon Ortiz, she abandoned painting for poetry, publishing her first collection in 1975 and earning a BA in English at the University of New Mexico (1976) and an MFA in Creative Writing at the University of Iowa (1978). In the decades since, Harjo has emerged as among the best-known Native American voices of her generation. Her work—including some seven books of poetry, a memoir, a children’s book, and four albums—has won her honors including a Native Writers Circle of the Americas’ Lifetime Achievement Award, William Carlos Williams and Wallace Stevens poetry prizes, and a Native American Music Award for Best Female Artist of the Year.

ROBERT HAYDEN (1913–80)

Born in a Detroit ghetto, Asa Sheffey became “Robert Hayden” at eighteen months, when he was unofficially adopted by the neighbors who would raise him and whom he would remember in poems such as “Those Winter Sundays.” Inspired by the Harlem Renaissance writers he discovered as a teenager, Hayden published his first poem in 1931. Severely nearsighted, he attended Detroit City College (1932–36), thanks only to state rehabilitation grants, and worked for the Federal Writers Project (1936–39), before studying with W. H. Auden at the University of Michigan (MA, 1944). Becoming “a poet who teaches [. . .] so that he can write a poem or two now and then,” Hayden held professorships at historically black Fisk University (1946–69) and at the University of Michigan (1969–80). International acclaim came late: In 1966, Langston Hughes and seven other judges unanimously awarded Hayden the Grand Prize for Poetry at the First World Festival of Negro Arts in Senegal, Africa, and in 1976 he became the first African American appointed to the post now known as U.S. Poet Laureate. Like his masterpiece “Middle Passage” (1962), much of Hayden’s poetry aims, he said, to “correct the distortions of Afro-American history.” Yet he insisted that he was not a “black artist” but an American one. Today he is widely and rightly regarded as among the very best of both.

TERRANCE HAYES (b. 1971)

Born in Columbia, South Carolina, Terrence Hayes attended Coker College on a basketball scholarship, shifting his attention to poetry only in his senior year and going on to earn an MFA from the University of Pittsburgh (1997). His first book of poetry, Muscular Music (1999), explores popular culture’s impact on African American identity and notions of masculinity. It was followed by Hip Logic (2002), a National Poetry Series winner; Wind in a Box (2006), listed by Publishers Weekly as one of the top 100 books of 2006; and, more recently, How to Be Drawn (2015). Characterized as “an elegant and adventurous writer” whose work deftly combines humor and sincerity, Hayes has garnered numerous honors and awards, including a National Book Award for his fourth collection, Lighthouse (2010), multiple Best American Poetry selections, a Pushcart Prize, and a MacArthur Fellowship. Though he is continually drawn to questions of identity, masculinity, race, culture, and community, he “aspire[s] to a poetic style that resists style”; and indeed, his collections contain poetic forms ranging from pecha kucha, a format for Japanese business presentations, to terza rima, and adopt the voices of poets from Amiri Baraka to Dr. Seuss. Hayes teaches creative writing at the University of Pittsburgh, where he lives with his wife and fellow poet Yona Harvey and their children.

SEAMUS HEANEY (1939–2013)

Considered “the most important Irish poet since Yeats,” 1995 Nobel Prize winner Seamus Heaney grew up with his eight siblings on Mossbawn Farm in rural County Derry, Northern Ireland. At twelve, however, scholarships took Heaney first to St. Columb’s College and then Queen’s University, Belfast, where he studied Irish, Latin, and Old English. Here, too, he discovered the poetry of authors such as Ted Hughes, Patrick Kavanagh, and Robert Frost, which, he said, first taught him to “trust” in the value of that “local” childhood experience that he once “considered archaic and irrelevant to 'the modern world.'" Rural life and labor, as well as the relationship between past and present, the "archaic" and the "modern," loom large from his earliest collection, Death of a Naturalist (1966), to later ones such as District and Circle (2006). Most famous, perhaps, is North (1975), especially its sequence of poems inspired by both the ancient, yet somehow ageless, corpses discovered in Irish and Scandinavian bogs, and by the increasingly violent conflict between Protestants and Catholics in Northern Ireland. Having earned virtually all of the highest honors that a contemporary poet could, Heaney also won acclaim both as a versatile and creative translator, most famously of Beowulf (2000) and Antigone (The Burial at Thebes, 2004), and as an essayist; his Finders Keepers: Selected Prose, 1971–2001 (2002) won the Truman Capote Award for Literary Criticism, the largest annual prize of its kind. After teaching at Harvard from 1985 until 2006, Heaney lived in Dublin until his death.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS (1844–89)

The eldest of the eight children of a marine-insurance adjuster and his wife, Gerard Manley Hopkins attended Oxford University, where his ambition was to become a painter—until, at the age of twenty-two, he converted to Roman Catholicism and burned all his early poetry as too worldly. Not until after his seminary training and ordination as a Jesuit priest, in 1877, did he resume writing poetry, though he made few attempts to publish his verse, which many of his contemporaries found nearly incomprehensible. Near the end of his life, Hopkins was appointed professor of Greek at University College, Dublin, where—out of place, deeply depressed, and all but unknown—he died of typhoid. His poetry, collected and published by his friends, has been championed by modern poets, who admire its controlled tension, strong rhythm, and sheer exuberance.

LANGSTON HUGHES (1902–67)

Born in Joplin, Missouri, Langston Hughes was raised mainly by his maternal grandmother, though he lived intermittently with each of his parents. He studied at Columbia University but left to travel and work at a variety of jobs. Having already published poems in periodicals, anthologies, and his own first collection, The Weary Blues (1926), he graduated from Lincoln University; published a successful novel, Not without Laughter (1930); and became a major writer of the Harlem Renaissance. During the 1930s, he became involved in radical politics and traveled the world as a correspondent and columnist; during the 1950s, though, the FBI classified him as a security risk and limited his ability to travel. In addition to poems and novels, he wrote essays, plays, screenplays, and an autobiography; he also edited anthologies of literature and folklore.

JOHN KEATS (1795–1821)

Because John Keats was the son of a London livery stable owner and his wife, reviewers would later disparage him as a working-class "Cockney poet." At fifteen he was apprenticed to a surgeon, and at twenty-one he became a licensed pharmacist—in the same year that his first two published poems, including the sonnet "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer," appeared in The Examiner, a journal edited by radical critic-poet Leigh Hunt. Hunt introduced Keats to such literary figures as the poet Percy Bysshe Shelley and helped him publish his Poems by John Keats (1817). When his second book, the long poem Endymion (1818), was fiercely attacked by critics, Keats, suffering from a steadily worsening case of tuberculosis, knew that he would not live to realize his poetic promise. In July 1820, he published Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes; and Other Poems, which contained the poignant "To Autumn" and three other great odes: "Ode on a Grecian Urn," "Ode on Melancholy," and "Ode to a Nightingale"; early the next year, he died in Rome. In the years after Keats's death, his letters became almost as famous as his poetry.

ETHERIDGE KNIGHT (1931–91)

A native of Corinth, Mississippi, Etheridge Knight spent much of his adolescence carousing in pool halls, bars, and juke joints, developing a skillful oratorical style in an environment that prized verbal agility.

During this time, he also became addicted to narcotics. He served in the U.S. Army from 1947 to 1951; in 1960 he was sentenced to eight years in prison for robbery. At the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City, he began to write poetry and in 1968 published his first collection, Poems from Prison. After his release, Knight joined the Black Arts movement, taught at a number of universities, and published works including Black Voices from Prison (1970), Belly Song and Other Poems (1973), and Born of a Woman (1980).

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)

The first African American man to win a Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, Yusef Komunyakaa once described his life and work as a “process” of “healing” from “two places.” The first place was Bogalusa, Louisiana—the segregated rural mill town where James Willie Brown, Jr., grew up, learning “the importance of music and metaphor” from the Bible and the family radio, “the value of tools” and “precision” from a carpenter father unable to read or write. The second place was Vietnam, where twenty-one-year-old Komunyakaa—who eventually adopted the surname his great-grandparents gave up when they emigrated from Trinidad—earned a Bronze Star for meritorious wartime service. While pursuing a BA (University of Colorado, 1975), an MA (Colorado State, 1979), and an MFA (University of California–Irvine, 1980), Komunyakaa began to turn the first of these places into poetry, initially gaining recognition with the jazz- and blues-inflected collection Copacetic (1984). National acclaim came with Dien Cai Dau (1988), the book in which, twenty years after the fact, the poet finally, in his own words, stopped “writing around the war.” In the years since, Komunyakaa’s numerous collections have garnered him some of poetry’s highest honors, including a Pulitzer (for Neon Vernacular: New & Selected Poems 1977–1989 [1994]), the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize (2001), and the Wallace Stevens Award (2011). Today Global Distinguished Professor of English at New York University, Komunyakaa is also the editor of two jazz poetry anthologies; cotranslator (with Martha Collins) of Vietnamese poet Nguyen Quan Thieu’s The Insomnia of Fire (1995); and author of Blue Notes: Essays, Interviews & Commentaries (2000) and, with Chad Gracia, of Gilgamesh: A Verse Play (2006).

PHILIP LARKIN (1922–85)

Postwar England’s most widely known and popular poet, so-called “laureate of the common man” Philip Larkin endured what he later described as a boring childhood as the second, belated, rather shy—because also nearsighted and stuttering—child of Coventry’s city treasurer. Exempted from service in World War II because of his eyesight, Larkin graduated from Oxford in 1943 and became a librarian, mainly at Hull, where he headed the university library for thirty years (1955–85). Larkin credited his rediscovery of Thomas Hardy’s poetry with “cur[ing]” him of the Yeatsian “Celtic fever” of his first collection, The North Ship (1945), and helping him to develop the mature style debuted in his second, The Less Deceived (1955). This critically acclaimed book made Larkin the undisputed leading light of “the Movement,” a group of young poets who rejected the enigmatic, allusive, and—in their eyes—elitist modernism of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound in favor of a more straightforward and robust, if also skeptical and ironic, style. Notoriously publicity averse, Larkin declined the position of Poet Laureate of the United Kingdom just a year before his death. In his lifetime, he published only two other volumes of verse, The Whitsun Weddings (1964) and High Windows (1974); two novels, Jill (1946) and A Girl in Winter (1947); All What Jazz (1970), a collection of jazz reviews originally written for the Daily Telegraph; and the best-selling Required Writing: Miscellaneous Pieces 1955–1982 (1983).

AMIT MAJMUDAR (b. 1979)

A diagnostic nuclear radiologist, Ohio’s first-ever Poet Laureate, and the son of Indian immigrants (both doctors), Amit Majmudar grew up mainly in and around Cleveland, Ohio, “bec[oming],” he says, “a citizen of the library,” most “at ease [. . .] in a crowd of books.” With a BS from the University of Akron and an MD from Northeast Ohio Medical University, Majmudar is, as a writer, entirely self-taught. (As he puts it, “My [only] teachers have been dead poets, mostly, and no one dead poet in particular.”) Majmudar’s poetry collections include 0°, 0° (2009), a finalist for the Poetry Society of America’s Norma Farber First Book Award; Heaven and Earth (2011), selected by A. E. Stallings for a Donald Justice prize; and Dothead (2016), a book tackling, as one reviewer aptly observes, every topic from “Adam and Eve’s sex life” and “the art of the semi-colon” to “T.S.A. security lines” and the 2012 Sandy Hook school shooting. Majmudar has also won praise for his fiction, especially the novels Partitions (2011), about four characters caught up in the 1947 partition of India and Pakistan, and The Abundance (2013), about an Indian American family coping with the terminal illness of their wife/mother/grandmother. A married father of three, Majmudar sees his two primary vocations as united by the search for patterns: As a radiologist, he explains in an NPR interview, “what I do is I recognize the patterns of disease” as revealed in “X-rays, CT scans, PET scans”; then, “when I go home and write [. . .], I’m basically creating patterns in language,” working with its “mathematical, musical aspect” to “quicke[n] it into poetry.”

CLAUDE MCKAY (1889–1948)

Festus Claudius McKay was born and raised in Sunny Ville, Clarendon Parish, Jamaica, the youngest of eleven children. He worked as a wheelwright and cabinetmaker, then briefly as a police constable, before writing and publishing two books of poetry in Jamaican dialect. In 1912, he emigrated to the United States, where he attended Booker T. Washington’s Tuskegee Institute in Alabama and studied agricultural science at Kansas State College before moving to New York City. McKay supported himself through various jobs while becoming a prominent literary and political figure. The oldest Harlem Renaissance writer, McKay was also the first to publish, with the poetry collection Harlem Shadows (1922). His other works include the novels Home to Harlem (1928) and Banana Bottom (1933) and his autobiography, A Long Way from Home (1937).

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY (1892–1950)

Born in Rockland, Maine, Edna St. Vincent Millay published her first poem at twenty, her first poetry collection at twenty-five. After graduating from Vassar College, she moved to New York City’s Greenwich Village, where she both gained a reputation as a brilliant poet and became notorious for her bohemian lifestyle and her association with prominent artists, writers, and radicals. In 1923, she won the Pulitzer Prize for her collection The Ballad of the Harp-Weaver; in 1925, growing weary of fame, she and her husband moved to Austerlitz, New York, where she lived for the rest of her life. Although her work fell out of favor with mid-twentieth-century Modernists, who rejected her formalism as old-fashioned, her poetry—witty, acerbic, and superbly crafted—has found many new admirers today.

PAT MORA (b. 1942)

Born to Mexican American parents in El Paso, Texas, Pat Mora earned a BA and an MA from the University of Texas at El Paso. She has been a consultant on U.S.-Mexico youth exchanges; a museum director and administrator at her alma mater; and a teacher of English at all levels. Her poetry—collected in Chants (1985), Borders (1986), Communion (1991), Agua Santa (1995), Aunt Carmen’s Book of Practical Saints (1997), and Adobe Odes (2006)—reflects and addresses her Chicana and southwestern background. Mora’s other publications include Nepantla: Essays from the Land in the Middle (1993); a family memoir, House of Houses (1997); and many works for children and young adults.

HOWARD NEMEROV (1920–91)

Howard Nemerov grew up in New York City, part of a wealthy and cultured Jewish family of Russian descent that included his parents (owners of a department store) and two younger sisters, famed photographer Diane Arbus and sculptor Renée Sparkia. Graduating from Harvard in the middle of World War II, Nemerov served first in the Royal Canadian Air Force, later in the U.S. Air Force (1942–45). The first of his many poetry collections, The Image and the Law, appeared in 1947; his first novel, The Melodramatists, was published a year later. Nemerov taught at various U.S. colleges and universities, spending the last two-plus decades of his life at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri, which in 1999 named a dormitory in his honor. But Nemerov was no stranger to honors: A married father of three sons, he served as poetry consultant to the Library of Congress (1963–64) and as U.S. Poet Laureate (1988–90); his Collected Poems (1977) netted a National Book Award and both the Pulitzer and Bollingen prizes; ten years later he received the National Medal of Arts; and his legacy lives on in the annual Howard Nemerov Sonnet Award, established in 1994. Dubbed by some a “formalist” and prized by many for his wit, Nemerov defies easy classification: Novelist Joyce Carol Oates famously hailed him as a “romantic, realist, comedian, satirist, relentless and indefatigable brooder upon the most ancient mysteries.” In his own self-reflective 1966 essay “Attentiveness and Obedience,” Nemerov cites T. S. Eliot and John Donne as major influences, from whom he learned “irony, difficulty, erudition.” Yet “I now,” he goes on to insist, “regard simplicity and the appearance of ease in the measure as primary values.”

SHARON OLDS (b. 1942)

Born in San Francisco, California; raised in nearby Berkeley by fiercely religious, yet troubled parents; and educated at Stanford (BA, 1964) and Columbia (PhD, 1972) universities (where she wrote a dissertation on Ralph Waldo Emerson), poet Sharon Olds was thirty-seven when she published her first book of poetry, Satan Says, in 1981. Since then, she has come to rank as one of America's most important living poets, garnering National Book Critics' Circle Awards for her 1984 collection The Dead and the Living and for Strike Spark: Selected Poems (2002). In 2013, she became the first woman to win the T. S. Eliot Prize for Poetry, for Stag's Leap, a collection that also earned a Pulitzer. Like the work of two writers to whom Olds is often compared, Walt Whitman and Sylvia Plath, however, hers has consistently provoked controversy, thanks mainly to its unflinching attention to, and distinctly female perspective on, the pleasures and pains of both the human body and the family, as well as emotional and physical violence. The Dead and the Living is divided between “Poems for the Living,” about the poet's experience as daughter and mother, and “Poems for the Dead,” about the victims of international conflicts; The Father (1992) chronicles her father's death (from cancer), One Secret Thing (2008), her mother's. Stag's Leap (2013) deals with the disintegration of her thirty-two-year marriage. As famous for her reticence off the page as for her candor on it, Olds teaches creative writing at New York University.

WILFRED OWEN (1893–1918)

Born in Oswestry, Shropshire, England, Wilfred Owen left school in 1911, having failed to win a scholarship to London University. He served as assistant to a vicar in Oxfordshire until 1913, when he left to teach English at a Berlitz school in Bordeaux. In 1915, Owen returned to England to enlist in the army and was sent to the front lines in France. Suffering from shell shock two years later, he was evacuated to Craiglockhart War Hospital, where he met the poets Siegfried Sassoon and Robert Graves. Five of Owen's poems were published in 1918, the year he returned to combat; he was killed in battle one week before the signing of the armistice. His poems, which portray the horror of trench warfare and satirize the unthinking patriotism of those who cheered the war from their armchairs, are collected in the two-volume Complete Poems and Fragments (1983).

DOROTHY PARKER (1893–1967)

Born in West End, New Jersey, Dorothy Rothschild worked for both Vogue and Vanity Fair magazines before becoming a freelance writer. In 1917, she married Edwin Pond Parker II, whom she divorced in 1928. Her first book of verse, Enough Rope (1926), was a best seller and was followed by Sunset Gun (1928), Death and Taxes (1931), and Collected Poems: Not So Deep as a Well (1936). In 1927, Parker became a book reviewer for the New Yorker, to which she contributed for most of her career. In 1933, Parker and her second husband, Alan Campbell, moved to Hollywood, where they collaborated as film writers. In addition, Parker wrote criticism, two plays, short stories, and news reports from the Spanish Civil War. She is probably best remembered, though, as the reigning wit at the “Round Table” at Manhattan's Algonquin Hotel, where, in the 1920s and 1930s, she traded barbs with other prominent writers and humorists.

LINDA PASTAN (b. 1932)

Linda Pastan was born in New York City and raised in nearby Westchester County. After graduating from Radcliffe College, she received an MA in literature from Brandeis University. Although her first published poems appeared in Mademoiselle magazine in 1955, Pastan spent many years concentrating on her husband and three children—indeed, much of her poetry deals with her own family life. Her many collections include A Perfect Circle of Sun (1971), The Five Stages of Grief (1978), American Book Award nominee PM/AM: New and Selected Poems (1982), Carnival Evening: New and Selected Poems 1968–1998 (1998), Traveling Light (2011), and Insomnia (2015). She lives in Potomac, Maryland.

SYLVIA PLATH (1932–63)

Sylvia Plath was born in Boston, Massachusetts; her father, a Polish immigrant, died when she was eight. After graduating from Smith College, Plath attended Cambridge University on a Fulbright scholarship, and there she met and married English poet Ted Hughes, with whom she had two children. As she documented in her novel The Bell Jar (1963), in 1953—between her junior and senior years of college—Plath became seriously depressed, attempted suicide, and was hospitalized. In 1963, the breakup of her marriage led to another suicide attempt, this time successful. Plath has attained cult status as much for her poems as for her “martyrdom” to art and life. In addition to her first volume of poetry, The Colossus (1960), Plath’s work has been collected in Ariel (1966), Crossing the Water (1971), and Winter Trees (1972). Her selected letters were published in 1975; her expurgated journals in 1983; and her unabridged journals in 2000.

ALEXANDER POPE (1688–1744)

Son of a wealthy merchant, London-born Alexander Pope managed to become the greatest poet of his age, one of the most accomplished versifiers and satirists in English literary history, and the first British writer to make his living entirely by his pen despite—or, rather, thanks to—two obvious handicaps. One, tuberculosis of the spine, contracted in infancy, ensured that Pope was, in the words of his contemporaries, only “about four feet six high; very humpbacked and deformed,” plagued with “the headache four days in a week, and [. . .] sick [. . .] the other three.” Two, as a Roman Catholic, Pope was legally debarred from voting or holding public office, inheriting or purchasing land, living within ten miles of London, or attending any of England’s so-called public schools or universities. Largely self-taught and unable to rely on patronage, the pugnacious, politically conservative Pope launched his career with poems celebrating natural beauty and love (Pastorals [1709] and Windsor Forest [1713]) but leapt to fame with two book-length poems in a very different spirit—the didactic An Essay on Criticism (1711) and the brilliant mock epic The Rape of the Lock (1712, 1714). Made wealthy by his translations of Homer’s Iliad (1720) and Odyssey (1726), Pope retired to a five-acre villa in Twickenham, outside London. By the time of his death at age fifty-six, he had produced an unrivaled body of work that includes at least two other masterpieces, the merciless satire The Dunciad (1728) and the philosophical verse-treatise An Essay on Man (1734).

EZRA POUND (1885–1972)

Born in Hailey, Idaho, Ezra Pound studied at the University of Pennsylvania and Hamilton College before traveling to Europe in 1908. He remained there, living in Ireland, England, France, and Italy, for much of his life. Pound’s tremendous ambition—to succeed in his own work and to influence the development of poetry and Western culture in general—led him to found the Imagist school of poetry, to advise and assist many great writers (Eliot, Joyce, Williams, Frost, and Hemingway, to name a few), and to write a number of highly influential critical works. His increasingly fiery and erratic behavior led to a charge of treason (he served as a propagandist for Italian Fascist Benito Mussolini during World War II), a diagnosis of insanity, and twelve years at St. Elizabeth’s, an institution for the criminally insane.

ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)

One of the foremost poets and public intellectuals of her time, Adrienne Rich was born in Baltimore, Maryland, daughter of a former concert pianist and of a renowned Johns Hopkins University pathologist.

Rich’s career as a poet began in 1951, when the Radcliffe College senior’s first volume, A Change of World (1951), was selected by W. H. Auden for the prestigious Yale Younger Poets Award. Two years later, Rich married Harvard economist Alfred Conrad, with whom she had three children. As the 1950s gave way to the 1960s and 1970s, Rich’s life and work changed profoundly. Beginning with her 1963 collection, Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law, her poetry became ever less tightly controlled and formal, as it became ever more politically and personally charged, reflecting her deep engagement with the feminist, antiwar, and civil rights movements. After her recently estranged husband’s suicide (1970) and publication of the National Book Award-winning Diving into the Wreck (1974), Rich began a lifelong partnership with Jamaica-born novelist and editor Michelle Cliff and published her two most influential prose works, Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Experience and Institution (1976) and On Lies, Secrets and Silence (1979), which includes her landmark essay “Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence.” In the decades that followed, Rich never rested on her countless laurels, fiercely pursuing both her craft and her work for social justice. Her thirtieth and last volume of verse, Tonight No Poetry Will Serve, came out in 2010, just two years before her death, at age eighty-two, from the rheumatoid arthritis she had battled for decades. In its obituary, the New York Times aptly dubbed her “a poet of towering reputation,” whose work is “distinguished by an unswerving progressive vision and a dazzling, empathetic ferocity.”

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI (1830–94)

Ranking with Emily Dickinson and Elizabeth Barrett Browning as among the nineteenth century's most important women poets, Christina Rossetti spent her outwardly uneventful life in London, part of a uniquely talented family. Her father, an Italian political exile, was a poet, Dante scholar, and Italian professor, her mother an Anglo-Italian former governess. Rossetti's older sister and youngest brother ultimately became distinguished literature and art critics, and her eldest brother, Dante Gabriel, an influential painter-poet. According to her brother, Christina composed her first poem before she was old enough to write and was, as a girl, so “vivacious, and open to pleasurable impressions” that everyone expected her to “develop into a woman [. . .] fond of society and diversions, and taking a part in them of more than average brilliancy.” Yet “[w]hat came to pass was [. . .] quite the contrary.” In the 1840s, the illness and virtual blindness of the teenaged Rossetti's father rendered her family's financial situation precarious; her own health broke down, and she became much more devout. For the rest of her life, Rossetti battled illness and sin in equal measure. Seeking to adhere strictly to her Protestant faith, she refused to marry any of her various suitors, eschewed once-loved “diversions” such as opera, and undertook volunteer work, including ten years at the St. Mary Magdalene Penitentiary, a charitable institution dedicated to the reform of so-called fallen or ruined women. All the while, however, Rossetti kept writing and publishing, producing a remarkable body of poetry including lyrics, devotional verse, narrative fables, and ballads. Her first and best-known book, Goblin Market and Other Poems, appeared in 1862.

KAY RYAN (b. 1945)

Described by poet J. D. McClatchy as “compact, exhilarating, strange affairs” full of sly wordplay and wit, Kay Ryan's poems are often compared to Emily Dickinson's. Like Dickinson, says Jack Foley, “Ryan can certainly be funny, but it is rarely without a sting.” Typically less than 20 lines long and with lines often containing six syllables or less, Ryan's poems tend to have what she calls “the most dangerous shape,” one in which “nearly every word is on one edge or the other” and “you can't hide anything” because “[a]ny crap is going to show.” U.S. Poet Laureate from 2008 to 2010 and winner of both a Pulitzer Prize for Poetry and a MacArthur Fellowship, Ryan earned such accolades the hard way. Raised in California's Mojave Desert and San Joaquin Valley by her oil-well-driller father and once rejected from the poetry club at UCLA, where she earned both BA (1967) and MA (1968) degrees in English, Ryan began teaching remedial English at the College of Marin in 1971, receiving widespread recognition for her poetry only some twenty years later. “All of us want instant success,” she has said. “I'm glad I was on a sort of slow drip.” This “drip” has produced over seven volumes, including Say Uncle (2000), The Best of It: New and Selected Poems (2010), and Erratic Facts (2015). In 2009 Ryan was widowed by the death of Carol Adair, her partner of over thirty years. Although she is sometimes accused of being too apolitical by members of the gay community, Ryan's thirty-plus years at Marin have made her a strong and vocal advocate of what she describes as America's “much underpraised and underfunded community colleges.”

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1554–1616)

Considering the great fame of his work, surprisingly little is known of William Shakespeare's life. Between 1585 and 1592, he left his birthplace of Stratford-upon-Avon for London to begin a career as playwright and actor. No dates of his professional career are recorded, however, nor can the order in which he composed his plays and poems be determined with absolute certainty. By 1594, he had established himself as a poet with two long works—Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece—and his more than 150 sonnets are supreme expressions of the form. His reputation, though, rests on the works he wrote for the theater. Shakespeare produced perhaps thirty-five plays in twenty-five years, proving himself a master of every dramatic genre: tragedy (in works such as Macbeth, Hamlet, King Lear, and Othello); historical drama (for example, Richard III and Henry IV); comedy (Twelfth Night, As You Like It, and many more); and romance (in plays such as The Tempest and Cymbeline). Without question, Shakespeare is the most quoted, discussed, and beloved English writer.

TRACY K. SMITH (b. 1972)

Pulitzer Prize-winning poet Tracy K. Smith credits her “love of language” and “sense of [. . .] hearing voices and imagining the lives inside” them to her parents—a mother who was also a teacher with a great “gift for storytelling and mimicry” and an optical-engineer father who “was always reading and pushing us to read.” Though raised with her four older siblings mainly in California, Smith has spent much of her life in the Northeast: Born in Massachusetts, she returned there to attend Harvard (BA, 1994), studying with Seamus Heaney, while also—like fellow poets Natasha Trethewey and Kevin Young—participating in the Boston-based writers’ group/reading series known as the Dark Room Collective. Grieving her mother’s death from cancer, Smith nonetheless moved on to Columbia University, earning her MFA in 1997. Today a mother of three and professor of creative writing at Princeton University, Smith won rave reviews and multiple awards for her first two collections—The Body’s Question (2003), which she describes as “grappling with the idea of the body as a site for experience, memory, and loss,” “discovery and joy,” and Duende (2007)—and for her 2015 memoir (Ordinary Light), which takes its epigraph from James Baldwin’s “Sonny’s Blues.” But what earned her a Pulitzer and secured her reputation as one of America’s most innovative and exciting young poets was Life on Mars (2011), a collection shaped equally by grief over her father’s death, his work on the Hubble Space Telescope, and her interest in exploring (with nods to David Bowie and 2001: A Space Odyssey) “space” and humans’ enduring fascination with—and fantasies about—space “as a kind of metaphor through which to consider some of the facts and problems of life here on Earth.” Smith became U.S. Poet Laureate in September 2017.

A. E. STALLINGS (b. 1968)

Alicia Elsbeth Stallings’s biography—which could be titled All the Way from Athens to Athens—is an unusual one for a contemporary American poet. Admittedly, this daughter of a librarian and a Georgia Tech professor grew up in a bookish home, publishing her first poem—in Seventeen magazine—at age sixteen. But at the University of Georgia (in Athens, Georgia) and, later, Oxford University (in England), where she earned her MA, Stallings chose to study not English but ancient Greek and Latin language and literature, inspired, as she explains, both by a love of mythology rooted in a fascination with fairy tales and by her awareness that “the English poets whom [she] admired” most—including T. S. Eliot and A. E. Housman—“had studied the Classics and not English, which wasn’t even a discipline then.” Unlike most of her peers, moreover, Stallings has taught writing but never held a full-time academic post. And she has lived abroad—in Athens, Greece—since her 1999 marriage. Published the same year, Stallings’s Richard Wilbur Award-winning first collection, Archaic Smile, nonetheless assured her reputation as among America’s foremost contemporary “New Formalists,” a label simultaneously affirmed and greatly complicated by her later collections, Hapax (2006) and Olives (2012); by essays such as “Crooked Roads without Improvement: Some Thoughts on Formal Verse” (2000); and by her Poetry Foundation-sponsored blog Harriet (2007–08). Also a prize-winning translator of poets ranging from Lucretius (99–55 BCE) and Plutarch (46–120 CE) to Angelos Sikelianos (1884–1951), Stallings has garnered numerous highly coveted honors, ranging from a Nemerov Sonnet Award (2004) to a MacArthur Foundation “genius grant” (2011). Despite all that, she is, by her own report, known in Greece simply as “Alikí Psaropoulou, wife of Yannis, mother of Jason and Atalanta,” thus enjoying an oddly “freeing” sort of “invisibility.”

WALLACE STEVENS (1879–1955)

Born and raised in Reading, Pennsylvania, Wallace Stevens attended Harvard University and New York Law School. In New York City, he worked for a number of law firms, published poems in magazines, and befriended such literary figures as William Carlos Williams and Marianne Moore. In 1916, Stevens moved to Connecticut and began working for the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company, where he became a vice president in 1934 and where he worked for the rest of his life, writing poetry at night and during vacations. He published his first collection, Harmonium, in 1923 and followed it with a series of volumes from 1935 until 1950, establishing himself as one of the twentieth century's most important poets. His lectures were collected in The Necessary Angel: Essays on Reality and Imagination (1951); his Collected Poems appeared in 1954.

ADRIENNE SU (b. 1967)

Adrienne Su grew up in Atlanta, Georgia, unaware, she says, of the ironies involved in being “viewed as Chinese,” while “I knew no Chinese and thrived on the study of Latin.” A graduate of Harvard and the University of Virginia, where she studied with Rita Dove, Gregory Orr, and Charles Wright, Su, by her own account, “started writing as soon as I could form a sentence on paper” and “started sending out work” while still in high school. Having worked as a freelance editor and writer, Su is today an associate professor of English and poet in residence at Pennsylvania’s Dickinson College; a wife and mother; and the author of poetry collections including Middle Kingdom (1997), Sanctuary (2006), Having None of It (2009), and Living Quarters (2015). Crediting her high school Latin teacher and the ancient Roman poet Virgil with first teaching her the art of meter, and her early involvement in poetry slams with bolstering her commitment to writing “poems that on some levels can be read by anyone,” Su also, in her words, “prefer[s] the daily to the exotic as subject matter,” seeing writing as best when “it’s woven into everyday life, as a ritual that fits somewhere between making pancakes for my kids and preparing a class for college students.”

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON (1809–92)

The most popular and important of the Victorian poets, Alfred, Lord Tennyson demonstrated his talents at an early age; he published his first volume in 1827. Encouraged to devote his life to poetry by a group of undergraduates at Cambridge University known as the “Apostles,” Tennyson was particularly close to Arthur Hallam, whose sudden death in 1833 inspired the long elegy In Memoriam (1850). With that poem he achieved lasting fame and recognition; he was appointed Poet Laureate the year of its publication, succeeding William Wordsworth. Despite the great popularity of his “journalistic” poems—“The Charge of the Light Brigade” (1854) is perhaps the best known—Tennyson’s great theme was the past, both personal (In the Valley of Caunteretz, 1864) and national (Idylls of the King, 1869). Tennyson was made a baron in 1884; when he died, eight years later, he was buried in Poets’ Corner in London’s Westminster Abbey.

NATASHA TRETHEWEY (b. 1966)

Daughter of a social worker and a Canadian poet who met at a Kentucky college, but who had to marry in Ohio because of laws banning interracial unions, Natasha Trethewey was born in her mother’s hometown of Gulfport, Mississippi. After her parents’ divorce, she lived with her mother in Atlanta, Georgia, summering on the Gulf Coast with both her father and her mother’s family. In 1985, Trethewey was just beginning her studies at the University of Georgia when her stepfather murdered her mother. Turning to poetry to deal with her grief, Trethewey earned her BA in 1989; an MA from Virginia’s Hollins College, where her father was a professor (1991); and an MFA from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst (1995). After a short stint teaching at Auburn University, Trethewey moved to Emory University and, in 2007, became only the fourth African American poet ever to win the Pulitzer Prize, for Native Guard. Her third collection, it explores the problem of individual and collective historical amnesia through elegies to her mother and a ten-sonnet sequence written from the perspective of a soldier in the first all-black regiment to fight on the Union side in the Civil War. The years 2007–08, however, also brought Trethewey loss and hardship when her brother was imprisoned on drug-related charges and her beloved grandmother died. Interweaving poetry, essays, and letters, her memoir Beyond Katrina: A Meditation on the Mississippi Gulf Coast (2010) reflects on both the region and her family’s efforts to remember and rebuild. Trethewey’s most recent collection is Thrall (2012).

WALT WHITMAN (1819–92)

Walt Whitman was born on a farm in West Hills, Long Island, to a British father and a Dutch mother. After working as a journalist throughout New York for many years, he taught for a time and founded his own newspaper, The Long Islander, in 1838; he then left journalism to work on Leaves of Grass, originally intended as a poetic treatise on American democratic idealism. Published privately in multiple editions from 1855 to 1874, the book of poems at first failed to reach a mass audience. In 1881, Boston's Osgood and Company published another edition of Leaves of Grass, which sold well until the district attorney called it "obscene literature" and stipulated that Whitman remove certain poems and phrases. He refused, and it was many years before his works were again published, this time in Philadelphia. By the time Whitman died, his work was revered, as it still is today, for its greatness of spirit and its exuberant American voice.

RICHARD WILBUR (1921–2017)

The son of a painter and a newspaperman's daughter, former U.S. Poet Laureate Richard Wilbur was raised in rural New Jersey, a background that may help to explain his precise imagery and keen interest in nature. Graduating from Amherst College into a world at war, Wilbur in 1942 married the woman who would remain his wife for over sixty years, joined the army, and, by his own account, began to "versify in earnest" because "[o]ne does not use poetry [. . .] as a means to organize oneself and the world, until one's world somehow gets out of hand." The many collections Wilbur published between his first, The Beautiful Changes and Other Poems (1947), and The Nutcracker (2012) include two Pulitzer Prize winners: Things of This World (1956) and New and Collected Poems (1988). In recent decades Wilbur's poems have been increasingly lauded for the very qualities that drew criticism in the thirty years between his two Pulitzer Prizes: As critic Gerry Cunningham wittily puts it, "They never raise their voices, put knives to their throats, drink too much, tell dirty jokes, or take their clothes off in public." Using traditional patterns of rhyme and meter, they "acknowledge horror," but remain largely "untouched by it."

Born in Rutherford, New Jersey, William Carlos Williams attended school in Switzerland and New York and studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Leipzig in Germany. He spent most of his life in Rutherford, practicing medicine and gradually establishing himself as one of America's great poets. Early in his writing career he left the European-inspired Imagist movement in favor of a more uniquely American poetic style comprised of vital, local language, and "no ideas but in things." His shorter poems have been published in numerous collected editions, including the Pulitzer Prize-winning Brueghel, and Other Poems (1963); his five-volume philosophical poem, Paterson, was published in 1963. Among his other works are plays such as A Dream of Love (1948) and Many Loves (1950); a trilogy of novels—White Mules (1937), In the Money (1940), and The Build-Up (1952); his Autobiography (1951); his Selected Essays (1954); and his Selected Letters (1957).

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH (1770–1850)

Regarded by many as the greatest of the Romantic poets, William Wordsworth was born in Cocker-mouth in the English Lake District, a beautiful, mountainous region that his poetry helped make a popular tourist destination even in his own lifetime. He studied at Cambridge University and then spent a year in France, hoping to witness the French Revolution firsthand; as the revolution's "glorious renovation" dissolved into anarchy and then tyranny, Wordsworth was forced to return to England. Remarkably, he managed to establish "a saving intercourse with my true self" and to write some of his finest poetry, including the early version of his autobiographical masterpiece, The Prelude, which first appeared in 1805 and then again, much altered, in 1850. In 1798, Wordsworth and his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge published Lyrical Ballads, which contained many of their greatest poems and is widely considered the founding document of English Romanticism. Revered by the reading public, Wordsworth served as Poet Laureate from 1843 until his death in 1850.

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS (1865–1939)

William Butler Yeats was born in Dublin, Ireland, and, though he spent most of his youth in London, became the preeminent Irish poet of the twentieth century. Immersed in Irish history, folklore, and politics, as well as spiritualism and the occult, he attended art school for a time but left to devote himself to poetry that was, early in his career, self-consciously dreamy and ethereal. Yeats's poems became tighter and more passionate with his reading of philosophers such as Nietzsche, his involvement (mainly through theater) with the Irish nationalist cause, and his desperate love for the actress and nationalist Maud Gonne. He was briefly a senator in the newly independent Irish government before withdrawing from active public life to Thoor Ballylee, a crumbling Norman tower that Yeats and his wife fashioned into a home. There he developed an elaborate mythology (published as A Vision in 1925) and wrote poems that explored fundamental questions of history and identity. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1923.

KEVIN YOUNG (b. 1970)

Poet Kevin Young was born in Lincoln, Nebraska, and grew up mainly in the Midwest, before heading east to Harvard University. There, he took courses with Seamus Heaney, participated—alongside Natasha Trethewey—in the influential Dark Room Collective, and wrote many of the poems that would eventually make up his first, award-winning collection (Most Way Home, 1995) on the way to earning a BA in English and American literature (1992). Shuttling between coasts, Young spent two years at Stanford University, in Northern California, before completing his MFA at Brown, in Rhode Island. As poems like “Ode to Pork” attest, however, Young also has deep Southern roots. Both his mother—among the first black women to earn a PhD (in chemistry) from the University of Nebraska—and his father—an ophthalmologist who was also an avid hunter and cook—grew up in rural Louisiana, where much of Young's extended family still lives. Since 2005, when he married editor Kate Tuttle, Young has lived mainly in Atlanta, Georgia, where he currently serves as Charles Howard Candler Professor of English and Creative Writing at Emory University. Young's diverse collections of verse include Black Maria (2005), about fictional private eye A. K. A. Jones; Ardency (2011), about the real-life Africans who managed to wrest control of the slave ship Amistad in 1839; Book of Hours (2014), which moves from poems grappling with his father's 2004 death, in a hunting accident, to those inspired by the birth of Young's first son some two years later; and Blue Laws: Selected and Uncollected Poems 1995–2015 (2016).

PART THREE Drama

Lorraine Hansberry

25 | DRAMA: READING, RESPONDING, WRITING

Many cultures have had oral literatures: histories, romances, poems to be recited or sung. Our own era has its share of oral art forms, of course, but “literary” fiction and poetry are now most often read privately, silently, from the printed page. Most contemporary fiction writers and poets write with an understanding that their work will be experienced and enjoyed this way.

In contrast, drama is written primarily to be performed—by actors, on a stage, for an audience. Playwrights or dramatists (the two terms are used interchangeably) work with an understanding that the words on the page are just the first step—a map of sorts—toward the ultimate goal: a collaborative, publicly performed work of art. They create plays fully aware of the possibilities that go beyond printed words and extend to physical actions, stage devices, and other theatrical techniques for creating effects and modifying audience responses. Although the script of a play may be the most essential piece in the puzzle that makes up the final work of art, the play text is not the final, complete work.

To attend a play—that is, to be part of an audience—represents a very different kind of experience from the usually solitary act of reading. On the stage, real human beings, standing for imaginary characters, deliver lines and perform actions for you to see and hear. In turn, the actors adapt in subtle ways to the reactions of the people who attend the performance and whose responses are no longer wholly private but have become, in part, communal.

When you attend the performance of a play, then, you become a collaborator in the creation of a unique work of art: not the play text but instead a specific interpretation of that text. No two performances of a play can ever be identical, just as no two interpretations of a play can be exactly the same.

READING DRAMA

In many respects, of course, reading drama is similar to reading fiction. In both cases we anticipate what will happen next; we imagine the characters, settings, and actions; we respond to the symbolic suggestiveness of images; and we identify themes. But because most plays are written to be performed, reading plays is also somewhat different from reading fiction or poetry. In fiction, for example, there is a mediator or narrator, someone standing between us and the events. In contrast, drama rarely has such an interpreter or mediator to tell us what is happening or to shape our responses. Play texts instead rely on stage directions (the italicized descriptions of the set, characters, and actions), while exposition (the explanation of the past and current situation) emerges only here and there through dialogue.

For this reason, reading drama may place a greater demand on the imagination than reading fiction does: The reader must be his or her own narrator and interpreter.

Such exercise for the imagination can prove rewarding, however, for it has much in common with the imaginative work that a director, actors, and other artists involved in a staged production do. In re-creating a play as we read it, we are essentially imagining the play as if it were being performed by live actors in real time. We “cast” the characters, we design the set with its furniture and props, and we choreograph or “block” the physical action, according to the cues in the text.

In reading drama even more than in reading fiction, we construct our ideas of character and personality from what characters say. In some plays, especially those with a modernist or experimental bent, certain lines of dialogue can be mystifying; other characters, as well as the audience or readers, can be left wondering what a speech means. On the one hand, such puzzling lines can become clearer in performance when we see and hear actors deliver them. On the other hand, plays that call for several characters to speak at once or to talk at cross purposes can be much easier to understand when read than they are in performance. In interpreting dialogue, you will naturally draw on your own experiences of comparable situations or similar personalities, as well as your familiarity with other plays or stories.

Questions to Ask When Reading a Play

In reading drama as in reading fiction, you can begin to understand a text by asking some basic questions about the elements of drama.

- Expectations: What do you expect
 - from the title? from the first sentence, paragraph, or speech?
 - after the first events or interactions of characters? as the conflict is resolved?
- Characterization: Who are the characters? Is there a list of characters printed after the title of the play? What do you notice about their names or any identification of their roles, character types, or relationships?
 - Who is/are the protagonist(s)?
 - Who is/are the antagonist(s) (villain, opponent, obstacle)?
 - Who are the other characters?
 - What does each character know at any moment in the action? What does each character expect at any point? What does the audience know or expect that is different from what the characters know or expect?
- Plot: What happens in the play?
 - Do the characters or situations change during the play?
 - What are the differences between the beginning, middle, and end of the play? Is it divided into acts? Would there be an intermission in a performance?
 - Can you summarize the plot? Is it a recognizable kind or genre such as tragedy, comedy, farce, or mystery?
- Setting: What is the setting of the play?
 - When does the action occur? Do the stage directions specify a year or era, a day of the week, a season, a time of day?
 - Are there any time changes during the play? Are the scenes in chronological order, or are there any scenes that are supposed to take place earlier or simultaneously? Does the passage of time in the lives of the characters correspond with the passage of time onstage? Or do we understand that time has passed and events have occurred offstage and between scenes?

- Where does it take place? Is it in the United States or another country, or in a specific town or region? Do the stage directions describe the scene that an audience would see onstage, and does this remain the same or change during the play? How many scene changes are there?
- Style: What do you notice about how the play is written?
 - What is the style of the dialogue? Are the sentences and speeches short or long? Is the vocabulary simple or complex? Do characters ever speak at the same time, or do they always take turns? Does the play instruct actors to be silent for periods of time? Which characters speak most often? How might their speech patterns differ?
 - Are there any images or figures of speech?
 - What is the tone or mood? Does the play make the reader or audience feel sad, amused, worried, curious?
- Theme: What does the play mean? Can you express its theme or themes?
 - Answers to these big questions may be found in many instances by returning to your answers to the questions above. The play's meaning or theme depends on all its features.

THINKING THEATRICALY

As you read a play, you should not only make mental or written notes but also raise some of the questions an actor might ask in preparing a role, or that a director might ask before choosing a cast: How should this line be spoken? What kind of person is this character, and what are his or her motives in each scene? What does the play suggest about what made the character this way—family, environment, experience? Which characters are present or absent (onstage or off) in which scenes, and how do the characters onstage or off influence one another? Would you, as “director” of an imaginary performance, tell the actors to move in certain directions, together or apart; to express certain emotions and intentions; to speak in quiet, angry, sarcastic, or agonized tones?

Besides trying to understand the characters, you should consider ways that the play could be produced, designed, and staged. How might a set designer create a kitchen, drawing room, garden, woods, or other space for the actors to move in, and how many set changes are there in the play? What would the audience see through any windows or doors in an imaginary building? How would lighting give an impression of the time of day or season? Would sound effects or music be necessary (such as a gunshot, radio, or telephone)? What sort of costumes are specified in the stage directions, and how would costumes help express character types and their relationships, as well as the historical time period? What essential props must be provided for the actors to use, and what other props are optional?

As you read Susan Glaspell's TRIFLES, keep these questions in mind and list any others that occur to you. Try to create a mental image of the settings and of each character, and think about different ways the lines might be delivered and about their effect on an audience's response.

SUSAN GLASPELL

(1876–1948)

Trifles

Though today remembered almost exclusively for her masterful Trifles (1916), Susan Glaspell wrote over a dozen plays, fifty short stories, nine novels, and a memoir, in addition to playing a key role in the development of twentieth-century American theater. Born in Davenport, Iowa, she graduated from Drake University in 1899 and spent two years at the Des Moines Daily News, where she covered the trial of a fifty-seven-year-old woman accused of murdering her sleeping husband with an axe. When Glaspell's short stories began appearing in magazines, she returned to Davenport. There, she became involved with George Cram Cook, a former English professor and married father of two. The two wed in 1913 and moved east, eventually settling in New York's Greenwich Village and Cape Cod, Massachusetts, where they founded the Provincetown Playhouse (later the Playwright's Theater), an extraordinary gathering of freethinking, Left-leaning actors, directors, and playwrights that included Edna St. Vincent Millay and a then-unknown Eugene O'Neill. Between 1916 and 1922, this pioneering group reportedly staged more plays by women than any other contemporary theater. Among them were eleven by Glaspell, ranging from realistic dramas such as Trifles and satirical comedies like Woman's Honor (1918) to her expressionistic The Verge (1921). Widowed in 1924, Glaspell ended a brief second marriage in 1931, the same year that her last play, Alison's House, won the Pulitzer Prize for Drama. Having published her first novel in 1909 and multiple best sellers in the 1920s and 1930s, Glaspell spent the last years of her life writing fiction in Provincetown.

CHARACTERS

COUNTY ATTORNEY

HALE

MRS. PETERS, Sheriff's wife

MRS. HALE

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of JOHN WRIGHT, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the bread-box, a dish-towel on the table—other signs of incompleted work. At the rear the outer door opens and the SHERIFF comes in followed by the COUNTY ATTORNEY and HALE. The SHERIFF and HALE are men in middle life, the COUNTY ATTORNEY is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the SHERIFF's wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. MRS. HALE is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly, and stand close together near the door.

Marjorie Vonnegut, Elinor Cox, John King, Arthur Hohl, and T. W. Gibson in a 1916 production of Trifles

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands.] This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS: [After taking a step forward.] I'm not—cold.

SHERIFF: [Unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to mark the beginning of official business.] Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

SHERIFF: [Looking about.] It's just the same. When it dropped below zero last night I thought I'd better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on, but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF: Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today and as long as I went over everything here myself—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

HALE: Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place and as I got here I said, "I'm going to see if I can't get

John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone.”¹ I spoke to Wright about it once before and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn’t know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Let’s talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

HALE: I didn’t hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o’clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, “Come in.” I wasn’t sure, I’m not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door [Indicating the door by which the two women are still standing.] and there in that rocker—[Pointing to it.] sat Mrs. Wright.

[They all look at the rocker.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: What—was she doing?

HALE: She was rockin’ back and forth. She had her apron in her hand and was kind of—pleating it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And how did she—look?

HALE: Well, she looked queer.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How do you mean—queer?

HALE: Well, as if she didn’t know what she was going to do next. And kind of done up.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: How did she seem to feel about your coming?

HALE: Why, I don’t think she minded—one way or other. She didn’t pay much attention. I said, “How do, Mrs. Wright, it’s cold, ain’t it?” And she said, “Is it?”—and went on kind of pleating at her apron. Well, I was surprised; she didn’t ask me to come up to the stove, or to set down, but just sat there, not even looking at me, so I said, “I want to see John.” And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh. I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said a little sharp: “Can’t I see John?” “No,” she says, kind o’ dull like. “Ain’t he home?” says I. “Yes,” says she, “he’s home.” “Then why can’t I see him?” I asked her, out of patience. “‘Cause he’s dead,” says she. “Dead?” says I. She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin’ back and forth. “Why—where is he?” says I, not knowing what to say. She just pointed upstairs—like that. [Himself pointing to the room above.] I got up, with the idea of going up there. I walked from there to here—then I says, “Why, what did he die of?” “He died of a rope round his neck,” says she, and just went on pleatin’ at her apron. Well, I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. We went upstairs and there he was lyin’—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I think I’d rather have you go into that upstairs, where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story.

1. That is, a party line in which a number of households each have extensions, a common arrangement in the early twentieth century, especially in rural areas.

HALE: Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. It looked . . . [Stops, his face twitches.] . . . but Harry, he went up to him, and he said, “No, he’s dead all right, and we’d better not touch anything.” So we went back downstairs. She was still sitting that same way. “Has anybody been notified?” I asked. “No,” says she, unconcerned. “Who did this, Mrs. Wright?” said Harry. He said it business-like—and she stopped pleatin’ of her apron. “I don’t know,” she says. “You don’t know?” says Harry. “No,” says she. “Weren’t you sleepin’ in the bed with him?” says Harry. “Yes,” says she, “but I was on the inside.” “Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him and you didn’t wake up?” says Harry. “I didn’t wake up,” she said after him. We must ‘a looked as if we didn’t see how that could be, for after a minute she said, “I sleep sound.” Harry was going to ask her more questions but I said maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner, or the sheriff, so Harry went fast as he could to Rivers’ place, where there’s a telephone.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And what did Mrs. Wright do when she knew that you had gone for the coroner?

HALE: She moved from that chair to this one over here [Pointing to a small chair in the corner.] and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone, and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared. [The COUNTY ATTORNEY, who has had his notebook out, makes a note.] I dunno, maybe it wasn’t scared. I wouldn’t like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that’s all I know that you don’t.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Looking around.] I guess we’ll go upstairs first—and then out to the barn and around there. [To the SHERIFF.] You’re convinced that there was nothing important here—nothing that would point to any motive?

SHERIFF: Nothing here but kitchen things.

[The COUNTY ATTORNEY, after again looking around the kitchen, opens the door of a cupboard closet. He gets up on a chair and looks on a shelf. Pulls his hand away, sticky.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Here’s a nice mess.

[The women draw nearer.]

MRS. PETERS: [To the other woman.] Oh, her fruit; it did freeze. [To the LAWYER.]

She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire’d go out and her jars would break.

SHERIFF: Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin’ about her preserves.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I guess before we’re through she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about.

HALE: Well, women are used to worrying over trifles.

[The two women move a little closer together.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [With the gallantry of a young politician.] And yet, for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies? [The women do not unbend. He goes to the sink, takes a dipperful of water from the pail and pouring it into a basin, washes his hands. Starts to wipe them on the roller towel, turns it for a cleaner place.] Dirty towels! [Kicks his foot against the pans under the sink.] Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?

MRS. HALE: [Stiffly.] There's a great deal of work to be done on a farm.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: To be sure. And yet [With a little bow to her.] I know there are some Dickson county farmhouses which do not have such roller towels. [He gives it a pull to expose its length again.]

MRS. HALE: Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men's hands aren't always as clean as they might be.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Ah, loyal to your sex, I see. But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too.

MRS. HALE: [Shaking her head.] I've not seen much of her of late years. I've not been in this house—it's more than a year.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: And why was that? You didn't like her?

MRS. HALE: I liked her all well enough. Farmers' wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes—?

MRS. HALE: [Looking about.] It never seemed a very cheerful place.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: No—it's not cheerful. I shouldn't say she had the home-making instinct.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't know as Wright had, either.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: You mean that they didn't get on very well?

MRS. HALE: No, I don't mean anything. But I don't think a place'd be any cheerfuller for John Wright's being in it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'd like to talk more of that a little later. I want to get the lay of things upstairs now. [He goes to the left, where three steps lead to a stair door.]

SHERIFF: I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does'll be all right. She was to take in some clothes for her, you know, and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mr. Henderson. [The women listen to the men's steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.]

MRS. HALE: I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. [She arranges the pans under the sink which the LAWYER had shoved out of place.]

MRS. PETERS: Of course it's no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE: Duty's all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. [Gives the roller towel a pull.] Wish I'd thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

MRS. PETERS: [Who has gone to a small table in the left rear corner of the room, and lifted one end of a towel that covers a pan.] She had bread set. [Stands still.]

MRS. HALE: [Eyes fixed on a loaf of bread beside the bread box, which is on a low shelf at the other side of the room. Moves slowly toward it.] She was going to put this in there. [Picks up loaf, then abruptly drops it. In a manner of returning to familiar things.] It's a shame about her fruit. I wonder if it's all gone. [Gets up on the chair and looks.] I think there's some here that's all right, Mrs. Peters. Yes—here; [Holding it toward the window.] this is cherries, too. [Looking again.] I declare I believe that's the only one. [Gets down, bottle in her hand. Goes to the sink and wipes it off on the outside.] She'll feel awful bad after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer. [She puts the bottle on the big kitchen table, center of the room. With a sigh, is about to sit down in the rocking-chair. Before she is seated realizes what chair it is; with a slow look at it, steps back. The chair, which she has touched, rocks back and forth.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, I must get those things from the front room closet. [She goes to the door at the right, but after looking into the other room, steps back.] You coming with me, Mrs. Hale? You could help me carry them. [They go in the other room; reappear, MRS. PETERS carrying a dress and skirt, MRS. HALE following with a pair of shoes.] My, it's cold in there. [She puts the clothes on the big table, and hurries to the stove.]

MRS. HALE: [Examining the skirt.] Wright was close. I think maybe that's why she kept so much to herself. She didn't even belong to the Ladies Aid. I suppose she felt she couldn't do her part, and then you don't enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively, when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was thirty years ago. This all you was to take in?

MRS. PETERS: She said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want, for there isn't much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. She said they was in the top drawer in this cupboard. Yes, here. And then her little shawl that always hung behind the door. [Opens stair door and looks.] Yes, here it is. [Quickly shuts door leading upstairs.]

MRS. HALE: [Abruptly moving toward her.] Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Do you think she did it?

MRS. PETERS: [In a frightened voice.] Oh, I don't know.

MRS. HALE: Well, I don't think she did. Asking for an apron and her little shawl. Worrying about her fruit.

MRS. PETERS: [Starts to speak, glances up, where footsteps are heard in the room above. In a low voice.] Mr. Peters says it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in a speech and he'll make fun of her sayin' she didn't wake up.

MRS. HALE: Well, I guess John Wright didn't wake when they was slipping that rope under his neck.

MRS. PETERS: No, it's strange. It must have been done awful crafty and still. They say it was such a—funny way to kill a man, rigging it all up like that.

MRS. HALE: That's just what Mr. Hale said. There was a gun in the house. He says that's what he can't understand.

MRS. PETERS: Mr. Henderson said coming out that what was needed for the case was a motive; something to show anger, or—sudden feeling.

MRS. HALE: [Who is standing by the table.] Well, I don't see any signs of anger around here. [She puts her hand on the dish towel which lies on the table, stands looking down at table, one half of which is clean, the other half messy.] It's wiped to here. [Makes a move as if to finish work, then turns and looks at loaf of bread outside the bread box. Drops towel. In that voice of coming back to familiar things.] Wonder how they are finding things upstairs. I hope she had it a little more red-up² up there. You know, it seems kind of sneaking. Locking her up in town and then coming out here and trying to get her own house to turn against her!

MRS. PETERS: But Mrs. Hale, the law is the law.

MRS. HALE: I s'pose 'tis. [Unbuttoning her coat.] Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. You won't feel them when you go out.

[MRS. PETERS takes off her fur tippet, goes to hang it on hook at back of room, stands looking at the under part of the small corner table.]

MRS. PETERS: She was piecing a quilt. [She brings the large sewing basket and they look at the bright pieces.]

MRS. HALE: It's log cabin pattern. Pretty, isn't it? I wonder if she was goin' to quilt it or just knot it?

[Footsteps have been heard coming down the stairs. The SHERIFF enters followed by HALE and the COUNTY ATTORNEY.]

SHERIFF: They wonder if she was going to quilt it or just knot it!

[The men laugh, the women look abashed.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands over the stove.] Frank's fire didn't do much up there, did it? Well, let's go out to the barn and get that cleared up.

[The men go outside.]

MRS. HALE: [Resentfully.] I don't know as there's anything so strange, our takin' up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. [She sits down at the big table smoothing out a block with decision.] I don't see as it's anything to laugh about.

MRS. PETERS: [Apologetically.] Of course they've got awful important things on their minds. [Pulls up a chair and joins MRS. HALE at the table.]

MRS. HALE: [Examining another block.] Mrs. Peters, look at this one. Here, this is the one she was working on, and look at the sewing! All the rest of it has been so nice and even. And look at this! It's all over the place! Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about! [After she has said this they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant MRS. HALE has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing.]

MRS. PETERS: Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: [Mildly.] Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good. [Threading the needle.] Bad sewing always made me fidgety.

MRS. PETERS: [Nervously.] I don't think we ought to touch things.

MRS. HALE: I'll just finish up this end. [Suddenly stopping and leaning forward.]

Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: What do you suppose she was so nervous about?

MRS. PETERS: Oh—I don't know. I don't know as she was nervous. I sometimes sew awful queer when I'm just tired. [MRS. HALE starts to say something, looks at MRS. PETERS, then goes on sewing.] Well, I must get these things wrapped up. They may be through sooner than we think. [Putting apron and other things together.] I wonder where I can find a piece of paper, and string.

MRS. HALE: In that cupboard, maybe.

MRS. PETERS: [Looking in cupboard.] Why, here's a bird-cage. [Holds it up.] Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE: Why, I don't know whether she did or not—I've not been here for so long. There was a man around last year selling canaries cheap, but I don't know as she took one; maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself.

MRS. PETERS: [Glancing around.] Seems funny to think of a bird here. But she must have had one, or why would she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it.

MRS. HALE: I s'pose maybe the cat got it.

MRS. PETERS: No, she didn't have a cat. She's got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. My cat got in her room and she was real upset and asked me to take it out.

MRS. HALE: My sister Bessie was like that. Queer, ain't it?

MRS. PETERS: [Examining the cage.] Why, look at this door. It's broke. One hinge is pulled apart.

MRS. HALE: [Looking too.] Looks as if someone must have been rough with it.

MRS. PETERS: Why, yes. [She brings the cage forward and puts it on the table.]

MRS. HALE: I wish if they're going to find any evidence they'd be about it. I don't like this place.

MRS. PETERS: But I'm awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale. It would be lonesome for me sitting here alone.

MRS. HALE: It would, wouldn't it? [Dropping her sewing.] But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I—[Looking around the room.—]wish I had.

MRS. PETERS: But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale—your house and your children.

MRS. HALE: I could've come. I stayed away because it weren't cheerful—and that's why I ought to have come. I—I've never liked this place. Maybe because it's down in a hollow and you don't see the road. I dunno what it is, but it's a lonesome place and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—[Shakes her head.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, you mustn't reproach yourself, Mrs. Hale. Somehow we just don't see how it is with other folks until—something comes up.

MRS. HALE: Not having children makes less work—but it makes a quiet house, and Wright out to work all day, and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not to know him; I've seen him in town. They say he was a good man.

MRS. HALE: Yes—good; he didn't drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him—[Shivers.] Like a raw wind that gets to the bone. [Pauses, her eye falling on the cage.] I should think she would 'a wanted a bird. But what do you suppose went with it?

MRS. PETERS: I don't know, unless it got sick and died. [She reaches over and swings the broken door, swings it again, both women watch it.]

MRS. HALE: You weren't raised round here, were you? [MRS. PETERS shakes her head.] You didn't know—her?

MRS. PETERS: Not till they brought her yesterday.

MRS. HALE: She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change. [Silence; then as if struck by a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things.] Tell you what, Mrs. Peters, why don't you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind.

MRS. PETERS: Why, I think that's a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale. There couldn't possibly be any objection to it, could there? Now, just what would I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things. [They look in the sewing basket.]

MRS. HALE: Here's some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. [Brings out a fancy box.] What a pretty box. Looks like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. [Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.] Why—[MRS. PETERS bends nearer, then turns her face away.] There's something wrapped up in this piece of silk.

MRS. PETERS: Why, this isn't her scissors.

MRS. HALE: [Lifting the silk.] Oh, Mrs. Peters—it's—

[MRS. PETERS bends closer.]

MRS. PETERS: It's the bird.

MRS. HALE: [Jumping up.] But, Mrs. Peters—look at it! Its neck! Look at its neck! It's all—other side to.

MRS. PETERS: Somebody—wrung—its—neck.

[Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension, of horror. Steps are heard outside. MRS. HALE slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter SHERIFF and COUNTY ATTORNEY. MRS. PETERS rises.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [As one turning from serious things to little pleasantries.] Well ladies, have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?

MRS. PETERS: We think she was going to—knot it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, that's interesting, I'm sure. [Seeing the bird-cage.] Has the bird flown?

MRS. HALE: [Putting more quilt pieces over the box.] We think the—cat got it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Preoccupied.] Is there a cat?

[MRS. HALE glances in a quick covert way at MRS. PETERS.]

MRS. PETERS: Well, not now. They're superstitious, you know. They leave.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [To SHERIFF PETERS, continuing an interrupted conversation.] No sign at all of anyone having come from the outside. Their own rope.

Now let's go up again and go over it piece by piece. [They start upstairs.] It would have to have been someone who knew just the—

[MRS. PETERS sits down. The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now it is in the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.]

MRS. HALE: She liked the bird. She was going to bury it in that pretty box.

MRS. PETERS: [In a whisper.] When I was a girl—my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—and before I could get there—[Covers her face an instant.] If they hadn't held me back I would have—[Catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.]—hurt him.

MRS. HALE: [With a slow look around her.] I wonder how it would seem never to have had any children around. [Pause.] No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.

MRS. PETERS: [Moving uneasily.] We don't know who killed the bird.

MRS. HALE: I knew John Wright.

MRS. PETERS: It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale. Killing a man while he slept, slipping a rope around his neck that choked the life out of him.

MRS. HALE: His neck. Choked the life out of him. [Her hand goes out and rests on the bird-cage.]

MRS. PETERS: [With rising voice.] We don't know who killed him. We don't know.

MRS. HALE: [Her own feeling not interrupted.] If there's been years and years of nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still, after the bird was still.

MRS. PETERS: [Something within her speaking.] I know what stillness is. When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old, and me with no other then—

MRS. HALE: [Moving.] How soon do you suppose they'll be through, looking for the evidence?

MRS. PETERS: I know what stillness is. [Pulling herself back.] The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale.

MRS. HALE: [Not as if answering that.] I wish you'd seen Minnie Foster when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons and stood up there in the choir and sang. [A look around the room.] Oh, I wish I'd come over here once in a while! That was a crime! That was a crime! Who's going to punish that?

MRS. PETERS: [Looking upstairs.] We mustn't—take on.

MRS. HALE: I might have known she needed help! I know how things can be—for women. I tell you, it's queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it's all just a different kind of the same thing. [Brushes her eyes, noticing the bottle of fruit, reaches out for it.] If I was you, I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't. Tell her it's all right. Take this in to prove it to her. She—she may never know whether it was broke or not.

MRS. PETERS: [Takes the bottle, looks about for something to wrap it in; takes petticoat from the clothes brought from the other room, very nervously begins winding this around the bottle. In a false voice.] My, it's a good thing the men couldn't hear us. Wouldn't they just laugh! Getting all stirred up over a little thing like a—dead canary. As if that could have anything to do with—with—wouldn't they laugh!

[The men are heard coming down stairs.]

MRS. HALE: [Under her breath.] Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn't.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: No, Peters, it's all perfectly clear except a reason for doing it.

But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing. Something to show—something to make a story about—a thing that would connect up with this strange way of doing it—

[The women's eyes meet for an instant. Enter HALE from outer door.]

HALE: Well, I've got the team around. Pretty cold out there.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: I'm going to stay here a while by myself. [To the SHERIFF.]

You can send Frank out for me, can't you? I want to go over everything. I'm not satisfied that we can't do better.

SHERIFF: Do you want to see what Mrs. Peters is going to take in?

[The LAWYER goes to the table, picks up the apron, laughs.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Oh, I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked out. [Moves a few things about, disturbing the quilt pieces which cover the box. Steps back.] No, Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS: Not—just that way.

SHERIFF: [Chuckling.] Married to the law. [Moves toward the other room.] I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Scoffingly.] Oh, windows!

SHERIFF: We'll be right out, Mr. Hale.

[HALE goes outside. The SHERIFF follows the COUNTY ATTORNEY into the other room. Then MRS. HALE rises, hands tight together, looking intensely at MRS. PETERS, whose eyes make a slow turn, finally meeting MRS. HALE's. A moment MRS. HALE holds her, then her own eyes point the way to where the box is concealed. Suddenly MRS. PETERS throws back quilt pieces and tries to put the box in the bag she is wearing. It is too big. She opens box, starts to take bird out, cannot touch it, goes to pieces, stands there helpless. Sound of a knob turning in the other room. MRS. HALE snatches the box and puts it in the pocket of her big coat. Enter COUNTY ATTORNEY and SHERIFF.]

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Facetiously.] Well, Henry, at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?

MRS. HALE: [Her hand against her pocket.] We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson.

CURTAIN

QUESTIONS

1. If we were watching a production of TRIFLES and had no cast list, how would we gradually piece together the fact that Mrs. Peters is the sheriff's wife? What are the earliest lines of dialogue that allow an audience to infer this fact?
2. What lines in the play characterize Mrs. Hale's reaction to the men's behavior and attitudes? What lines characterize Mrs. Peters's reaction to the men early in the play, and what lines show her feelings changing later in the play? What might account for the two women's initial differences and their evolving solidarity with Mrs. Wright?
3. What are the "trifles" that the men ignore and the two women notice? Why do the men dismiss them, and why do the women see these things as significant clues? What is the thematic importance of these "trifles"?
4. How would you stage the key moment of the play, Mrs. Hale's discovery of the bird in the sewing basket? What facial expression would she have? What body language? Where would you place Mrs. Peters, and what would she be doing? How would you use lighting to heighten the effectiveness of the scene?
5. If a twenty-first-century playwright were to write an updated version of TRIFLES, what details of plot, character, and setting would be different from those in Glaspell's play? What would be the same? What are some possible "trifles" that might serve the same dramatic functions as those in Glaspell's play?

RESPONDING TO DRAMA

When reading a play in order to write about it, you will need to keep a record of how you respond and what you observe as the action unfolds. Recording your thoughts as you read will help you clarify your expectations and attend to the way the play elicits and manages them. Below you will find examples of two ways of responding to a play. The first shows how you might jot down your initial impressions and questions in the margins as you read. The second shows how one reader used the questions on pages 1195–96 to take more comprehensive, methodical notes on the same play. Each of these methods of note-taking has certain advantages, and you may well find that a combination of the two works best.

SAMPLE WRITING: ANNOTATION OF TRIFLES

Though the passage chosen for annotation here is the play's opening, any passage in a play—including stage directions, as well as dialogue—will reward close analysis.

A "trifle" is something unimportant and also a kind of dessert. So is the play going to be about unimportant things? Is it a comedy?

Trifles

CHARACTERS

SHERIFF

MRS. PETERS, Sheriff's wife

MRS. HALE

Only character not identified either by job or relationship to somebody else. (Why not "Mr. Hale"?)

HALE

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of JOHN

WRIGHT, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—

Why "now abandoned"? Who's John

Wright? "Gloomy" doesn't sound like a comedy.

Is this a crime scene? Why refer to "work" (not "eating" or something)?

Women described more than men. They look different, but even the "comfortable looking" one (funny expression) isn't comfortable. They stick together.

unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the bread-box, a dish-towel on the table—other signs of incompleting work. At the rear the outer door opens and the SHERIFF comes in followed by the COUNTY ATTORNEY and HALE. The SHERIFF and HALE are men in middle life, the COUNTY ATTORNEY is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the SHERIFF's wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. MRS. HALE is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly, and stand close together near the door.

Why hesitate?

COUNTY ATTORNEY: [Rubbing his hands.] This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS: [After taking a step forward.] I'm not—cold.

Now attorney gets a name. Sounds like they are in court.

SHERIFF: [Unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to mark the beginning of official business.] Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

Second mention of things being moved: they're worried about evidence.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

So this is "a big case." Is John Wright the criminal or victim?

SHERIFF: [Looking about.] It's just the same. When it dropped below zero last night I thought I'd better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on, but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

Everyone knows everyone else. It's very cold, a harsh environment outside this kitchen. And it takes work to make it warm (lighting a fire).

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Somebody should have been left here yesterday. SHERIFF: Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today and as long as I went over everything here myself—

It's a small town (in Nebraska?), but a lot of bad stuff is happening! Sheriff is defensive with attorney—source of conflict?

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

Again, everybody knows about everybody else.

HALE: Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place and as I got here I said, "I'm going to see if I can't get John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone." I spoke to Wright about it once before and he put me

Hale assumes most husbands would act differently around their wives, care about what they want—but maybe not Wright.

off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn't know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

Attorney is worried about being “official,” sticking to facts, actions, “business,” and thinks “that” (Wright’s personality or feelings?) doesn’t count.

COUNTY ATTORNEY: Let’s talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

Everyone gets up early—because of all the work they have to do?

HALE: I didn’t hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o’clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, “Come in.” I wasn’t sure, I’m not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door [Indicating the door by which the two women are still standing.] and there in that rocker—[Pointing to it.] sat Mrs. Wright.

Really ordinary things now seem very creepy. Why are the women still standing by the door—because they are afraid? because they aren’t part of “official business”? Are they witnesses, too? Why are they here?

She’s not listed as character either. What happened?

SAMPLE WRITING: READING NOTES

Below are examples of the questions an experienced reader might ask when reading the play TRIFLES for the first time, as well as responses to those questions. (See pp. 1197–1207.) Any of these notes might inspire ideas for essay topics. This is just a selection of the many details that could be observed about this lasting play, in which details certainly matter.

Expectations

Does the title suggest anything? “Trifles” sounds like a comedy (a trifle is something trivial), but it might be ironic. But why does Hale say that “women are used to worrying over trifles”? I expect to find out that the title is significant in some way, even that the theme is somehow connected to “trifles.”

Characterization

Who are the characters? What are they like? Three men and two women in the cast of characters. After I read the stage directions and part of the dialogue, I check the list again to keep straight who is who. What kind of situation would bring together a sheriff, a county attorney, a farmer, and two wives? No actors are needed to play either Mr. Wright or Mrs. Wright. Some men who help Mr. Hale (Harry) and Mr. Peters (deputy Frank) are mentioned as coming and going but are never onstage.

The “county attorney” acts like a detective; he seems businesslike and thinks he’s smarter than farmers and women. The stage directions specify that he speaks “[w]ith the gallantry of a young politician,” but his flattery toward the women doesn’t work. We find out his name is Mr. Henderson.

According to the stage directions, Mrs. Peters, the sheriff’s wife, is “a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face”; Mrs. Hale, the farmer’s wife, is “larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking.” The casting of the two women would be important for contrast; a wider range of physical types would be suitable for the men. Everyone is cold, but only the men take comfort by the fire in the kitchen; the women are upset.

Is there a protagonist, an antagonist, or other types? There isn’t a young hero or heroine of this play, and I wouldn’t call anyone the villain unless it’s the dead man or his murderer. Who the real villain is seems like an important question.

Are the characters’ names significant? There’s nothing especially meaningful or unusual about the names, although “Hale” means healthy (as in “hale and hearty”), and “Wright” sounds just like “right,” though obviously something’s wrong in this house. Interesting how “Mrs. Wright” becomes “Minnie Foster” to the women. Think about when. And about why it matters.

Plot

What happens? The big event has already happened; this is the scene of the crime. The men are looking for clues and leave the women in the kitchen, where they discover possible causes or motives for the crime. The women decide not to tell the men about either the evidence they find or their interpretation of it.

Are there scene changes? The whole scene is a fairly short uninterrupted period in one part of a farmhouse. Characters go offstage to other rooms or outdoors to the barn.

How is exposition handled? The county attorney asks Hale to “tell just what happened”; Hale explains what happened before the play started, describing how Mrs. Wright behaved. It comes as a shock to learn that Mrs. Wright told Hale he couldn’t see John Wright “ ‘Cause [he was] dead.” Shouldn’t she have run to tell someone about the murder or have told Hale as soon as he arrived? When Hale reports that Mrs. Wright said her husband “died of a rope round his neck,” it sounds suspicious. Could she have slept so soundly that she didn’t realize someone had strangled Mr. Wright?

What events mark the rising action? When the men go upstairs and Mrs. Hale says, “I’d hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing,” the women have a chance to notice more in the kitchen. Mrs. Hale recalls her relationship to Mrs. Wright, and the women discuss whether the wife really murdered her husband.

The men return to the kitchen on their way out to the barn just after the women discover the quilt pieces with the bad stitching. The next dialogue between the women is more open and brings out Mrs. Hale’s regret for not having visited and supported Mrs. Wright in her unhappy marriage. They notice the empty birdcage.

What is the climax? Mrs. Hale finds the dead bird in the pretty box, and the two women understand what it means just before the men return to the kitchen briefly. From then on the women utter small lies to the men. Mrs. Peters for the first time reveals personal memories that suggest she can imagine Mrs. Wright’s motives.

What is the resolution? As everyone prepares to leave, Mrs. Peters pretends the bird is insignificant, joining Mrs. Hale in protecting Mrs. Wright and playing along with the men’s idea that there’s nothing to notice in the kitchen. The women collaborate in hiding the bird.

What kind of play or plot is it? Like some detective stories, the play doesn’t ask “whodunnit?” but why the murder was committed. Its mode of representation is a familiar type—domestic realism—in which the places, people, things, and even events are more or less ordinary. (Unfortunately, domestic violence is common.)

Setting

When does the action occur? The play appears to be contemporary with 1916 (a stove heater, party-line telephones, a horse-drawn wagon). It is a winter morning, and the scene takes perhaps an hour.

Where does the action occur? It is obviously farm country, perhaps in the Midwest, where farms are very far apart.

What is the atmosphere? The freezing weather reflects the feeling of the play and gives the characters a motive for gathering in the kitchen. John Wright is described as a chilly wind. The frozen house has ruined Mrs. Wright’s preserves. The mess in the kitchen, especially the sticky spill of red fruit in the cupboard, seems related to the unhappiness and horror of the marriage and the crime. Also just shows how hard their lives are maybe.

Are there scene changes? Instead of several scenes over a longer time, showing the deteriorating marriage, the crisis over the bird, the murder itself, Mrs.

Wright's sleepless night, and Mr. Hale's visit, the story unfolds in a single scene, in one room, on the second morning after the murder, between the entrance and exit of Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters. It is essential that the play focus on "kitchen things" and what the women visitors notice and think.

Style, Tone, Imagery

What is the style of the dialogue? The dialogue seems similar to everyday speech. There are some differences in speaking style that show the Hales are more rustic than the Peters and the county attorney. Hale has a relaxed way of telling a story: "then I says," etc. Mrs. Hale: "Those towels get dirty awful quick" and "If I was you, I wouldn't tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain't."

How do nonverbal gestures and actions convey meaning? Many specific actions indicated in the stage directions are crucial to the play: everyone looking at the rocking chair, pointing to the room upstairs, looking at the loaf of bread that should have been put back in the bread box, etc.

Do any of the props seem to have symbolic meaning? Some objects in the play are so important they seem symbolic, though the play tries not to be too heavily poetic. All kinds of "trifles" are clues. For instance, the women get Mrs. Wright's clothes to bring to her in jail. "MRS. HALE: [Examining the skirt.] Wright was close," meaning stingy. Mrs. Hale's words convey a quick impression: the skirt looks "shabby" because John Wright didn't give his wife any money for clothes (he was "good" but stingy and cold).

There would be some colorful props onstage—the jar of cherries, the red cloth and other quilt material, the pretty box—all of them signs of what has gone wrong. The room itself is "gloomy" and has some dirty and messy things in plain sight; other things in the cupboards are eventually revealed. These props would add to the uncomfortable feeling of the play.

The closest thing to a symbol is the caged songbird. Even the men notice the broken door and missing bird. Mrs. Hale underlines the comparison to Mrs. Wright twice: "she was kind of like a bird," and later, "No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too."

Theme

What is the theme of the play? The title calls attention to what the play is about. Glaspell didn't call it The Caged Songbird or Murder in the Midwest or something heavy-handed. The main action is a search for a motive to confirm what everyone believes, that Minnie Wright must have strangled her husband while he was sleeping. But the underlying theme of the play seems to be about men's and women's different perspectives. How can women's everyday things be important? Why would anyone charged with murder worry about preserves? Even the women hope that Mrs. Wright's worry about having her apron and shawl in jail means she didn't commit the crime. The kitchen things—the trifles in her own house—"turn against her," but the women are able to hide evidence that the men consider insignificant.

WRITING ABOUT DRAMA

Writing an essay about drama, like writing about fiction or poetry, can sharpen your responses and focus your reading; at the same time, it can illuminate aspects of the work that other readers may have missed. When you write about drama, in a very real sense you perform the role that directors and actors take on in a stage performance: You offer your “reading” of the text, interpreting it in order to guide other readers’ responses. But you also shape and refine your own response by attempting to express it clearly.

Using the notes you have taken while reading a play, try to locate the specific lines and actions that have contributed to your expectations or your discoveries. Are these at the beginning, the middle, or the end of the play? Who gives most of the hints or misleading information? If there is one character who is especially unseeing, especially devious, or especially insightful, you might decide to write an essay describing the function of that character in the play. A good way to undertake such a study of a character in drama (as in fiction) is to imagine the work without that character. Mrs. Hale in Trifles is certainly the cleverest “detective,” so why do we need Mrs. Peters as well? One obvious answer is that plays need dialogue, and we would find it artificial if Mrs. Hale talked mainly to herself. But a more interesting answer is that in a play the audience learns by witnessing characters with different temperaments responding to the same situation. As these remarks suggest, you can also develop essays that compare characters.

In addition to character studies, essays on drama can focus on the kinds of observations made above: expectations and plot structure; the presence and absence of characters or actions onstage; the different degrees of awareness of characters and audience at various points in the action; titles, stage directions, and other stylistic details, including metaphors or other imagery; and, of course, themes. As you write, you will probably discover that you can imagine directing or acting in a performance of the play, and you’ll realize that interpreting a play is a crucial step in bringing it to life.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. The action in Glaspell’s play unfolds continuously, without interruption, in a single, relatively small room (the kitchen of a farmhouse), with the two female characters never leaving the stage. Write a response paper or essay discussing how these three factors affect your responses to the play, to the crime being investigated, and to the various characters.
2. How do your sympathies for Mrs. Peters change over the course of TRIFLES? What might Mrs. Peters be said to represent in the clash of attitudes at the heart of the play? Write an essay in which you examine both Mrs. Peters’s evolving character as it is revealed in TRIFLES and her significance to the play’s theme.
3. How would you characterize Susan Glaspell’s feminism as revealed in TRIFLES—does it seem radical or moderate? How does it compare to feminist political and social ideas of our own time? (Consult three or more educational or library Web sites for biographical background on Glaspell; there are several sites offering teaching materials on TRIFLES as well. If time allows, you might also pursue sources that provide an overview of women’s movements in the United States in the twentieth century.) Write an essay in which you explore the political leanings apparent in TRIFLES, both in the context of Glaspell’s play (published in 1916) and in the broader historical context of the struggle for women’s rights over the past century.

4. Write an essay in which you propose a production of TRIFLES, complete with details of how you would handle the casting, costumes, set design, lighting, and direction of the actors. What would be your overall controlling vision for the production? Would you attempt to reproduce faithfully the look and feel of the play as it might have been in 1916, or would you introduce innovations, even “update” the play? How would you justify your choices in terms of dramatic effectiveness?
5. Write an essay in which you draw on both TRIFLES and A JURY of HER PEERS to consider the similarities and differences between an effective story and an effective play. Does the play work better than the story or vice versa? Why and how so? Why the different titles?

SAMPLE WRITING: RESPONSE PAPER

Response papers are a great way to begin moving from informal notes to a more formal essay. Though many response-paper assignments invite you to respond to any aspect or element of a literary text that grabs your attention, the following example was written in response to a more targeted assignment, one that asked students to “explore something specific about the way TRIFLES handles plot. For example, what are the major internal and/or external conflicts? Or what would you argue is the play’s turning point, and why?” Student writer Jessica Zezulka explored the last question. Marginal comments below are the instructor’s. But what do you think of this writer’s answer? How might she strengthen and develop the argument she begins to make here about the play’s turning point? What alternative answers or arguments occur to you?

Trifles Plot Response Paper

While the men dillydally over the facts, the so-called “evidence,” the women in Trifles discover the missing piece: a motive for murder. The moment Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters find the dead canary in the hidden box is the turning point in the play. Up until that instant, their conversation seems trivial, to both a reader and the men involved. Upon discussing the little trifles, the quilt and the sewing, these two women have inadvertently stumbled across what the men are so desperate to find. This turning point changes the way the play is read, as well as the way you view the wife of the dead man.

Mrs. Wright, accused of murdering her husband, appears almost crazy for just up and killing her spouse. The reader is as confused as the men at first, wondering why on earth would she do it? When you realize, along with the two women, that her motive was his brutal killing of the canary, you suddenly become privy to a secret that the men seemingly never learn. The play uses dramatic irony, where the reader knows the truth but the characters in the play are oblivious.

Zezulka 1

Might it be possible to read their conversation as less trivial (even up to this point) than the male characters do?

Again, though, don’t we have relevant evidence before that about the possible state (and effects) of this marriage, which might be just as relevant to motive? If so, what really makes this moment stand out?

Interesting! Irony certainly is key to the play, but not all the characters are equally “oblivious,” right?

Zezulka 2

Susan Glaspell timed this moment perfectly, giving the reader time to be both confused and then suddenly enlightened.

This turning point breeds sympathy for the accused murderess.

So might the play also turn on the conflict—or at least the contrast—between two possible ways of defining “innocence” or even two kinds of “law”?

Mrs. Wright is no longer just a good wife gone bad. You as the reader follow the emotions of the two women in the empty house and can feel their almost immediate comprehension and understanding of both the situation and the woman involved. The wife becomes someone we can relate to, almost having a just cause for murdering her husband. As I said, Glaspell builds the tension to that point perfectly; the reader is all for the law being upheld until you know what led up to the murder. If you asked me, I'd say he deserved it. The women's discussion of trifles led to the heart of the matter, a turning point that all but justifies John Wright's death.

SAMPLE WRITING: ESSAY

The following sample of student writing demonstrates how you might develop an early response to a play into a more formal and thorough argument about it. In her essay on Susan Glaspell's TRIFLES, Stephanie Ortega explores the relationship among the female characters in order to offer her own answers to more than one of the questions posed in the previous chapter's "Suggestions for Writing": How does Mrs. Peters's character evolve over the course of Trifles? How is that evolution significant to the play's theme, or how might it help to define the play's particular version of feminism?

As always, we encourage you to read the sample with a critical eye, identifying what works and what doesn't so as to discover specific ways to improve your own writing and reading. At what moments in the essay do you find yourself strongly agreeing? discovering something new about or in Glaspell's play? At what moments might you instead find yourself disagreeing or feeling either confused or simply dissatisfied, wanting more? What exactly makes each of these moments especially satisfying, interesting, persuasive, enlightening—or the reverse? If Stephanie Ortega were your classmate, what three specific things would you suggest she do in order to improve the essay in revision? Alternatively, what three qualities or strategies of this essay might you want to emulate in your own work?

A Journey of Sisterhood

Trifles begins at the start of a murder investigation. Mrs. Wright has allegedly murdered her harsh husband, John Wright; and the sheriff and his wife, Mrs. Peters; the county attorney; and the neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Hale, all come to the Wright house to investigate. Throughout the entire play the women are always onstage, whereas the men enter and exit, so the women are the play's focus. But Glaspell's Trifles is a feminist play not only because of that, but also because of how it shows two or even three very different women coming together in sisterhood.

Ortega 2

Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale are first introduced as they stand together by the door of the house where the murder took place, yet though the women stand together, their behavior and views initially seem wide apart. Whereas Mrs. Hale stands up for her counterparts, Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Wright, from the beginning, Mrs. Peters at first tends to stick up more for the men. When the County Attorney makes a remark about Mrs. Wright not having been much of a homemaker and having a dirty home, we see that Mrs. Hale doesn't like men poking in Mrs. Wright's business and having input in the doings of a house. Putting herself in Mrs. Wright's shoes, Mrs. Hale says, "I'd hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing" (1201, emphasis added). But Mrs. Peters states that since it is an investigation, "it's no more than th[e men's] duty" to poke around (1201). Later, when Mrs. Hale actually interferes with the investigation by trying to tidy up the place and re sew the badly stitched quilt they discover, Mrs. Peters steps in, "[n]ervously" saying, "I don't think we ought to touch things" (1204). Mrs. Peters's only view is that of her husband; she knows and seems to care very little about Mrs. Wright or her life before marriage, as Minnie Foster. As far as Mrs. Peters is concerned, "the law is the law" (1203), and she is "married to" it, as the county attorney will say at the end of the play (1207); therefore she must abide by it.

Mrs. Hale's identification with Minnie Foster only intensifies as the play progresses. She remembers Minnie Foster as a carefree woman full of energy and life, bright and cheery like a canary, implying that marriage to John Wright "change[d]" all that (1205). Mrs. Hale starts feeling guilty for not visiting Mrs. Wright, telling Mrs. Peters multiple times that she "wish[es she] had come over sometimes when she was here," and eventually even suggesting that not coming to see Mrs. Wright was "a crime" (1204, 1206).

In part because of the way Mrs. Hale talks about her, Minnie Foster's figurative presence becomes ever stronger, bringing Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters together as they put themselves into her place, speculating about her feelings and responses to the conditions of her life. When the women come upon a box containing a bird that had its neck wrung, Mrs. Hale associates Mr. Wright's presumed killing of the songbird with his destruction of part of Mrs. Wright, speculating about her feelings: "No, Wright wouldn't like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too" (1206). Thus, Mr. Wright's killing of the bird is a symbolic killing of Minnie Foster's spirit. At this point, the women come to understand that Mrs. Wright was indeed the one who killed her husband because when the women realize that Mr. Wright wrung the bird's neck, the women finally know the reason for Mrs. Wright's "funny way" of killing him (1202). (It's now that "Their eyes meet" with "[a] look of growing comprehension, of horror" [1205].)

More important, here is where we really start to see a change in Mrs. Peters. For the first time she, too, interferes with the investigators, even though she doesn't actually destroy evidence or lie, when she responds to a question about the cat by simply saying that there is not one "now" (1205). She expresses sympathy for Minnie Foster and identifies with her, based on her own memories of the way she felt both when her kitten was killed with a hatchet and, much later, when her first baby died, leaving her and her husband alone in the "stillness" of their isolated house (1206). Mrs. Peters also states that had she gotten hold of the boy who killed her kitten long ago she would have gotten revenge just as Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale now speculate that Minnie Foster Wright did. The women each sympathize with Minnie Foster and the distant person she has become, Mrs. Wright.

By sympathizing with Mrs. Wright and paying attention to the “little things” the men don’t consider solid “evidence” (1203), the women have single-handedly sorted out a plausible sequence of events and, more importantly, a reason why Mrs. Wright killed her husband the way she did. Yet rather than reveal what they’ve learned, they slowly, in the silence of mutual sympathy, work together to cover Mrs. Wright’s tracks and to protect her. Mrs. Peters is defying the actual law and starting to protect the law of women and sisterhood instead. Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Peters, and Mrs. Wright become one unit, opposing their intuitive feminine selves to the logical and analytical men.

Although Mrs. Wright never once appears onstage, her presence is what brings all three women closer. They are able to attain information that the men simply overlook. And it is this which brings the women forth in the union of sisterhood at the end of the play as they realize that “We [women] all go through the same things—it’s all just a different kind of the same thing” (1206).

Understanding the Text

26 | ELEMENTS OF DRAMA

Most of us read more fiction than drama and are likely to encounter drama by watching filmed versions of it. Nonetheless, the skills you have developed in reading stories and poems come in handy when you read plays. And just as with fiction and poetry, you will understand and appreciate drama more fully by becoming familiar with the various elements and conventions of the genre.

CHARACTER

Character is possibly the most familiar and accessible of the elements; both fiction and drama feature one or more imaginary persons who take part in the action. The word character refers not only to a person represented in an imagined plot, whether narrated or acted out, but also to the unique qualities that make up a personality. From one point of view, “character” as a part in a plot and “character” as a kind of personality are both predictions: This sort of person is likely to see things from a certain angle and behave in certain ways. Notice that the idea of character includes both the individual differences among people and the classification of similar people into types. Whereas much realistic fiction emphasizes unique individuals rather than general character types, drama often compresses and simplifies personalities—a play has only about two hours at the most (sometimes much less) in which to show situations, appearances, and behaviors, without description or background other than exposition provided in the dialogue. The advantage of portraying character in broader strokes is that it heightens the contrasts between character types, adding to the drama: Differences provoke stronger reactions.

Plays are especially concerned with character because of the concrete manner in which they portray people on the stage. With a few exceptions (such as experiments in multimedia performance), the only words in the performance of a play are spoken by actors, and usually these actors are in character—that is, speaking as though they really are the people they play in the drama. (Rarely, plays have a narrator who observes and comments on the action from the sidelines, and in some plays a character may address the audience directly, but even when the actors apparently step outside of the imaginary frame, they are still part of the play and are still playing characters.) In fiction, the narrator’s description and commentary can guide a reader’s judgment about characters. Reading a play, you will have no such guide because drama relies almost exclusively on indirect characterization (see ch. 4). Apart from some clues about characters in the stage directions, you will need to imagine the appearance, manners, and movement of someone speaking the lines assigned to any one character. You can do this even as you read through a play for the first time, discovering the characters’ attitudes and motivations as the scenes unfold. This ability to predict character and then to revise expectations as situations change is based not only on our experiences of people in real life but also on our familiarity with recurring types of characters or roles.

Consider the patterns of characters in many stories that are narrated or acted out, whether in novels, comic books, television series, Hollywood films, or video games. In many of these forms, there is a leading role, a main character: the protagonist. The titles of plays such as HAMLET or ANTIGONE imply that the play will be about a central character, the chief object of the playwright's and the reader's or audience's concern. Understanding the character of the protagonist—often in contrast with an antagonist, the opponent of the main character—becomes the consuming interest of such a play. Especially in more traditional or popular genres, the protagonist may be called a hero or heroine, and the antagonist may be called the villain. Most characterization in professional theater, however, avoids depicting pure good and pure evil in a fight to the death. Most characters possess both negative and redeeming qualities.

As in other genres that represent people in action, in drama there are minor characters or supporting roles. At least since ancient Rome, romantic comedies have been structured around a leading man and woman, along with a comparable pair (often the “buddies” of the leads) whose problems may be less serious, whose characters may be less complex, or who in other ways support or complicate rather than dominate the action. Sometimes a minor character serves as a foil, a character designed to bring out the qualities of another character by means of contrast. The main point to remember is that all the characters in a drama are interdependent and help characterize each other. Through dialogue and behavior, each brings out what is characteristic in the others.

Like movies, plays must respect certain limitations: the time an audience can be expected to sit and watch, the attention and sympathy an audience is likely to give to various characters, the amount of exposition that can be shown rather than spoken aloud. Because of these constraints, playwrights, screenwriters, casting directors, and actors must rely on shortcuts to convey character. Everyone involved, including the audience, consciously or unconsciously relies on stereotypes of various social roles to flesh out the dramatic action. Even a play that seeks to undermine stereotypes must still invoke them. In the United States today, casting—or typecasting—usually relies on an actor's social identity, from gender and race to occupation, region, and age. However, plays that rely too much on stereotypes, positive or negative, may leave everyone disappointed (or offended); a role that defies stereotypes can be more interesting to perform and to watch. Alternatively, a character can be so exceptional and unfamiliar that audiences will fail to recognize any connection to people they might meet, and their responses will fall flat. All dramatic roles, then, must have some connection to types of personality, and good roles modify such types just enough to make the character interesting. Playwrights often overturn or modify expectations of character in order to surprise an audience. So, too, do the actors who play those parts.

Every performance of a given character, like every production of a play, is an interpretation. Not just “adaptations”—Greek or Elizabethan plays set in modern times and performed in modern dress, for example—but even productions that seek to adhere faithfully to the written play are interpretations of what is vital or essential in it. John Malkovich, in the 1983–84 production of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, did not portray Biff Loman as the outgoing, successful, hail-fellow-well-met jock the play text might lead us to expect, Instead Malkovich saw Biff as only pretending to be a jock. Big-time athletes, he insisted, don't glad-hand people; they wait for people to come to them. The actor did not change the author's words, but by intonation, body language, and "stage business" (wordless gestures and actions) he suggested his own view of the character. In other words, he broke with the expectations associated with the character's type. As you read and develop your own interpretation of a play, try imagining various interpretations of its characters in order to reveal different possible meanings in the drama.

Questions about Character

- Who is the protagonist? Why and how so? Which other characters, if any, are main or major characters? Which are minor characters?
- What are the protagonist's most distinctive traits, and what is most distinctive about his or her outlook and values? What motivates the character? What is it about the character that creates internal and/or external conflict? Which lines or stage directions reveal most about the character?
- What are the roles of other characters? Which, if any, functions as an antagonist? Which, if any, serves as a foil? Does any character function as a narrator or chorus, providing background information and commentary? Why and how so?
- To what extent are any of the characters in the play "types"? How might this affect an audience's experience of the play? In what ways might a director or actor choose to go against the expected types, and how would this complicate the play's overall effect and meaning?
- Which of the characters, or which aspects of the characters, does the play encourage us to sympathize with or to admire? to view negatively? Why and how so? Are there characters who might be more or less sympathetic, depending on how the role is cast and interpreted?
- If you were directing a production of this play, whom among your friends and acquaintances would you cast in each role, and why? If you were directing a movie version, what professional actors would you cast?

PLOT AND STRUCTURE

An important part of any storyteller's task, whether in narrative or dramatic genres, is the invention, selection, and arrangement of some action. Even carefully structured action cannot properly be called a full-scale plot without some unifying sense of purpose. That is, what happens should seem to happen for meaningful reasons. This does not mean, of course, that characters or the audience must be satisfied in their hopes or expectations, or that effective plays need to wrap up every loose end. It does mean that a reader or theatergoer should feel that the playwright has completed this play—that nothing essential is missing—though the play's outcome or overall effect may be difficult to sum up.

Conflict is the engine that drives plot, and the presentation of conflict shapes the dramatic structure of a play. A conflict whose outcome is never in doubt may have other kinds of interest, but it is not truly dramatic. In a dramatic conflict, each of the opposing forces must at some point seem likely to triumph or worthy of such triumph—whether conflict is external (one character versus another, or one group of characters versus another group, each of whom may represent a different world-view) or internal (within a single character torn between competing views, duties, needs, or desires), or even one idea or ideology versus another one. In Hamlet, for example, our interest in the struggle between Hamlet and Claudius depends on their being evenly matched. Claudius has possession of the throne and the queen, but Hamlet's role as the heir to the late king and his popularity with the people offset his opponent's strength.

The typical plot in drama, as in fiction, involves five stages: exposition, rising action, climax, falling action, and conclusion. Exposition, the first phase of plot, provides essential background information about the characters and situation as they exist at the beginning of a play and perhaps also about the events that got the characters to this point—as when, early in Trifles, Mr. Hale describes what happened before the play opens. The second phase, rising action, begins when an inciting incident leads to conflict—as when, in Trifles, the men leave the women alone with what the latter soon discover to be crucial evidence. The moment when the conflict reaches its greatest pitch of intensity and its outcome is decided is the plot's third phase, its climax or turning point—in Trifles, perhaps the discovery of the dead bird and the act of covering up the evidence. The fourth stage, falling action, brings a release of emotional tension and moves the characters toward the resolution of their conflict and the plot itself toward its fifth and final stage, the conclusion. In Trifles, the men's return to the kitchen because, they believe, no evidence has been found can be called the falling action. The women's apparent decision to remain mute about what they have discovered can be called the resolution. The play concludes as the characters leave the Wrights' house.

Unlike Trifles, some lengthy plays feature more than one plot. In such cases, the plot to which less time and attention is devoted is called the subplot.

Many older plays in the Western tradition, such as Shakespeare's, have five acts, each act roughly corresponding to—and thus emphasizing—a particular phase of plot. Acts are often further subdivided into scenes, each of which usually takes place in a somewhat different time and place and features a somewhat different combination of characters. Ancient Greek plays such as OEDIPUS THE KING are structured differently, such that individual scenes or episodes are separated by choral songs—that is, odes spoken or sung by the group of characters known as the chorus. Modern plays tend to have fewer acts and scenes than those of earlier eras, and plays such as Trifles—in which the action unfolds continuously and, usually, in a single time and place—have become so common that they have their own name: the one-act play.

In the performance of a play longer than one act, it has become customary to have at least one intermission, in part for the practical reason that the audience may need restrooms or refreshments. Breaks may be signaled by turning down stage lights, turning up the house lights, and lowering the curtain (if there is one).

On rare occasions, very long plays (such as Tony Kushner's Angels in America [1992–93]) are performed over more than one evening, with the obvious challenge of finding an audience willing and able to afford tickets and time for more than one performance; those who read such play “cycles” or sequences at their own pace at home have a certain advantage.

The key point is that the form of a play and the breaks between scenes or acts result from the nature of the play. Breaks can create suspense—a curtain comes down after an unexplained gunshot—or they can provide relief from tension or an emotional crisis.

Questions about Plot

- Read the first scene or the first few pages and then stop. What potential for conflict do you see here? What do you expect to happen in the rest of the play?
- How is the play divided into acts, scenes, or episodes, if at all? What is the effect of this structure? Does the division of the play correspond at all to the five stages of plot development—exposition, rising action, climax, resolution, conclusion?
- Does the play show a relatively clear progression through the traditional stages of plot development, or does it seem to defy such conventions? If so, how, and what might the playwright achieve through these departures from tradition?
- What is the inciting incident or destabilizing event? How and why does this event destabilize the initial situation? How would you describe the conflict that develops? To what extent is it external, internal, or both?
- What is the climax, or turning point? Why and how so? How is the conflict resolved? How and why might this resolution fulfill or defy your expectations?

STAGES, SETS, AND SETTING

Most of us have been to a theater at one time or another, and we know what a conventional modern stage (the proscenium stage) looks like: a room with the wall missing between us and it (the so-called fourth wall). So when we read a modern play—that is, one written during the past two or three hundred years—and imagine it taking place before us, we think of it as happening on this kind of stage. Though there are also other modern types of stages—the thrust stage, where the audience sits around three sides of the major acting area, and the arena stage, where the audience sits all the way around the acting area and players make their entrances and their exits through the auditorium—most plays today are performed on a proscenium stage. Most of the plays in this book can be readily imagined as taking place on such a stage.

Ancient Greek and Elizabethan plays, including those of Shakespeare, were originally staged quite differently from most modern plays, however, and although they may be played today on a proscenium stage, we might be confused as we read if we are unaware of the layout of the theaters for which they were first written. In the Greek theater, the audience sat on a raised semicircle of seats (amphitheater) half-way around a circular area (orchestra) used primarily for dancing by the chorus. At the back of the orchestra was the skene, or stage house, representing the palace or temple before which the action took place. Shakespeare's stage, in contrast, basically involved a rectangular area built inside one end of a large enclosure like a circular walled-in yard; the audience stood on the ground or sat in stacked balconies around three sides of the principal acting area (rather like a thrust stage). There were additional acting areas on either side of this stage, as well as a recessed area at its back

(which could represent Gertrude's chamber in Hamlet, for example) and an upper acting area (which could serve as Juliet's balcony in Romeo and Juliet). A trapdoor in the stage floor was used for occasional effects; the ghost of Hamlet's father probably entered and exited this way. Until three centuries ago—and certainly in Shakespeare's time—plays for large paying audiences were performed outdoors in daylight because of the difficulty and expense of lighting. If you are curious about Shakespeare's stage, you can visit a reconstruction of his Globe Theatre in Southwark, London, England, either in person or online at www.shakespearesglobe.com. Every summer, plays by Shakespeare are performed there for large international audiences willing to sit on hard benches around the arena or to stand as “groundlings” (a lucky few of whom can lean on the stage near the feet of the actors). The walls in the background of the stage are beautifully carved and painted, but there is no painted scenery, minimal furniture, few costume changes, no lighting, and no curtain around the stage (a cloth hanging usually covers the recessed area at the back of the stage). Three or four musicians may play period instruments on the balcony.

As the design of the Globe suggests, the conventions of dramatic writing and stage production have changed considerably over the centuries. Certainly this is true of the way playwrights convey a sense of place—one of the two key ingredients that make up a play's setting. Usually the audience is asked to imagine that the featured section of the auditorium is actually a particular place somewhere else. The audience of course knows it is a stage, more or less bare or elaborately disguised, but they accept it as a kitchen, a public square, a wooded park, an open road, or a room in a castle or a hut. Oedipus the King takes place entirely before the palace at Thebes. Following the general convention of ancient Greek drama, the play's setting never changes. When the action demands the presence of Teiresias, for example, the scene does not shift to him; instead, escorts bring him to the front of the palace. Similarly, important events that take place elsewhere are described by witnesses who arrive on the scene.

In Shakespeare's theater the conventions of place are quite different: The acting arena does not represent a single specific place but assumes a temporary identity according to the characters who inhabit it, their costumes, and their speeches. At the opening of Hamlet we know we are at a sentry station because a man dressed as a soldier challenges two others. By line 15, we know that we are in Denmark because the actors profess to be “liegemen to the Dane.” At the end of the scene the actors leave the stage and in a sense take the sentry station with them. Shortly thereafter, a group of people dressed in court costumes and a man and a woman wearing crowns appear. As a theater audience, we must surmise from the costumes and dialogue that the acting area has now become a royal court; when we read the play, the stage directions give us a cue that the place has changed.

In a modern play, there are likely to be several changes of scene, sometimes marked by the lowering of the curtain or the darkening of the stage while different sets and props are arranged. Sets (the design, decoration, and scenery) and props (articles or objects used onstage) vary greatly in modern productions of plays written in any period. Sometimes space is merely suggested—a circle of sand at one end of the stage, a blank wall behind—to emphasize universal themes or to stimulate the audience's imagination. Often, a set instead uses realistic aids to the imagination. The set of Trifles, for example, must include at least a sink, a cupboard, a stove, a small table, a large kitchen table, and a rocking chair, as well as certain props: a birdcage, quilting pieces, and an ornamental box.

Time is the second key ingredient of setting, and conventions for representing time have also altered across the centuries. Three or four centuries ago, European dramatists and critics admired the conventions of classical Greek drama which, they believed, dictated that the action of a play should represent a very short time—sometimes as short as the actual performance time (two or three hours), and certainly no longer than a single day. This unity of time, one of the three so-called classical unities, impels a dramatist to select the moment when a stable situation should change and to fill in the necessary prior details by exposition. (These same critics maintained that a play should be unified in place and action as well; the kind of leaping from Denmark to England, or from court to forest, that happens in Shakespeare's plays, as well as subplots, were off-limits according to such standards. In Trifles, which observes the three classical unities, all the action before the investigators' visit to the farmhouse is summarized by characters during their brief visit, and the kitchen is the only part of the house seen by the audience.)

When there are gaps and shifts in time, they are often indicated between scenes with the help of scenery, sound effects, stage directions, or notes in the program. An actor must assist in conveying the idea of time if his or her character appears at different ages. Various conventions of classical or Elizabethan drama have also worked effectively to communicate to the audience the idea of the passage of time, from the choral odes in Oedipus the King to the breaks between scenes in Shakespeare plays.

Action within a play thus can take place in a wide range of locations and over many years rather than in the one place and the twenty-four-hour period demanded by critics who believed in the classical unities. And we can learn much about how a particular play works and what it means by paying attention to the way it handles setting and sets.

Questions about Setting and Staging

- Does all the action occur in one time and place, or in more than one? If the latter, what are those times and places? How much time tends to pass between scenes or episodes?
- How important do the general time, place, and social milieu seem to be, and in what ways are they important? What about the plot and characters would remain the same if a director chose to set the play in a different time and place? What wouldn't?
- What patterns do you notice regarding where and when things happen? Which characters are associated with each setting? How do different characters relate to the same setting? When, how, and why do scenes change from one setting to another? Are there significant deviations?
- Do the stage directions describe particular settings and props in detail? If so, what seems significant about the details? How might they establish mood, reveal character, and affect individual characters and their interactions with one another? Is there anything in the stage directions that seems to be intended more for readers than for a director staging a production?
- Does the date of the play tell you anything about the way it was originally intended to be staged? Does the representation of time and place in the play implicitly call for a certain type of stage?

If you were staging the play today, what kind of stage, sets, and props might you use, and why? How might your choices affect how the play works on audiences and what it means to them?

TONE, LANGUAGE, AND SYMBOL

In plays, as in other literary genres, tone is difficult to specify or explain. Perhaps tone is especially important in drama because it is, in performance, a spoken form, and vocal tone always affects the meaning of spoken words to some extent, in any culture or language. The actor—and any reader who wishes to imagine a play as spoken aloud—must infer from the written language just how to read a line, what tone of voice to use. The choice of tone must be a negotiation between the words of the playwright and the interpretation and skill of the actor or reader. At times stage directions will specify the tone of a line of dialogue, though even that must be only a hint, since there are many ways of speaking “intensely” or “angrily.” Find a line in one of the plays printed here that has a stage direction telling the actor how to deliver it, and with one or two other people take turns saying it that way. If nothing else, such an experiment may help you appreciate the talent of good actors who can put on a certain tone of voice and make it seem natural and convincing. But it will also show you the many options for interpreting tone.

Dramatic irony, in which a character’s perception is contradicted by what the audience knows, and even situational irony, in which a character’s (and the audience’s) expectations about what will happen are contradicted by what actually does happen, are relatively easy to detect. But verbal irony, in which a statement implies a meaning quite different from its obvious, literal meaning, can be fairly subtle and easy to miss. In the absence of clear stage directions, verbal irony—like other aspects of tone—can also be a matter of interpretation. That is, directors and actors, as well as readers and audiences, will often have to decide which lines in a play should be interpreted ironically. All three types of irony are nonetheless crucial to drama. As the very term dramatic irony suggests, drama—even more than fiction—depends for its effects on gaps between what the various characters and the audience know. And situational irony—the gap between expectations and outcomes and even between what characters seem to deserve and what they get—is an especially key component of tragedy.

Never hesitate to apply to drama the skills you have developed in interpreting poetry; after all, most early plays were written in some form of verse. Aspects of poetry often emerge in modern plays; for example, monologues or extended speeches by one character, while they rarely rhyme or have regular meter, may allow greater eloquence than is usual in everyday speech and may include revealing imagery and figures of speech. A character in Lorraine Hansberry’s A Raisin in the Sun, for example, uses personification, as well as alliteration, to great effect when she remarks (in act 3) that “death done come in this here house [. . .] Done come walking in my house.”

Simple actions or objects, too, often have metaphorical significance or turn into symbols. Effective plays often use props in this way, as Trifles does with the bird and its cage. And some plays, like some poems, may even be organized around controlling metaphors. As you read, pay close attention to metaphors or images, whether in language or in more concrete form.

Allusions, references to other works of literature or art or something else external to the play, can enrich the text in similar ways. The title of Tom Stoppard’s comedy The Real Inspector Hound (1968), for example, seems to allude to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle’s novel The Hound of the Baskervilles (1901–02), featuring Sherlock Holmes. Doyle’s novel is a classic in the detective fiction genre, which Stoppard’s Inspector Hound parodies. In a more serious vein, though New Orleans, where Tennessee Williams's A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE takes place, actually does contain a street called Elysian Fields, the play gets a good deal of symbolic mileage out of using this as a setting thanks to the allusion to Greek mythology (in which the Elysian Fields were the final resting place of heroic and virtuous souls). Awareness of all the stylistic choices in a play can help you reach a clearer, more comprehensive interpretation of it.

Questions about Tone, Language, and Symbol

- Which lines in the play strike you as most ambiguous when it comes to the tone in which they should be spoken? Why and how so? What is the effect of that ambiguity, or how might an actor's or reader's decision about tone here affect the play as a whole?
- How would you describe the overall tone of the whole play? Do any moments or entire scenes or acts in the play seem interestingly different in terms of their tone?
- How do the play's characters differ from one another in terms of their tone? Does any character's tone change over the course of the play?
- Are any details—such as names; actions or statements; references to objects, props, or other details of setting; or allusions, metaphors, or other figures of speech—repeated throughout the play? Do any of these repeated details seem to have special significance? If so, what might that significance be?
- What types of irony, if any, are at work in the play? What is the effect of the irony?

THEME

Theme—a statement a work seems to make about a given issue or subject—is by its very nature the most comprehensive of the elements, embracing the impact of the entire work. Indeed, theme is not part of the work but is abstracted from it by the reader or audience. Since we, as interpreters, infer the theme and put it in our own words, we understandably often disagree about it. To arrive at your own statement of a theme, you need to consider all the elements of a play together: character, structure, setting (including time and place), tone, and other aspects of the style or the potential staging that create the entire effect.

Tips for Identifying Theme

Because theme emerges from a work in its entirety and from all the other elements working together, there's no one-size-fits-all method for discovering theme. Here, however, are some things to look for and consider as you read and re-read a play.

- Pay attention to the title. A title will seldom indicate a play's theme directly, but some titles do suggest a central topic or a key question. Probe the rest of the play to see what insights, if any, about that topic or answers to that question it ultimately seems to offer.

- Identify any statements that the characters make about a general concept, issue, or topic such as human nature, the natural world, and so on, particularly in monologues or in debates between major characters. Look, too, for statements that potentially have a general meaning or application beyond the play, even if they refer to a specific situation. Then consider whether and how the play as a whole corroborates, overturns, or complicates any one such view or statement.
- If a character changes over the course of the play, try to articulate the truth or insight that character seems to discover. Then consider whether and how the play as a whole corroborates or complicates that insight.
- Identify a conflict depicted in the play and state it in general terms or turn it into a general question, leaving out any reference to specific characters, setting, and so on. Then think about the insight or theme that might be implied by the way the conflict is resolved.

Above all, try to understand a play on its own terms and to separate interpretation from evaluation. You may dislike symbolic or unrealistic drama until you get more used to it; if a play is not supposed to represent what real people would do in everyday life, then it should not be criticized for failing to do so. Alternatively, you may find realistic plays about ordinary adults in middle America in the mid-twentieth century to be lacking in excitement or appeal. Yet if you read carefully, you may discover vigorous, moving portrayals of people trapped in situations all too familiar to them, if alien to you. Tastes may vary as widely as tones of speech, but if you are familiar with the elements of drama and the ways dramatic conventions vary over time and across cultures, you can become a good judge of theatrical literature, and you will notice more and more of the fine effects it can achieve. Nothing replaces the exhilaration and immediacy of a live theater performance, but reading and re-reading plays can yield a rich and rewarding appreciation of the dramatic art. A great play is one that works on the page as well as on the stage.

AUGUST WILSON

(1945–2005)

Fences

August Wilson died of liver cancer when he was only sixty. One of the most important dramatists in American theater history, he had come a long way, the hard way. Frederick August Kittel, Jr. (who would later take his mother's maiden name), was the son of a white, German-born baker and his wife, a black cleaning woman who singlehandedly raised their six children in Pittsburgh's down-at-heel Hill District. In 1957, when Wilson was twelve, his mother remarried. Her new husband was an African American sewer-department worker who, as Wilson learned only after his stepfather's death, had been both a high-school football star unable to secure a college scholarship and an ex-convict. After a series of bad experiences, Wilson left school at fifteen. Armed with a tenth-grade education, he took on a number of menial jobs, read his way through the public library, and served briefly in the army. In 1968, he returned to the Hill, cofounding the Black Horizon Theater and debuting his first play. Fourteen years later, Wilson struck artistic gold with Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (1982), his first Broadway play and the second in what would become a ten-play cycle. Set mostly in the Hill and chronicling African American life in every decade of the twentieth century, the series earned Wilson two Pulitzers (for Fences, 1987, and The Piano Lesson, 1990); a Tony (for Fences); a Grammy (for the Ma Rainey's cast album); an Emmy (for his adaption of Piano Lesson); and eight Drama Critics Circle awards. Wilson often described Fences as his least representative, most conventional play, thanks to the way it revolves around a single “big character.” Yet this, his best-known work, is also arguably among his most personal, set in the period of his youth and aimed, he said, at “uncover[ing] the nobility and the dignity” of the adults he grew up around—“that generation, which shielded its children from all of the indignities they went through.”

1. Influential Canadian American director-actor (1919–2006) whom August Wilson called his “guide, mentor, and provocateur.” The first black director of a Broadway play (Lorraine Hansberry’s A Raisin in the Sun, 1959, p. 1506), artistic director of the Eugene O’Neill Theater Center and the Yale Repertory Theatre, and dean of the Yale School of Drama, Richards oversaw the first productions of all of Wilson’s plays, beginning with Ma Rainey’s Black Bottom (1982).

SETTING: The setting is the yard which fronts the only entrance to the Maxson household, an ancient two-story brick house set back off a small alley in a big-city neighborhood. The entrance to the house is gained by two or three steps leading to a wooden porch badly in need of paint.

A relatively recent addition to the house and running its full width, the porch lacks congruence. It is a sturdy porch with a flat roof. One or two chairs of dubious value sit at one end where the kitchen window opens onto the porch. An old-fashioned icebox stands silent guard at the opposite end.

The yard is a small dirt yard, partially fenced (except during the last scene), with a wooden sawhorse, a pile of lumber, and other fence-building equipment off to the side. Opposite is a tree from which hangs a ball made of rags. A baseball bat leans against the tree. Two oil drums serve as garbage receptacles and sit near the house at right to complete the setting.

THE PLAY: Near the turn of the century, the destitute of Europe sprang on the city with tenacious claws and an honest and solid dream. The city devoured them. They swelled its belly until it burst into a thousand furnaces and sewing machines, a thousand butcher shops and bakers' ovens, a thousand churches and hospitals and funeral parlors and moneylenders. The city grew. It nourished itself and offered each man a partnership limited only by his talent, his guile and his willingness and capacity for hard work. For the immigrants of Europe, a dream dared and won true.

The descendants of African slaves were offered no such welcome or participation. They came from places called the Carolinas and the Virginias, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. They came strong, eager, searching. The city rejected them and they fled and settled along the riverbanks and under bridges in shallow, ramshackle houses made of sticks and tar paper. They collected rags and wood. They sold the use of their muscles and their bodies. They cleaned houses and washed clothes, they shined shoes, and in quiet desperation and vengeful pride, they stole, and lived in pursuit of their own dream. That they could breathe free, finally, and stand to meet life with the force of dignity and whatever eloquence the heart could call upon.

By 1957, the hard-won victories of the European immigrants had solidified the industrial might of America. War had been confronted and won with new energies that used loyalty and patriotism as its fuel. Life was rich, full and flourishing. The Milwaukee Braves won the World Series, and the hot winds of change that would make the sixties a turbulent, racing, dangerous and provocative decade had not yet begun to blow full.

*When the sins of our fathers visit us
We do not have to play host.
We can banish them with forgiveness
As God, in His Largeness and Laws.*

—AUGUST WILSON

ACT ONE

Scene 1

It is 1957. Troy and Bono enter the yard, engaged in conversation. Troy is fifty-three years old, a large man with thick, heavy hands; it is this largeness that he strives to fill out and make an accommodation with. Together with his blackness, his largeness informs his sensibilities and the choices he has made in his life.

Of the two men, Bono is obviously the follower. His commitment to their friendship of thirty-odd years is rooted in his admiration of Troy's honesty, capacity for hard work, and his strength, which Bono seeks to emulate.

It is Friday night, payday, and the one night of the week the two men engage in a ritual of talk and drink. Troy is usually the most talkative and at times he can be crude and almost vulgar, though he is capable of rising to profound heights of expression. The men carry lunch buckets and wear or carry burlap aprons and are dressed in clothes suitable to their jobs as garbage collectors.

BONO: Troy, you ought to stop that lying!

TROY: I ain't lying! The nigger had a watermelon this big. (Indicates with his hands) Talking about . . . "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" I like to fell out! "What watermelon, Mr. Rand?" . . . And it sitting there big as life.

BONO: What did Mr. Rand say?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. Figure if the nigger too dumb to know he carrying a watermelon, he wasn't gonna get much sense out of him. Trying to hide that great big old watermelon under his coat. Afraid to let the white man see him carry it home.

BONO: I'm like you . . . I ain't got no time for them kind of people.

TROY: Now what he look like getting mad 'cause he see the man from the union talking to Mr. Rand?

BONO: He come talking to me about . . . "Maxson gonna get us fired." I told him to get away from me with that. He walked away from me calling you a troublemaker. What Mr. Rand say?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. He told me to go down the commissioner's office next Friday. They called me down there to see them.

BONO: Well, as long as you got your complaint filed, they can't fire you. That's what one of them white fellows tell me.

TROY: I ain't worried about them firing me. They gonna fire me 'cause I asked a question? That's all I did. I went to Mr. Rand and asked him, "Why? Why you got the white mens driving and the colored lifting?" Told him, "What's the matter, don't I count? You think only white fellows got sense enough to drive a truck. That ain't no paper job! Hell, anybody can drive a truck. How come you got all whites driving and the colored lifting?" He told me, "Take it to the union." Well, hell, that's what I done! Now they wanna come up with this pack of lies.

BONO: I told Brownie if the man come and ask him any questions . . . just tell the truth! It ain't nothing but something they done trumped up on you 'cause you filed a complaint on them.

TROY: Brownie don't understand nothing. All I want them to do is change the job description. Give everybody a chance to drive the truck. Brownie can't see that. He ain't got that much sense.

BONO: How you figure he be making out with that gal be up at 'Taylors' all the time . . . that Alberta gal?

TROY: Same as you and me. Getting as much as we is. Which is to say nothing.

BONO: It is, huh? I figure you doing a little better than me . . . and I ain't saying what I'm doing.

TROY: Aw, nigger, look here . . . I know you. If you had got anywhere near that gal, twenty minutes later you be looking to tell somebody. And the first one you gonna tell . . . that you gonna want to brag to . . . is gonna be me.

BONO: I ain't saying that. I see where you be eyeing her.

TROY: I eye all the women. I don't miss nothing. Don't never let nobody tell you Troy Maxson don't eye the women.

BONO: You been doing more than eyeing her. You done bought her a drink or two.

TROY: Hell yeah, I bought her a drink! What that mean? I bought you one, too. What that mean 'cause I buy her a drink? I'm just being polite.

BONO: It's all right to buy her one drink. That's what you call being polite. But when you wanna be buying two or three . . . that's what you call eyeing her.

TROY: Look here, as long as you known me . . . you ever known me to chase after women?

BONO: Hell yeah! Long as I done known you. You forgetting I knew you when.

TROY: Naw, I'm talking about since I been married to Rose?

BONO: Oh, not since you been married to Rose. Now, that's the truth, there. I can say that.

TROY: All right then! Case closed.

BONO: I see you be walking up around Alberta's house. You supposed to be at 'Taylors' and you be walking up around there.

TROY: What you watching where I'm walking for? I ain't watching after you.

BONO: I seen you walking around there more than once.

TROY: Hell, you liable to see me walking anywhere! That don't mean nothing 'cause you see me walking around there.

BONO: Where she come from anyway? She just kinda showed up one day.

TROY: Tallahassee. You can look at her and tell she one of them Florida gals. They got some big healthy women down there. Grow them right up out the ground. Got a little bit of Indian in her. Most of them niggers down in Florida got some Indian in them.

BONO: I don't know about that Indian part. But she damn sure big and healthy. Woman wear some big stockings. Got them great big old legs and hips as wide as the Mississippi River.

TROY: Legs don't mean nothing. You don't do nothing but push them out of the way. But them hips cushion the ride!

BONO: Troy, you ain't got no sense.

TROY: It's the truth! Like you riding on Goodyears!

(Rose enters from the house. She is ten years younger than Troy. Her devotion to him stems from her recognition of the possibilities of her life without him: a succession of abusive men and their babies, a life of partying and running the streets, the church, or aloneness with its attendant pain and frustration. She recognizes Troy's spirit as a fine and illuminating one and she either ignores or forgives his faults, only some of which she recognizes. Though she doesn't drink, her presence is an integral part of the Friday night rituals. She alternates between the porch and the kitchen, where supper preparations are under way.)

ROSE: What you all out here getting into?

TROY: What you worried about what we getting into for? This is men talk, woman.

ROSE: What I care what you talking about? Bono, you gonna stay for supper?

BONO: No, I thank you, Rose. But Lucille say she cooking up a pot of pigfeet.

TROY: Pigfeet! Hell, I'm going home with you! Might even stay the night if you got some pigfeet. You got something in there to top them pigfeet, Rose?

ROSE: I'm cooking up some chicken. I got some chicken and collard greens.

TROY: Well, go on back in the house and let me and Bono finish what we was talking about. This is men talk. I got some talk for you later. You know what kind of talk I mean. You go on and powder it up.

ROSE: Troy Maxson, don't you start that now!

TROY (Puts his arm around her): Aw, woman . . . come here. Look here, Bono . . . when I met this woman . . . I got out that place, say, "Hitch up my pony, saddle up my mare . . . there's a woman out there for me somewhere. I looked here. Looked there. Saw Rose and latched on to her." I latched on to her and told her—I'm gonna tell you the truth—I told her, "Baby, I don't wanna marry, I just wanna be your man." Rose told me . . . tell him what you told me, Rose.

ROSE: I told him if he wasn't the marrying kind, then move out the way so the marrying kind could find me.

TROY: That's what she told me. "Nigger, you in my way. You blocking the view! Move out the way so I can find me a husband." I thought it over two or three days. Come back—

ROSE: Ain't no two or three days nothing. You was back the same night.

TROY: Come back, told her . . . "Okay, baby . . . but I'm gonna buy me a banty rooster and put him out there in the backyard . . . and when he see a stranger come, he'll flap his wings and crow . . ." Look here, Bono, I could watch the front door by myself . . . it was that back door I was worried about.

ROSE: Troy, you ought not talk like that. Troy ain't doing nothing but telling a lie.

TROY: Only thing is . . . when we first got married . . . forget the rooster . . . we ain't had no yard!

BONO: I hear you tell it. Me and Lucille was staying down there on Logan Street. Had two rooms with the outhouse in the back. I ain't mind the outhouse none. But when that goddamn wind blow through there in the winter . . . that's what I'm talking about! To this day I wonder why in the hell I ever stayed down there for six long years. But see, I didn't know I could do no better. I thought only white folks had inside toilets and things.

ROSE: There's a lot of people don't know they can do no better than they doing now. That's just something you got to learn. A lot of folks still shop at Bella's.

TROY: Ain't nothing wrong with shopping at Bella's. She got fresh food.

ROSE: I ain't said nothing about if she got fresh food. I'm talking about what she charge. She charge ten cents more than the A&P.²

2. By the 1930s, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, so named in 1859, was the leading supermarket chain in the United States.

TROY: The A&P ain't never done nothing for me. I spends my money where I'm treated right. I go down to Bella, say, "I need a loaf of bread, I'll pay you Friday." She give it to me. What sense that make when I got money to go and spend it somewhere else and ignore the person who done right by me? That ain't in the Bible.

ROSE: We ain't talking about what's in the Bible. What sense it make to shop there when she overcharge?

TROY: You shop where you want to. I'll do my shopping where the people been good to me.

ROSE: Well, I don't think it's right for her to overcharge. That's all I was saying.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to get on. Lucille be raising all kind of hell.

TROY: Where you going, nigger? We ain't finished this pint. Come here, finish this pint.

BONO: Well, hell, I am . . . if you ever turn the bottle loose.

TROY (Hands him the bottle): The only thing I say about the A&P is I'm glad Cory got that job down there. Help him take care of his school clothes and things. Gabe done moved out and things getting tight around here. He got that job . . . He can start to look out for himself.

ROSE: Cory done went and got recruited by a college football team.

TROY: I told that boy about that football stuff. The white man ain't gonna let him get nowhere with that football. I told him when he first come to me with it. Now you come telling me he done went and got more tied up in it. He ought to go and get recruited in how to fix cars or something where he can make a living.

ROSE: He ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's just something the boys in school do. They gonna send a recruiter by to talk to you. He'll tell you he ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's a honor to be recruited.

TROY: It ain't gonna get him nowhere. Bono'll tell you that.

BONO: If he be like you in the sports . . . he's gonna be all right. Ain't but two men ever played baseball as good as you. That's Babe Ruth and Josh Gibson.³ Them's the only two men ever hit more home runs than you.

TROY: What it ever get me? Ain't got a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of.

ROSE: Times have changed since you was playing baseball, Troy. That was before the war.⁴ Times have changed a lot since then.

TROY: How in hell they done changed?

ROSE: They got lots of colored boys playing ball now. Baseball and football.

BONO: You right about that, Rose. Times have changed, Troy. You just come along too early.

TROY: There ought not never have been no time called too early! Now you take that fellow . . . what's that fellow they had playing right field for the Yankees back then? You know who I'm talking about, Bono. Used to play right field for the Yankees.

3. Georgia-born catcher (1911–47) often called "the black Babe Ruth." Hailed by the Baseball Hall of Fame as "the greatest power hitter in black baseball," he died three months before integration of the major leagues. Babe Ruth: legendary outfielder, pitcher, and power hitter (1895–1948) for the Boston Red Sox and New York Yankees.

4. World War II (1939–45).

ROSE: Selkirk?⁵

TROY: Selkirk! That's it! Man batting .269, understand? .269. What kind of sense that make? I was hitting .432 with thirty-seven home runs! Man batting .269 and playing right field for the Yankees! I saw Josh Gibson's daughter yesterday. She walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet. Now I bet you Selkirk's daughter ain't walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet! I bet you that!

ROSE: They got a lot of colored baseball players now. Jackie Robinson⁶ was the first. Folks had to wait for Jackie Robinson.

TROY: I done seen a hundred niggers play baseball better than Jackie Robinson. Hell, I know some teams Jackie Robinson couldn't even make! What you talking about Jackie Robinson. Jackie Robinson wasn't nobody. I'm talking about if you could play ball then they ought to have let you play. Don't care what color you were. Come telling me I come along too early. If you could play . . . then they ought to have let you play.

(Troy takes a long drink from the bottle.)

ROSE: You gonna drink yourself to death. You don't need to be drinking like that.

TROY: Death ain't nothing. I done seen him. Done wrassled with him. You can't tell me nothing about death. Death ain't nothing but a fastball on the outside corner. And you know what I'll do to that! Lookee here, Bono . . . am I lying? You get one of them fastballs, about waist high, over the outside corner of the plate where you can get the meat of the bat on it . . . and good God! You can kiss it good-bye. Now, am I lying?

BONO: Naw, you telling the truth there. I seen you do it.

TROY: If I'm lying . . . that 450 feet worth of lying! (Pause) That's all death is to me. A fastball on the outside corner.

ROSE: I don't know why you want to get on talking about death.

TROY: Ain't nothing wrong with talking about death. That's part of life. Everybody gonna die. You gonna die, I'm gonna die. Bono's gonna die. Hell, we all gonna die.

ROSE: But you ain't got to talk about it. I don't like to talk about it.

TROY: You the one brought it up. Me and Bono was talking about baseball . . . you tell me I'm gonna drink myself to death. Ain't that right, Bono? You know I don't drink this but one night out of the week. That's Friday night. I'm gonna drink just enough to where I can handle it. Then I cuts it loose. I leave it alone. So don't you worry about me drinking myself to death. 'Cause I ain't worried about Death. I done seen him. I done wrestled with him.

Look here, Bono . . . I looked up one day and Death was marching straight at me. Like Soldiers on Parade! The Army of Death was marching straight at me. The middle of July, 1941. It got real cold just like it be winter. It seem like Death himself reached out and touched me on the shoulder. He touch me just like I touch you. I got cold as ice and Death standing there grinning at me.

ROSE: Troy, why don't you hush that talk.

5. George Selkirk (1908–87), Canadian-born player who succeeded Babe Ruth as the New York Yankees right fielder.

6. Brooklyn Dodgers first baseman (1919–72); in 1947, he became the first black player in the major leagues and, in 1949, the first black winner of the National League MVP Award.

TROY: I say . . . What you want, Mr. Death? You be wanting me? You done brought your army to be getting me? I looked him dead in the eye. I wasn't fearing nothing. I was ready to tangle. Just like I'm ready to tangle now. The Bible say be ever vigilant. That's why I don't get but so drunk. I got to keep watch.

ROSE: Troy was right down there in Mercy Hospital. You remember he had pneumonia? Laying there with a fever talking plumb out of his head.

TROY: Death standing there staring at me . . . carrying that sickle in his hand. Finally he say, "You want bound over for another year?" See, just like that . . . "You want bound over for another year?" I told him, "Bound over hell! Let's settle this now!"

It seem like he kinda fell back when I said that, and all the cold went out of me. I reached down and grabbed that sickle and threw it just as far as I could throw it . . . and me and him commenced to wrestling.

We wrestled for three days and three nights. I can't say where I found the strength from. Every time it seemed like he was gonna get the best of me, I'd reach way down deep inside myself and find the strength to do him one better.

ROSE: Every time Troy tell that story he find different ways to tell it. Different things to make up about it.

TROY: I ain't making up nothing. I'm telling you the facts of what happened. I wrestled with Death for three days and three nights and I'm standing here to tell you about it. (Pause) All right. At the end of the third night we done weakened each other to where we can't hardly move. Death stood up, throwed on his robe . . . had him a white robe with a hood on it. He throwed on that robe and went off to look for his sickle. Say, "I'll be back." Just like that. "I'll be back." I told him say, "Yeah, but . . . you gonna have to find me!" I wasn't no fool. I wasn't going looking for him. Death ain't nothing to play with. And I know he's gonna get me. I know I got to join his army . . . his camp followers. But as long as I keep my strength and see him coming . . . as long as I keep up my vigilance . . . he's gonna have to fight to get me. I ain't going easy.

BONO: Well, look here, since you got to keep up your vigilance . . . let me have the bottle.

TROY: Aw hell, I shouldn't have told you that part. I should have left out that part.

ROSE: Troy be talking that stuff and half the time don't even know what he be talking about.

TROY: Bono know me better than that.

BONO: That's right. I know you. I know you got some Uncle Remus⁷ in your blood.

You got more stories than the devil got sinners.

TROY: Aw hell, I done seen him too! Done talked with the devil.

ROSE: Troy, don't nobody want to be hearing all that stuff.

(Lyons enters the yard from the street. Thirty-four years old, Troy's son from a previous marriage, he sports a neatly trimmed goatee, sport coat and white shirt, tieless and buttoned at the collar. Though he fancies himself a musician, he is more caught up in the rituals and "idea" of being a musician than in the actual practice of the music. He has come to borrow money from Troy and, while he knows he will be successful, he is uncertain as to what extent his lifestyle will be held up to scrutiny and ridicule.)

LYONS: Hey, Pop.

TROY: What you come "Hey, Popping" me for?

LYONS: How you doing, Rose? (Kisses her) Mr. Bono. How you doing?

BONO: Hey, Lyons . . . how you been?

TROY: He must have been doing all right. I ain't seen him around here last week.

ROSE: Troy, leave your boy alone. He come by to see you and you wanna start all that nonsense.

TROY: I ain't bothering Lyons. (Offers him the bottle) Here, get you a drink. We got an understanding. I know why he come by to see me and he know I know.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . . I just stopped by to say hi . . . see how you was doing.

TROY: You ain't stopped by yesterday.

ROSE: You gonna stay for supper, Lyons? I got some chicken cooking in the oven.

LYONS: No, Rose . . . thanks. I was just in the neighborhood and thought I'd stop by for a minute.

TROY: You was in the neighborhood all right, nigger. You telling the truth there. You was in the neighborhood 'cause it's my payday.

LYONS: Well, hell, since you mentioned it . . . let me have ten dollars.

TROY: I'll be damned! I'll die and go to hell and play blackjack with the devil before I give you ten dollars.

BONO: That's what I want to know about . . . that devil you done seen.

LYONS: What . . . Pop done seen the devil? You too much, Pops.

TROY: Yeah, I done seen him. Talked to him too!

ROSE: You ain't seen no devil. I done told you that man ain't had nothing to do with the devil. Anything you can't understand, you want to call it the devil.

TROY: Look here, Bono . . . I went down to see Hertzberger about some furniture. Got three rooms for two-ninety-eight. That what it say on the radio. "Three rooms . . . two-ninety-eight." Even made up a little song about it. Go down there . . . man tell me I can't get no credit. I'm working every day and can't get no credit. What to do? I got an empty house with some raggedy furniture in it. Cory ain't got no bed. He's sleeping on a pile of rags on the floor. Working every day and can't get no credit. Come back here—Rose'll tell you—madder than hell. Sit down . . . try to figure what I'm gonna do. Come a knock on the door. Ain't been living here but three days. Who know I'm here? Open the door . . . devil standing there bigger than life. White fellow . . . got on good clothes and everything. Standing there with a clipboard in his hand. I ain't had to say nothing. First words come out of his mouth was . . . "I understand you need some furniture and can't get no credit." I liked to fell over. He say, "I'll give you all the credit you want, but you got to pay the interest on it." I told him, "Give me three rooms' worth and charge whatever you want." Next day a truck pulled up here and two men unloaded them three rooms. Man what drove the truck give me a book. Say send ten dollars, first of every month to the address in the book and everything will be all right. Say if I miss a payment the devil was coming back and it'll be hell to pay. That was fifteen years ago. To this day . . . the first of the month I send my ten dollars, Rose'll tell you.

ROSE: Troy lying.

TROY: I ain't never seen that man since. Now you tell me who else that could have been but the devil? I ain't sold my soul or nothing like that, you understand. Naw, I wouldn't have truck with the devil about nothing like that. I got my furniture and pays my ten dollars the first of the month just like clockwork.

BONO: How long you say you been paying this ten dollars a month?

TROY: Fifteen years!

BONO: Hell, ain't you finished paying for it yet? How much the man done charged you.

TROY: Aw hell, I done paid for it. I done paid for it ten times over! The fact is I'm scared to stop paying it.

ROSE: Troy lying. We got that furniture from Mr. Glickman, He ain't paying no ten dollars a month to nobody.

TROY: Aw hell, woman. Bono know I ain't that big a fool.

LYONS: I was just getting ready to say . . . I know where there's a bridge for sale.

TROY: Look here, I'll tell you this . . . it don't matter to me if he was the devil. It don't matter if the devil give credit. Somebody has got to give it.

ROSE: It ought to matter. You going around talking about having truck with the devil . . . God's the one you gonna have to answer to. He's the one gonna be at the Judgment.

LYONS: Yeah, well, look here, Pop . . . let me have that ten dollars. I'll give it back to you. Bonnie got a job working at the hospital.

TROY: What I tell you, Bono? The only time I see this nigger is when he wants something. That's the only time I see him.

LYONS: Come on, Pop, Mr. Bono don't want to hear all that. Let me have the ten dollars. I told you Bonnie working.

TROY: What that mean to me? "Bonnie working." I don't care if she working. Go ask her for the ten dollars if she working. Talking about "Bonnie working." Why ain't you working?

LYONS: Aw, Pop, you know I can't find no decent job. Where am I gonna get a job at? You know I can't get no job.

TROY: I told you I know some people down there. I can get you on the rubbish if you want to work. I told you that the last time you came by here asking me for something.

LYONS: Naw, Pop . . . thanks. That ain't for me. I don't wanna be carrying nobody's rubbish. I don't wanna be punching nobody's time clock.

TROY: What's the matter, you too good to carry people's rubbish? Where you think that ten dollars you talking about come from? I'm just supposed to haul people's rubbish and give my money to you 'cause you too lazy to work. You too lazy to work and wanna know why you ain't got what I got.

ROSE: What hospital Bonnie working at? Mercy?

LYONS: She's down at Passavant working in the laundry.

TROY: I ain't got nothing as it is. I give you that ten dollars and I got to eat beans the rest of the week. Naw . . . you ain't getting no ten dollars here.

LYONS: You ain't got to be eating no beans. I don't know why you wanna say that.

TROY: I ain't got no extra money. Gabe done moved over to Miss Pearl's paying her the rent and things done got tight around here. I can't afford to be giving you every payday.

LYONS: I ain't asked you to give me nothing. I asked you to loan me ten dollars. I know you got ten dollars.

TROY: Yeah, I got it. You know why I got it? 'Cause I don't throw my money away out there in the streets. You living the fast life . . . wanna be a musician . . . running around in them clubs and things . . . then, you learn to take care of yourself. You ain't gonna find me going and asking nobody for nothing. I done spent too many years without.

LYONS: You and me is two different people, Pop.

TROY: I done learned my mistake and learned to do what's right by it. You still trying to get something for nothing. Life don't owe you nothing. You owe it to yourself. Ask Bono. He'll tell you I'm right.

LYONS: You got your way of dealing with the world . . . I got mine. The only thing that matters to me is the music.

TROY: Yeah, I can see that! It don't matter how you gonna eat . . . where your next dollar is coming from. You telling the truth there.

LYONS: I know I got to eat. But I got to live too. I need something that gonna help me to get out of the bed in the morning. Make me feel like I belong in the world. I don't bother nobody. I just stay with my music 'cause that's the only way I can find to live in the world. Otherwise there ain't no telling what I might do. Now I don't come criticizing you and how you live. I just come by to ask you for ten dollars. I don't wanna hear all that about how I live.

TROY: Boy, your mama did a hell of a job raising you.

LYONS: You can't change me, Pop. I'm thirty-four years old. If you wanted to change me, you should have been there when I was growing up. I come by to see you . . . ask for ten dollars and you want to talk about how I was raised. You don't know nothing about how I was raised.

ROSE: Let the boy have ten dollars, Troy.

TROY (To Lyons): What the hell you looking at me for? I ain't got no ten dollars. You know what I do with my money. (To Rose) Give him ten dollars if you want him to have it.

ROSE: I will. Just as soon as you turn it loose.

TROY (Handing Rose the money): There it is. Seventy-six dollars and forty-two cents. You see this, Bono? Now, I ain't gonna get but six of that back.

ROSE: You ought to stop telling that lie. Here, Lyons. (Hands him the money)

LYONS: Thanks, Rose. Look . . . I got to run . . . I'll see you later.

TROY: Wait a minute. You gonna say, "Thanks, Rose," and ain't gonna look to see where she got that ten dollars from? See how they do me, Bono?

LYONS: I know she got it from you, Pop. Thanks. I'll give it back to you.

TROY: There he go telling another lie. Time I see that ten dollars . . . he'll be owing me thirty more.

LYONS: See you, Mr. Bono.

BONO: Take care, Lyons!

LYONS: Thanks, Pop. I'll see you again.

(Lyons exits the yard.)

TROY: I don't know why he don't go and get him a decent job and take care of that woman he got.

BONO: He'll be all right, Troy. The boy is still young.

TROY: The boy is thirty-four years old.

ROSE: Let's not get off into all that.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to be going. I got to be getting on. Lucille gonna be waiting.

TROY (Puts his arm around Rose): See this woman, Bono? I love this woman. I love this woman so much it hurts. I love her so much . . . I done run out of ways of loving her. So I got to go back to basics. Don't you come by my house Monday morning talking about time to go to work . . . 'cause I'm still gonna be stroking!

ROSE: Troy! Stop it now!

BONO: I ain't paying him no mind, Rose. That ain't nothing but gin-talk. Go on, Troy. I'll see you Monday.

TROY: Don't you come by my house, nigger! I done told you what I'm gonna be doing.

(The lights fade to black.)

Scene 2

The lights come up on Rose hanging up clothes. She hums and sings softly to herself. It is the following morning.

ROSE (Singing):

Jesus, be a fence all around me every day

Jesus, I want you to protect me as I travel on my way.

Jesus, be a fence all around me every day.

(Troy enters from the house.)

Jesus, I want you to protect me

As I travel on my way.

(To Troy) 'Morning. You ready for breakfast? I can fix it soon as I finish hanging up these clothes?

TROY: I got the coffee on. That'll be all right. I'll just drink some of that this morning.

ROSE: That 651 hit yesterday. That's the second time this month. Miss Pearl hit for a dollar . . . seem like those that need the least always get lucky. Poor folks can't get nothing.

TROY: Them numbers don't know nobody. I don't know why you fool with them. You and Lyons both.

ROSE: It's something to do.

TROY: You ain't doing nothing but throwing your money away.

ROSE: Troy, you know I don't play foolishly. I just play a nickel here and a nickel there.

TROY: That's two nickels you done thrown away.

ROSE: Now I hit sometimes . . . that makes up for it. It always comes in handy when I do hit. I don't hear you complaining then.

TROY: I ain't complaining now. I just say it's foolish. Trying to guess out of six hundred ways which way the number gonna come. If I had all the money niggers, these Negroes, throw away on numbers for one week—just one week—I'd be a rich man.

ROSE: Well, you wishing and calling it foolish ain't gonna stop folks from playing numbers. That's one thing for sure. Besides . . . some good things come from playing numbers. Look where Pope done bought him that restaurant off of numbers.

TROY: I can't stand niggers like that. Man ain't had two dimes to rub together. He walking around with his shoes all run over bumming money for cigarettes. All right. Got lucky there and hit the numbers . . .

ROSE: Troy, I know all about it.

TROY: Had good sense, I'll say that for him. He ain't throwed his money away. I seen niggers hit the numbers and go through two thousand dollars in four days. Man bought him that restaurant down there . . . fixed it up real nice . . . and then didn't want nobody to come in it! A Negro go in there and can't get no kind of service. I seen a white fellow come in there and order a bowl of stew. Pope picked all the meat out the pot for him. Man ain't had nothing but a bowl of meat! Negro come behind him and ain't got nothing but the potatoes and carrots. Talking about what numbers do for people, you picked a wrong example. Ain't done nothing but make a worser fool out of him than he was before.

ROSE: Troy, you ought to stop worrying about what happened at work yesterday.

TROY: I ain't worried. Just told me to be down there at the commissioner's office on Friday. Everybody think they gonna fire me. I ain't worried about them firing me. You ain't got to worry about that. (Pause) Where's Cory? Cory in the house? (Calls) Cory?

ROSE: He gone out.

TROY: Out, huh? He gone out 'cause he know I want him to help me with this fence. I know how he is. That boy scared of work.

(Gabriel enters. He comes halfway down the alley and, hearing Troy's voice, stops.)

He ain't done a lick of work in his life.

ROSE: He had to go to football practice. Coach wanted them to get in a little extra practice before the season start.

TROY: I got his practice . . . running out of here before he get his chores done.

ROSE: Troy, what is wrong with you this morning? Don't nothing set right with you. Go on back in there and go to bed . . . get up on the other side.

TROY: Why something got to be wrong with me? I ain't said nothing wrong with me.

ROSE: You got something to say about everything. First it's the numbers . . . then it's the way the man runs his restaurant . . . then you done got on Cory. What's it gonna be next? Take a look up there and see if the weather suits you . . . or is it gonna be how you gonna put up the fence with the clothes hanging in the yard.

TROY: You hit the nail on the head then.

ROSE: I know you like I know the back of my hand. Go on in there and get you some coffee . . . see if that straighten you up. 'Cause you ain't right this morning.

(Troy starts into the house and sees Gabriel. Gabriel starts singing. Troy's brother, he is seven years younger than Troy. Injured in World War II, he has a metal plate in his head. He carries an old trumpet tied around his waist and believes with every fiber of his being that he is the archangel Gabriel.⁸ He carries a chipped basket with an assortment of discarded fruits and vegetables he has picked up in the strip district⁹ and which he attempts to sell.)

GABRIEL (Singing):

Yes, ma'am, I got plums
You ask me how I sell them
Oh ten cents apiece
Three for a quarter
Come and buy now
'Cause I'm here today
And tomorrow I'll be gone.

(Rose enters.)

Hey, Rose!

ROSE: How you doing, Gabe?

GABRIEL: There's Troy . . . Hey, Troy!

TROY: Hey, Gabe.

(Troy exits into the kitchen.)

ROSE (To Gabriel): What you got there?

GABRIEL: You know what I got, Rose. I got fruits and vegetables.

ROSE (Looking in the basket): Where's all these plums you talking about?

GABRIEL: I ain't got no plums today, Rose. I was just singing that. Have some tomorrow. Put me in a big order for plums. Have enough plums tomorrow for Saint Peter¹ and everybody.

(Troy reenters from the kitchen and crosses to the steps.)

(To Rose) Troy's mad at me.

TROY: I ain't mad at you. What I got to be mad at you about? You ain't done nothing to me.

GABRIEL: I just moved over to Miss Pearl's to keep out from in your way. I ain't mean no harm by it.

TROY: Who said anything about that? I ain't said anything about that.

GABRIEL: You ain't mad at me, is you?

TROY: Naw . . . I ain't mad at you, Gabe. If I was mad at you I'd tell you about it.

8. Divine messenger in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic traditions. In the Bible, he appears to Daniel (to explain his visions), to Zacharias (to prophesy John the Baptist's birth), and to Mary (to announce that she will bear Jesus). He is also said to be the angelic trumpeter who will announce the arrival of the Last Judgment and Christ's second coming.

9. Market district located on a narrow strip of land northeast of downtown Pittsburgh.

1. Apostle traditionally represented as guardian of heaven's gates because, in Matthew 16.19, Jesus tells him, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven [. . .]."

GABRIEL: Got me two rooms. In the basement. Got my own door too. Wanna see my key? (Holds up a key) That's my own key! Ain't nobody else got a key like that. That's my key! My two rooms!

TROY: Well, that's good, Gabe. You got your own key . . . that's good.

ROSE: You hungry, Gabe? I was just fixing to cook Troy his breakfast.

GABRIEL: I'll take some biscuits. You got some biscuits? Did you know when I was in Heaven . . . every morning me and Saint Peter would sit down by the Gate and eat some big fat biscuits? Oh, yeah! We had us a good time. We'd sit there and eat us them biscuits and then Saint Peter would go off to sleep and tell me to wake him up when it's time to open the Gates for the Judgment.

ROSE: Well, come on . . . I'll make up a batch of biscuits.

(Rose exits into the house.)

GABRIEL: Troy . . . Saint Peter got your name in the book. I seen it. It say . . . Troy Maxson. I say . . . I know him! He got the same name like what I got. That's my brother!

TROY: How many times you gonna tell me that, Gabe?

GABRIEL: Ain't got my name in the book. Don't have to have my name. I done died and went to Heaven. He got your name though. One morning Saint Peter was looking at his book . . . marking it up for the Judgment . . . and he let me see your name. Got it in there under M. Got Rose's name . . . I ain't seen it like I seen yours . . . but I know it's in there. He got a great big book. Got everybody's name what was ever been born. That's what he told me. But I seen your name. Seen it with my own eyes.

TROY: Go on in the house there. Rose going to fix you something to eat.

GABRIEL: Oh, I ain't hungry. I done had breakfast with Aunt Jemima. She come by and cooked me up a whole mess of flapjacks. Remember how we used to eat them flapjacks?

TROY: Go on in the house and get you something to eat now.

GABRIEL: I got to go sell my plums. I done sold some tomatoes. Got me two quarters. Wanna see? (Shows Troy his quarters) I'm gonna save them and buy me a new horn so Saint Peter can hear me when it's time to open the Gates. (Stops suddenly. Listens) Hear that? That's the hellhounds. I got to chase them out of here. Go on get out of here! Get out! (Exits singing:)

Better get ready for the Judgment
Better get ready for the Judgment
My Lord is coming down.

(Rose enters from the house.)

TROY: He gone off somewhere.

GABRIEL (Offstage):

Better get ready for the Judgment
Better get ready for the Judgment morning
Better get ready for the Judgment
My God is coming down.

ROSE: He ain't eating right. Miss Pearl say she can't get him to eat nothing.

TROY: What you want me to do about it, Rose? I done did everything I can for the man. I can't make him get well. Man got half his head blown away . . . what you expect?

ROSE: Seem like something ought to be done to help him.

TROY: Man don't bother nobody. He just mixed up from that metal plate he got in his head. Ain't no sense for him to go back into the hospital.

ROSE: Least he be eating right. They can help him take care of himself.

TROY: Don't nobody wanna be locked up, Rose. What you wanna lock him up for? Man go over there and fight the war . . . messin' around with them Japs, get half his head blown off . . . and they give him a lousy three thousand dollars. And I had to swoop down on that.

ROSE: Is you fixing to go into that again?

TROY: That's the only way I got a roof over my head . . . 'cause of that metal plate.

ROSE: Ain't no sense you blaming yourself for nothing. Gabe wasn't in no condition to manage that money. You done what was right by him. Can't nobody say you ain't done what was right by him. Look how long you took care of him . . . till he wanted to have his own place and moved over there with Miss Pearl.

TROY: That ain't what I'm saying, woman! I'm just stating the facts. If my brother didn't have that metal plate in his head . . . I wouldn't have a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of. And I'm fifty-three years old. Now see if you can understand that!

(He gets up from the porch and starts to exit the yard.)

ROSE: Where you going off to? You been running out of here every Saturday for weeks. I thought you was gonna work on this fence?

TROY: I'm gonna walk down to Taylors'. Listen to the ball game. I'll be back in a bit. I'll work on it when I get back.

(He exits the yard. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 3

The lights come up on the yard. It is four hours later. Rose is taking down the clothes from the line. Cory enters carrying his football equipment.

ROSE: Your daddy like to had a fit with you running out of here this morning without doing your chores.

CORY: I told you I had to go to practice.

ROSE: He say you were supposed to help him with this fence.

CORY: He been saying that the last four or five Saturdays, and then he don't never do nothing, but go down to Taylors'. Did you tell him about the recruiter?

ROSE: Yeah, I told him.

CORY: What he say?

ROSE: He ain't said nothing too much. You get in there and get started on your chores before he gets back. Go on and scrub down them steps before he gets back here hollering and carrying on.

CORY: I'm hungry. What you got to eat, Mama?

ROSE: Go on and get started on your chores. I got some meat loaf in there. Go on and make you a sandwich . . . and don't leave no mess in there.

(Cory exits into the house. Rose continues to take down the clothes. Troy enters the yard and sneaks up and grabs her from behind.)

Troy! Go on, now. You liked to scared me to death. What was the score of the game? Lucille had me on the phone and I couldn't keep up with it.

TROY: What I care about the game? Come here, woman. (Tries to kiss her)

ROSE: I thought you went down Taylors' to listen to the game. Go on, Troy! You supposed to be putting up this fence.

TROY (Attempting to kiss her again): I'll put it up when I finish with what is at hand.

ROSE: Go on, Troy. I ain't studying you.

TROY (Chasing after her): I'm studying you . . . fixing to do my homework!

ROSE: Troy, you better leave me alone.

TROY: Where's Cory? That boy brought his butt home yet?

ROSE: He's in the house doing his chores.

TROY (Calling): Cory! Get your butt out here, boy!

(Rose exits into the house with the laundry. Troy goes over to the pile of wood, picks up a board, and starts sawing. Cory enters from the house.)

You just now coming in here from leaving this morning?

CORY: Yeah, I had to go to football practice.

TROY: Yeah, what?

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: I ain't but two seconds off you noway. The garbage sitting in there overflowing . . . you ain't done none of your chores . . . and you come in here talking about, "Yeah."

CORY: I was just getting ready to do my chores now, Pop . . .

TROY: Your first chore is to help me with this fence on Saturday. Everything else come after that. Now get that saw and cut them boards.

(Cory takes the saw and begins cutting the boards. Troy continues working. There is a long pause.)

CORY: Hey, Pop . . . why don't you buy a TV?

TROY: What I want with a TV? What I want one of them for?

CORY: Everybody got one. Earl, Ba Bra . . . Jesse!

TROY: I ain't asked you who had one. I say what I want with one?

CORY: So you can watch it. They got lots of things on TV. Baseball games and everything. We could watch the World Series.

TROY: Yeah . . . and how much this TV cost?

CORY: I don't know. They got them on sale for around two hundred dollars.

TROY: Two hundred dollars, huh?

CORY: That ain't that much, Pop.

TROY: Naw, it's just two hundred dollars. See that roof you got over your head at night? Let me tell you something about that roof. It's been over ten years since that roof was last tarred. See now . . . the snow come this winter and sit up there on that roof like it is . . . and it's gonna seep inside. It's just gonna be a little bit . . . ain't gonna hardly notice it. Then the next thing you know, it's gonna be leaking all over the house. Then the wood rot from all that water and you gonna need a whole new roof. Now, how much you think it cost to get that roof tarred?

CORY: I don't know.

TROY: Two hundred and sixty-four dollars . . . cash money. While you thinking about a TV, I got to be thinking about the roof . . . and whatever else go wrong around here. Now if you had two hundred dollars, what would you do . . . fix the roof or buy a TV?

CORY: I'd buy a TV. Then when the roof started to leak . . . when it needed fixing . . . I'd fix it.

TROY: Where are you gonna get the money from? You done spent it for a TV. You gonna sit up and watch the water run all over your brand-new TV.

CORY: Aw, Pop. You got money. I know you do.

TROY: Where I got it at, huh?

CORY: You got it in the bank.

TROY: You wanna see my bankbook? You wanna see that seventy-three dollars and twenty-two cents I got sitting up in there.

CORY: You ain't got to pay for it all at one time. You can put a down payment on it and carry it home with you.

TROY: Not me. I ain't gonna owe nobody nothing if I can help it. Miss a payment and they come and snatch it right out your house. Then what you got? Now, soon as I get two hundred dollars clear, then I'll buy a TV. Right now, as soon as I get two hundred and sixty-four dollars, I'm gonna have this roof tarred.

CORY: Aw . . . Pop!

TROY: You go on and get you two hundred dollars and buy one if ya want it. I got better things to do with my money.

CORY: I can't get no two hundred dollars. I ain't never seen two hundred dollars.

TROY: I'll tell you what . . . you get you a hundred dollars and I'll put the other hundred with it.

CORY: All right, I'm gonna show you.

TROY: You gonna show me how you can cut them boards right now.

(Cory begins to cut the boards. There is a long pause.)

CORY: The Pirates won today. That makes five in a row.

TROY: I ain't thinking about the Pirates. Got an all-white team. Got that boy . . . that Puerto Rican boy . . . Clemente.² Don't even half-play him. That boy could be something if they give him a chance. Play him one day and sit him on the bench the next.

CORY: He gets a lot of chances to play.

TROY: I'm talking about playing regular. Playing every day so you can get your timing. That's what I'm talking about.

CORY: They got some white guys on the team that don't play every day. You can't play everybody at the same time.

2. Roberto Clemente (1934–72), Pittsburgh Pirates right fielder (1955–72), four-time National League batting champion, and winner of twelve Gold Gloves.

TROY: If they got a white fellow sitting on the bench . . . you can bet your last dollar he can't play! The colored guy got to be twice as good before he get on the team. That's why I don't want you to get all tied up in them sports. Man on the team and what it get him? They got colored on the team and don't use them. Same as not having them. All them teams the same.

CORY: The Braves got Hank Aaron and Wes Covington.³ Hank Aaron hit two home runs today. That makes forty-three.

TROY: Hank Aaron ain't nobody. That's what you supposed to do. That's how you supposed to play the game. Ain't nothing to it. It's just a matter of timing . . . getting the right follow-through. Hell, I can hit forty-three home runs right now!

CORY: Not off no major-league pitching, you couldn't.

TROY: We had better pitching in the Negro leagues. I hit seven home runs off of Satchel Paige.⁴ You can't get no better than that!

CORY: Sandy Koufax.⁵ He's leading the league in strikeouts.

TROY: I ain't thinking of no Sandy Koufax.

CORY: You got Warren Spahn and Lew Burdette.⁶ I bet you couldn't hit no home runs off of Warren Spahn.

TROY: I'm through with it now. You go on and cut them boards. (Pause) Your mama tell me you done got recruited by a college football team? Is that right?

CORY: Yeah. Coach Zellman say the recruiter gonna be coming by to talk to you. Get you to sign the permission papers.

TROY: I thought you supposed to be working down there at the A&P. Ain't you supposed to be working down there after school?

CORY: Mr. Stawicki say he gonna hold my job for me until after the football season. Say starting next week I can work weekends.

TROY: I thought we had an understanding about this football stuff? You suppose to keep up with your chores and hold that job down at the A&P. Ain't been around here all day on a Saturday. Ain't none of your chores done . . . and now you telling me you done quit your job.

CORY: I'm gonna be working weekends.

TROY: You damn right you are! And ain't no need for nobody coming around here to talk to me about signing nothing.

CORY: Hey, Pop . . . you can't do that. He's coming all the way from North Carolina.

TROY: I don't care where he coming from. The white man ain't gonna let you get nowhere with that football noway. You go on and get your book-learning so you can work yourself up in that A&P or learn how to fix cars or build houses

3. African American fielder (1932–2011) who played for the Milwaukee Braves from 1956 to 1961.

Hank Aaron: legendary African American batsman (b. 1934) who played twenty-one seasons with the Milwaukee, later Atlanta, Braves (1954–74) and, in 1974–75, broke Babe Ruth's records for most home runs and runs batted in (RBIs).

4. Pitcher (1906–82). Arguably the Negro Leagues' most famous player (1926–47), he pitched in the newly integrated major leagues from age forty-two to sixty (1948–66).

5. Brooklyn, later Los Angeles, Dodgers pitcher (b. 1935), the first player ever to win three Cy Young Awards, and the youngest ever elected to Baseball's Hall of Fame.

6. Like 1957 Cy Young Award winner Warren Spahn (1921–2003), a pitcher for the Boston, later Milwaukee, Braves (1926–2007). Burdette was MVP of the 1957 World Series, the only World Series the Milwaukee Braves ever won and the first, since 1948, won by any non-New York team.

or something, get you a trade. That way you have something can't nobody take away from you. You go on and learn how to put your hands to some good use. Besides hauling people's garbage.

CORY: I get good grades, Pop. That's why the recruiter wants to talk with you. You got to keep up your grades to get recruited. This way I'll be going to college. I'll get a chance . . .

TROY: First you gonna get your butt down there to the A&P and get your job back.

CORY: Mr. Stawicki done already hired somebody else 'cause I told him I was playing football.

TROY: You a bigger fool than I thought . . . to let somebody take away your job so you can play some football. Where you gonna get your money to take out your girlfriend and whatnot? What kind of foolishness is that to let somebody take away your job?

CORY: I'm still gonna be working weekends.

TROY: Naw . . . naw. You getting your butt out of here and finding you another job.

CORY: Come on, Pop! I got to practice. I can't work after school and play football too. The team needs me. That's what Coach Zellman say . . .

TROY: I don't care what nobody else say. I'm the boss . . . you understand? I'm the boss around here. I do the only saying what counts.

CORY: Come on, Pop!

TROY: I asked you . . . did you understand?

CORY: Yeah . . .

TROY: What!?!

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: You go on down there to that A&P and see if you can get your job back. If you can't do both . . . then you quit the football team. You've got to take the crooked with the straights.

CORY: Yessir. (Pause) Can I ask you a question?

TROY: What the hell you wanna ask me? Mr. Stawicki the one you got the questions for.

CORY: How come you ain't never liked me?

TROY: Liked you? Who the hell say I got to like you? What law is there say I got to like you? Wanna stand up in my face and ask a damn fool-ass question like that. Talking about liking somebody. Come here, boy, when I talk to you.

(Cory comes over to where Troy is working. He stands slouched over and Troy shoves him on his shoulder.)

Straighten up, goddamn it! I asked you a question . . . what law is there say I got to like you?

CORY: None.

TROY: Well, all right then! Don't you eat every day? (Pause) Answer me when I talk to you! Don't you eat every day?

CORY: Yeah.

TROY: Nigger, as long as you in my house, you put that sir on the end of it when you talk to me!

CORY: Yes . . . sir.

TROY: You eat every day.

CORY: Yessir!

TROY: Got a roof over your head.

CORY: Yessir!

TROY: Got clothes on your back.

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: Why you think that is?

CORY: 'Cause of you.

TROY: Aw, hell, I know it's 'cause of me . . . but why do you think that is?

CORY (Hesitant): 'Cause you like me.

TROY: Like you? I go out of here every morning . . . bust my butt . . . putting up with them crackers every day . . . 'cause I like you? You about the biggest fool I ever saw. (Pause) It's my job. It's my responsibility! You understand that? A man got to take care of his family. You live in my house . . . sleep you behind on my bedclothes . . . fill you belly up with my food . . . 'cause you my son. You my flesh and blood. Not 'cause I like you! 'Cause it's my duty to take care of you. I owe a responsibility to you!

Let's get this straight right here . . . before it go along any further . . . I ain't got to like you. Mr. Rand don't give me my money come payday 'cause he likes me. He gives me 'cause he owe me. I done give you everything I had to give you. I gave you your life! Me and your mama worked that out between us. And liking your black ass wasn't part of the bargain. Don't you try and go through life worrying about if somebody like you or not. You best be making sure they doing right by you. You understand what I'm saying, boy?

CORY: Yessir.

TROY: Then get the hell out of my face, and get on down to that A&P.

(Rose has been standing behind the screen door for much of the scene. She enters as Cory exits.)

ROSE: Why don't you let the boy go ahead and play football, Troy? Ain't no harm in that. He's just trying to be like you with the sports.

TROY: I don't want him to be like me! I want him to move as far away from my life as he can get. You the only decent thing that ever happened to me. I wish him that. But I don't wish him a thing else from my life. I decided seventeen years ago that boy wasn't getting involved in no sports. Not after what they did to me in the sports.

ROSE: Troy, why don't you admit you was too old to play in the major leagues? For once . . . why don't you admit that?

TROY: What do you mean too old? Don't come telling me I was too old. I just wasn't the right color. Hell, I'm fifty-three years old and can do better than Selkirk's .269 right now!

ROSE: How's was you gonna play ball when you were over forty? Sometimes I can't get no sense out of you.

TROY: I got good sense, woman. I got sense enough not to let my boy get hurt over playing no sports. You been mothering that boy too much. Worried about if people like him.

ROSE: Everything that boy do . . . he do for you. He wants you to say, "Good job, son." That's all.

TROY: Rose, I ain't got time for that. He's alive. He's healthy. He's got to make his own way. I made mine. Ain't nobody gonna hold his hand when he get out there in that world.

ROSE: Times have changed from when you was young, Troy. People change. The world's changing around you and you can't even see it.

TROY (Slow, methodical): Woman . . . I do the best I can do. I come in here every Friday. I carry a sack of potatoes and a bucket of lard. You all line up at the door with your hands out. I give you the lint from my pockets. I give you my sweat and my blood. I ain't got no tears. I done spent them. We go upstairs in that room at night . . . and I fall down on you and try to blast a hole into forever. I get up Monday morning . . . find my lunch on the table. I go out. Make my way. Find my strength to carry me through to the next Friday. (Pause) That's all I got, Rose. That's all I got to give. I can't give nothing else.

(Troy exits into the house. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 4

It is Friday. Two weeks later. Cory starts out of the house with his football equipment. The phone rings.

CORY (Calling): I got it! (Answers the phone, stands in the screen door talking) Hello? Hey, Jesse. Naw . . . I was just getting ready to leave now.

ROSE (Calling): Cory!

CORY: I told you, man, them spikes is all tore up. You can use them if you want, but they ain't no good. Earl got some spikes.

ROSE (Calling): Cory!

CORY (Calling to Rose): Mam? I'm talking to Jesse. (Into phone) When she say that? (Pause) Aw, you lying, man. I'm gonna tell her you said that.

ROSE (Calling): Cory, don't you go nowhere!

CORY: I got to go to the game, Ma! (Into the phone) Yeah, hey, look, I'll talk to you later. Yeah, I'll meet you over Earl's house. Later. Bye, Ma.

(Cory exits the house and starts out the yard.)

ROSE: Cory, where you going off to? You got that stuff all pulled out and thrown all over your room.

CORY (In the yard): I was looking for my spikes. Jesse wanted to borrow my spikes.

ROSE: Get up there and get that cleaned up before your daddy get back in here.

CORY: I got to go to the game! I'll clean it up when I get back.

(He exits.)

ROSE: That's all he need to do is see that room all messed up.

(Rose exits into the house. Troy and Bono enter the yard with a bottle. Troy is dressed in clothes other than his work clothes.)

BONO: He told him the same thing he told you. Take it to the union.

TROY: Brownie ain't got that much sense. Man wasn't thinking about nothing. He wait until I confront them on it . . . then he wanna come crying seniority. (Calls) Hey, Rose!

BONO: I wish I could have seen Mr. Rand's face when he told you.

TROY: He couldn't get it out of his mouth! Liked to bit his tongue! When they called me down there to the commissioner's office . . . he thought they was gonna fire me. Like everybody else.

BONO: I didn't think they was gonna fire you. I thought they was gonna put you on the warning paper.

TROY: Hey, Rose! (To Bono) Yeah, Mr. Rand like to bit his tongue.

(Troy breaks the seal on the bottle, takes a drink, and hands it to Bono.)

BONO: I see you run right down to Taylors' and told that Alberta gal.

TROY (Calling): Hey, Rose! (To Bono) I told everybody. Hey, Rose! I went down there to cash my check.

ROSE (Entering from the house): Hush all that hollering, man! I know you out here. What they say down there at the commissioner's office?

TROY: You supposed to come when I call you, woman. Bono'll tell you that. (To Bono) Don't Lucille come when you call her?

ROSE: Man, hush your mouth. I ain't no dog . . . talk about "come when you call me."

TROY (Puts his arm around Rose): You hear this, Bono? I had me an old dog used to get uppity like that. You say, "C'mere, Blue!" . . . and he just lay there and look at you. End up getting a stick and chasing him away trying to make him come.

ROSE: I ain't studying you and your dog. I remember you used to sing that old song.

TROY (Singing):

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
I had a dog his name was Blue.

ROSE: Don't nobody wanna hear you sing that old song.

TROY (Singing):

You know Blue was mighty true.

ROSE: Used to have Cory running around here singing that song.

BONO: Hell, I remember that song myself.

TROY (Singing):

You know Blue was a good old dog.
Blue treed a possum in a hollow log.

That was my daddy's song. My daddy made up that song.

ROSE: I don't care who made it up. Don't nobody wanna hear you sing it.

TROY (Makes a song like calling a dog): Come here, woman.

ROSE: You come in here carrying on, I reckon they ain't fired you. What they say down there at the commissioner's office?

TROY: Look here, Rose . . . Mr. Rand called me into his office today when I got back from talking to them people down there . . . it come from up top . . . he called me in and told me they was making me a driver.

ROSE: Troy, you kidding!

TROY: No I ain't. Ask Bono.

ROSE: Well, that's great, Troy. Now you don't have to hassle them people no more.

(Lyons enters from the street.)

TROY: Aw hell, I wasn't looking to see you today. I thought you was in jail. Got it all over the front page of the Courier about them raiding Seefus' place . . . where you be hanging out with all them thugs.

LYONS: Hey, Pop . . . that ain't got nothing to do with me. I don't go down there gambling. I go down there to sit in with the band. I ain't got nothing to do with the gambling part. They got some good music down there.

TROY: They got some rogues . . . is what they got.

LYONS: How you been, Mr. Bono? Hi, Rose.

BONO: I see where you playing down at the Crawford Grill tonight.

ROSE: How come you ain't brought Bonnie like I told you. You should have brought Bonnie with you, she ain't been over in a month of Sundays.

LYONS: I was just in the neighborhood . . . thought I'd stop by.

TROY: Here he come . . .

BONO: Your daddy got a promotion on the rubbish. He's gonna be the first colored driver. Ain't got to do nothing but sit up there and read the paper like them white fellows.

LYONS: Hey, Pop . . . if you knew how to read you'd be all right.

BONO: Naw . . . naw . . . you mean if the nigger knew how to drive he'd be all right. Been fighting with them people about driving and ain't even got a license. Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license?

TROY: Driving ain't nothing. All you do is point the truck where you want it to go. Driving ain't nothing.

BONO: Do Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license? That's what I'm talking about. I ain't asked if driving was easy. I asked if Mr. Rand know you ain't got no driver's license.

TROY: He ain't got to know. The man ain't got to know my business. Time he find out, I have two or three driver's licenses.

LYONS (Going into his pocket): Say, look here, Pop . . .

TROY: I knew it was coming. Didn't I tell you, Bono? I know what kind of "look here, Pop" that was. The nigger fixing to ask me for some money. It's Friday night. It's my payday. All them rogues down there on the avenue . . . the ones that ain't in jail . . . and Lyons is hopping in his shoes to get down there with them.

LYONS: See, Pop . . . if you'd give somebody else a chance to talk sometime, you'd see that I was fixing to pay you back your ten dollars like I told you. Here . . . I told you I'd pay you when Bonnie got paid.

TROY: Naw . . . you go ahead and keep that ten dollars. Put it in the bank. The next time you feel like you wanna come by here and ask me for something . . . you go on down there and get that.

LYONS: Here's your ten dollars, Pop. I told you I don't want you to give me nothing. I just wanted to borrow ten dollars.

TROY: Naw . . . you go on and keep that for the next time you want to ask me.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . . here go your ten dollars.

ROSE: Why don't you go on and let the boy pay you back, Troy?

LYONS: Here you go, Rose. If you don't take it I'm gonna have to hear about it for the next six months. (Hands her the money)

ROSE: You can hand yours over here too, Troy.

TROY: You see this, Bono. You see how they do me.

BONO: Yeah, Lucille do me the same way.

(Gabriel is heard singing offstage. He enters.)

GABRIEL: Better get ready for the Judgment! Better get ready for . . . Hey! . . . Hey!
There's Troy's boy!

LYONS: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Lyons . . . The King of the Jungle! Rose . . . hey, Rose. Got a flower for you. (Takes a rose from his pocket) Picked it myself. That's the same rose like you is!

ROSE: That's right nice of you, Gabe.

LYONS: What you been doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Oh, I been chasing hellhounds and waiting on the time to tell Saint Peter to open the Gates.

LYONS: You been chasing hellhounds, huh? Well . . . you doing the right thing, Uncle Gabe. Somebody got to chase them.

GABRIEL: Oh, yeah . . . I know it. The devil's strong. The devil ain't no pushover. Hellhounds snipping at everybody's heels. But I got my trumpet waiting on the Judgment time.

LYONS: Waiting on the Battle of Armageddon,⁷ huh?

GABRIEL: Ain't gonna be too much of a battle when God get to waving that Judgment sword. But the people's gonna have a hell of a time trying to get into Heaven if them Gates ain't open.

LYONS (Putting his arm around Gabriel): You hear this, Pop. Uncle Gabe, you all right!

GABRIEL (Laughing with Lyons): Lyons! King of the Jungle.

ROSE: You gonna stay for supper, Gabe. Want me to fix you a plate?

GABRIEL: I'll just take a sandwich, Rose. Don't want no plate. Just wanna eat with my hands. I'll take a sandwich.

ROSE: How about you, Lyons? You staying? Got some short ribs cooking.

LYONS: Naw, I won't eat nothing till after we finished playing. (Pause) You ought to come down and listen to me play, Pop.

TROY: I don't like that Chinese music. All that noise.

ROSE: Go on in the house and wash up, Gabe . . . I'll fix you a sandwich.

GABRIEL (As he exits, to Lyons): Troy's mad at me.

LYONS: What you mad at Uncle Gabe for, Pop.

ROSE: He thinks Troy's mad at him 'cause he moved over to Miss Pearl's.

TROY: I ain't mad at the man. He can live where he want to live at.

LYONS: What he move over there for? Miss Pearl don't like nobody.

ROSE: She don't mind him none. She treats him real nice. She just don't allow all that singing.

TROY: She don't mind that rent he be paying . . . that's what she don't mind.

ROSE: Troy, I ain't going through that with you no more. He's over there 'cause he want to have his own place. He can come and go as he please.

7. In Christian tradition, the final, history-ending battle between the armies of good and evil.

TROY: Hell, he could come and go as he please here. I wasn't stopping him. I ain't put no rules on him.

ROSE: It ain't the same thing, Troy. And you know it.

(Gabriel comes to the screen door.)

Now, that's the last I wanna hear about that. I don't wanna hear nothing else about Gabe and Miss Pearl. And next week . . .

GABRIEL: I'm ready for my sandwich, Rose.

ROSE: And next week . . . when that recruiter come from that school . . . I want you to sign that paper and go on and let Cory play football. Then that'll be the last I have to hear about that.

TROY (To Rose as she exits into the house): I ain't thinking about Cory nothing.

LYONS: What . . . Cory got recruited? What school he going to?

TROY: That boy walking around here smelling his piss . . . thinking he's grown. Thinking he's gonna do what he want, irrespective of what I say. Look here, Bono . . . I left the commissioner's office and went down to the A&P . . . that boy ain't working down there. He lying to me. Telling me he got his job back . . . telling me he working weekends . . . telling me he working after school . . . Mr. Stawicki tell me he ain't working down there at all!

LYONS: Cory just growing up. He's just busting at the seams trying to fill out your shoes.

TROY: I don't care what he's doing. When he get to the point where he wanna disobey me . . . then it's time for him to move on. Bono'll tell you that I bet he ain't never disobeyed his daddy without paying the consequences.

BONO: I ain't never had a chance. My daddy came on through . . . but I ain't never knew him to see him . . . or what he had on his mind or where he went. Just moving on through. Searching out the New Land. That's what the old folks used to call it. See a fellow moving around from place to place . . . woman to woman . . . called it Searching out the New Land. I can't say if he ever found it. I come along, didn't want no kids. Didn't know if I was gonna be in one place long enough to fix on them right as their daddy. I figured I was going searching too. As it turned out I been hooked up with Lucille near about as long as your daddy been with Rose. Going on sixteen years.

TROY: Sometimes I wish I hadn't known my daddy. He ain't cared nothing about no kids. A kid to him wasn't nothing. All he wanted was for you to learn how to walk so he could start you to working. When it come time for eating . . . he ate first. If there was anything left over, that's what you got. Man would sit down and eat two chickens and give you the wing.

LYONS: You ought to stop that, Pop. Everybody feed their kids. No matter how hard times is . . . everybody care about their kids. Make sure they have something to eat.

TROY: The only thing my daddy cared about was getting them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin. That's the only thing that mattered to him. Sometimes I used to wonder why he was living. Wonder why the devil hadn't come and got him. "Get them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin" and find out he owe him money . . .

LYONS: He should have just went on and left when he saw he couldn't get nowhere. That's what I would have done.

TROY: How he gonna leave with eleven kids? And where he gonna go? He ain't knew how to do nothing but farm. No, he was trapped and I think he knew it. But I'll say this for him . . . he felt a responsibility toward us. Maybe he ain't treated us the way I felt he should have . . . but without that responsibility he could have walked off and left us . . . made his own way.

BONO: A lot of them did. Back in those days what you talking about . . . they walk out their front door and just take on down one road or another and keep on walking.

LYONS: There you go! That's what I'm talking about.

BONO: Just keep on walking till you come to something else. Ain't you never heard of nobody having the walking blues? Well, that's what you call it when you just take off like that.

TROY: My daddy ain't had them walking blues! What you talking about? He stayed right there with his family. But he was just as evil as he could be. My mama couldn't stand him. Couldn't stand that evilness. She run off when I was about eight. She sneaked off one night after he had gone to sleep. Told me she was coming back for me. I ain't never seen her no more. All his women run off and left him. He wasn't good for nobody.

When my turn come to head out, I was fourteen and got to sniffing around Joe Canewell's daughter. Had us an old mule we called Greyboy. My daddy sent me out to do some plowing and I tied up Greyboy and went to fooling around with Joe Canewell's daughter. We done found us a nice spot, got real cozy with each other. She about thirteen and we done figured we was grown anyway . . . so we down there enjoying ourselves . . . ain't thinking about nothing. We didn't know Greyboy had got loose and wandered back to the house and my daddy was looking for me. We down there by the creek enjoying ourselves when my daddy come up on us. Surprised us. He had them leather straps off the mule and commenced to whupping me like there was no tomorrow. I jumped up, mad and embarrassed. I was scared of my daddy. When he commenced to whupping on me . . . quite naturally I run to get out of the way. (Pause) Now I thought he was mad 'cause I ain't done my work. But I see where he was chasing me off so he could have the gal for himself. When I see what the matter of it was, I lost all fear of my daddy. Right there is where I become a man . . . at fourteen years of age. (Pause) Now it was my turn to run him off. I picked up them same reins that he had used on me. I picked up them reins and commenced to whupping on him. The gal jumped up and run off . . . and when my daddy turned to face me, I could see why the devil had never come to get him . . . 'cause he was the devil himself. I don't know what happened. When I woke up, I was laying right there by the creek, and Blue . . . this old dog we had . . . was licking my face. I thought I was blind. I couldn't see nothing. Both my eyes were swollen shut. I laid there and cried. I didn't know what I was gonna do. The only thing I knew was the time had come for me to leave my daddy's house. And right there the world suddenly got big. And it was a long time before I could cut it down to where I could handle it.

Part of that cutting down was when I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years.

(Gabriel enters from the house with a sandwich.)

LYONS: What you got there, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Got me a ham sandwich. Rose gave me a ham sandwich.

TROY: I don't know what happened to him. I done lost touch with everybody except Gabriel. But I hope he's dead. I hope he found some peace.

LYONS: That's a heavy story, Pop. I didn't know you left home when you was fourteen.

TROY: And didn't know nothing. The only part of the world I knew was the forty-two acres of Mr. Lubin's land. That's all I knew about life.

LYONS: Fourteen's kinda young to be out on your own. (Phone rings) I don't even think I was ready to be out on my own at fourteen. I don't know what I would have done.

TROY: I got up from the creek and walked on down to Mobile.⁸ I was through with farming. Figured I could do better in the city. So I walked the two hundred miles to Mobile.

LYONS: Wait a minute . . . you ain't walked no two hundred miles, Pop. Ain't nobody gonna walk no two hundred miles. You talking about some walking there.

BONO: That's the only way you got anywhere back in them days.

LYONS: Shhh. Damn if I wouldn't have hitched a ride with somebody!

TROY: Who you gonna hitch it with? They ain't had no cars and things like they got now. We talking about 1918.

ROSE (Entering): What you all out here getting into?

TROY (To Rose): I'm telling Lyons how good he got it. He don't know nothing about this I'm talking.

ROSE: Lyons, that was Bonnie on the phone. She say you supposed to pick her up.

LYONS: Yeah, okay, Rose.

TROY: I walked on down to Mobile and hitched up with some of them fellows that was heading this way. Got up here and found out . . . not only couldn't you get a job . . . you couldn't find no place to live. I thought I was in freedom. Shhh. Colored folks living down there on the riverbanks in whatever kind of shelter they could find for themselves. Right down there under the Brady Street Bridge. Living in shacks made of sticks and tarpaper. Messed around there and went from bad to worse. Started stealing. First it was food. Then I figured, hell, if I steal money I can buy me some food. Buy me some shoes too! One thing led to another. Met your mama. I was young and anxious to be a man. Met your mama and had you. What I do that for? Now I got to worry about feeding you and her. Got to steal three times as much. Went out one day looking for somebody to rob . . . that's what I was, a robber. I'll tell you the truth. I'm ashamed of it today. But it's the truth. Went to rob this fellow . . . pulled out my knife . . . and he pulled out a gun. Shot me in the chest. It felt just like somebody had taken a hot branding iron and laid it on me. When he shot me I jumped at him with my knife. They told me I killed him and they put me in the penitentiary and locked me up for fifteen years. That's where I met Bono. That's where I learned how to play baseball. Got out that place and your mama had taken you and went on to make life without me. Fifteen years was a long time for her to wait. But that fifteen years cured me of that robbing stuff. Rose'll tell you. She asked me when I met her if I had gotten all that foolishness out of my system. And I told her, "Baby, it's you and baseball all what count with me." You hear me, Bono? I meant it too. She say, "Which one comes first?" I told her, "Baby, ain't no doubt it's baseball . . . but you stick and get old with me and we'll both outlive this baseball." Am I right, Rose? And it's true.

ROSE: Man, hush your mouth. You ain't said no such thing. Talking about, "Baby, you know you'll always be number one with me." That's what you was talking.

TROY: You hear that, Bono. That's why I love her.

BONO: Rose'll keep you straight. You get off the track, she'll straighten you up.

ROSE: Lyons, you better get on up and get Bonnie. She waiting on you.

LYONS (Gets up to go): Hey, Pop, why don't you come on down to the Grill and hear me play?

TROY: I ain't going down there. I'm too old to be sitting around in them clubs.

BONO: You got to be good to play down at the Grill.

LYONS: Come on, Pop . . .

TROY: I got to get up in the morning.

LYONS: You ain't got to stay long.

TROY: Naw, I'm gonna get my supper and go on to bed.

LYONS: Well, I got to go. I'll see you again.

TROY: Don't you come around my house on my payday.

ROSE: Pick up the phone and let somebody know you coming. And bring Bonnie with you. You know I'm always glad to see her.

LYONS: Yeah, I'll do that, Rose. You take care now. See you, Pop. See you, Mr. Bono. See you, Uncle Gabe.

GABRIEL: Lyons! King of the Jungle!

(Lyons exits.)

TROY: Is supper ready, woman? Me and you got some business to take care of. I'm gonna tear it up too.

ROSE: Troy, I done told you now!

TROY (Puts his arm around Bono): Aw hell, woman . . . this is Bono. Bono like family. I done known this nigger since . . . how long I done know you?

BONO: It's been a long time.

TROY: I done known this nigger since Skippy was a pup. Me and him done been through some times.

BONO: You sure right about that.

TROY: Hell, I done know him longer than I known you. And we still standing shoulder to shoulder. Hey, look here, Bono . . . a man can't ask for no more than that. (Drinks to him) I love you, nigger.

BONO: Hell, I love you too . . . but I got to get home see my woman. You got yours in hand. I got to go get mine.

(Bono starts to exit as Cory enters the yard, dressed in his football uniform. He gives Troy a hard, uncompromising look.)

CORY: What you do that for, Pop? (Throws his helmet down in the direction of Troy)

ROSE: What's the matter? Cory . . . what's the matter?

CORY: Papa done went up to the school and told Coach Zellman I can't play football no more. Wouldn't even let me play the game. Told him to tell the recruiter not to come.

ROSE: Troy . . .

TROY: What you Troying me for. Yeah, I did it. And the boy know why I did it.

CORY: Why you wanna do that to me? That was the one chance I had.

ROSE: Ain't nothing wrong with Cory playing football, Troy.

TROY: The boy lied to me. I told the nigger if he wanna play football . . . to keep up his chores and hold down that job at the A&P. That was the conditions. Stopped down there to see Mr. Stawicki . . .

CORY: I can't work after school during the football season, Pop! I tried to tell you that Mr. Stawicki's holding my job for me. You don't never want to listen to nobody. And then you wanna go and do this to me!

TROY: I ain't done nothing to you. You done it to yourself.

CORY: Just 'cause you didn't have a chance! You just scared I'm gonna be better than you, that's all.

TROY: Come here.

ROSE: Troy . . .

(Cory reluctantly crosses over to Troy.)

TROY: All right! See. You done made a mistake.

CORY: I didn't even do nothing!

TROY: I'm gonna tell you what your mistake was. See . . . you swung at the ball and didn't hit it. That's strike one. See, you in the batter's box now. You swung and you missed. That's strike one. Don't you strike out!

(The lights go down on the scene.)

ACT TWO

Scene 1

The following morning. Cory is at the tree hitting the ball with the bat. He tries to mimic Troy, but his swing is awkward, less sure. Rose enters from the house.

ROSE: Cory, I want you to help me with this cupboard.

CORY: I ain't quitting the team. I don't care what Poppa say.

ROSE: I'll talk to him when he gets back. He had to go see about your Uncle Gabe. The police done arrested him. Say he was disturbing the peace. He'll be back directly. Come on in here and help me clean out the top of this cupboard.

(Cory exits into the house. Rose sees Troy and Bono coming down the alley.)

Troy . . . what they say down there?

TROY: Ain't said nothing. I give them fifty dollars and they let him go. I'll talk to you about it. Where's Cory?

ROSE: He's in there helping me clean out these cupboards.

TROY: Tell him to get his butt out here.

(Troy and Bono go over to the pile of wood. Bono picks up the saw and begins sawing.)

(To Bono) All they want is the money. That makes six or seven times I done went down there and got him. See me coming they stick out their hands.

BONO: Yeah, I know what you mean. That's all they care about . . . that money. They don't care about what's right. (Pause) Nigger, why you got to go and get some hard wood? You ain't doing nothing but building a little old fence. Get you some soft pine wood. That's all you need.

TROY: I know what I'm doing. This is outside wood. You put pine wood inside the house. Pine wood is inside wood. This here is outside wood. Now you tell me where the fence is gonna be?

BONO: You don't need this wood. You can put it up with pine wood and it'll stand as long as you gonna be here looking at it.

TROY: How you know how long I'm gonna be here, nigger? Hell, I might just live forever. Live longer than old man Horsely.

BONO: That's what Magee used to say.

TROY: Magee's a damn fool. Now you tell me who you ever heard of gonna pull their own teeth with a pair of rusty pliers.

BONO: The old folks . . . my granddaddy used to pull his teeth with pliers. They ain't had no dentists for the colored folks back then.

TROY: Get clean pliers! You understand? Clean pliers! Sterilize them! Besides we ain't living back then. All Magee had to do was walk over to Doc Goldblum's.

BONO: I see where you and that Tallahassee gal . . . that Alberta . . . I see where you all done got tight.

TROY: What you mean "got tight"?

BONO: I see where you be laughing and joking with her all the time.

TROY: I laughs and jokes with all of them, Bono. You know me.

BONO: That ain't the kind of laughing and joking I'm talking about.

(Cory enters from the house.)

CORY: How you doing, Mr. Bono?

TROY: Cory? Get that saw from Bono and cut some wood. He talking about the wood's too hard to cut. Stand back there, Jim, and let that young boy show you how it's done.

BONO: He's sure welcome to it.

(Cory takes the saw and begins to cut the wood.)

Whew-e-e! Look at that. Big old strong boy. Look like Joe Louis.⁹ Hell, must be getting old the way I'm watching that boy whip through that wood.

CORY: I don't see why Mama want a fence around the yard noways.

9. Alabama-born boxer (1914–81) known as the "Brown Bomber," world heavyweight champion 1937–49.

TROY: Damn if I know either. What the hell she keeping out with it? She ain't got nothing nobody want.

BONO: Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and other people build fences to keep people in. Rose wants to hold on to you all. She loves you.

TROY: Hell, nigger, I don't need nobody to tell me my wife loves me, Cory . . . go on in the house and see if you can find that other saw.

CORY: Where's it at?

TROY: I said find it! Look for it till you find it!

(Cory exits into the house.)

What's that supposed to mean? Wanna keep us in?

BONO: Troy . . . I done known you seem like damn near my whole life. You and Rose both. I done know both of you all for a long time. I remember when you met Rose. When you was hitting them baseball out the park. A lot of them old gals was after you then. You had the pick of the litter. When you picked Rose, I was happy for you. That was the first time I knew you had any sense. I said . . . My man Troy knows what he's doing . . . I'm gonna follow this nigger . . . he might take me somewhere. I been following you too. I done learned a whole heap of things about life watching you. I done learned how to tell where the shit lies. How to tell it from the alfalfa. You done learned me a lot of things. You showed me how to not make the same mistakes . . . to take life as it comes along and keep putting one foot in front of the other. (Pause) Rose a good woman, Troy.

TROY: Hell, nigger, I know she a good woman. I been married to her for eighteen years. What you got on your mind, Bono?

BONO: I just say she a good woman. Just like I say anything. I ain't got to have nothing on my mind.

TROY: You just gonna say she a good woman and leave it hanging out there like that? Why you telling me she a good woman?

BONO: She loves you, Troy. Rose loves you.

TROY: You saying I don't measure up. That's what you trying to say. I don't measure up 'cause I'm seeing this other gal. I know what you trying to say.

BONO: I know what Rose means to you, Troy. I'm just trying to say I don't want to see you mess up.

TROY: Yeah, I appreciate that, Bono. If you was messing around on Lucille I'd be telling you the same thing.

BONO: Well, that's all I got to say. I just say that because I love you both.

TROY: Hell, you know me . . . I wasn't out there looking for nothing. You can't find a better woman than Rose. I know that. But seems like this woman just stuck on to me where I can't shake her loose. I done wrestled with it, tried to throw her off me . . . but she just stuck on tighter. Now she's stuck on for good.

BONO: You's in control . . . that's what you tell me all the time. You responsible for what you do.

TROY: I ain't ducking the responsibility of it. As long as it sets right in my heart . . . then I'm okay. 'Cause that's all I listen to. It'll tell me right from wrong every time. And I ain't talking about doing Rose no bad turn. I love Rose. She done carried me a long ways and I love and respect her for that.

BONO: I know you do. That's why I don't want to see you hurt her. But what you gonna do when she find out? What you got then? If you try and juggle both of them . . . sooner or later you gonna drop one of them. That's common sense.

TROY: Yeah, I hear what you saying, Bono. I been trying to figure a way to work it out.

BONO: Work it out right, Troy. I don't want to be getting all up between you and Rose's business . . . but work it so it come out right.

TROY: Aw hell, I get all up between you and Lucille's business. When you gonna get that woman that refrigerator she been wanting? Don't tell me you ain't got no money now. I know who your banker is. Mellon don't need that money bad as Lucille want that refrigerator. I'll tell you that.

BONO: Tell you what I'll do . . . when you finish building this fence for Rose . . . I'll buy Lucille that refrigerator.

TROY: You done stuck your foot in your mouth now!

(Troy grabs up a board and begins to saw. Bono starts to walk out the yard.)

Hey, nigger . . . where you going?

BONO: I'm going home. I know you don't expect me to help you now. I'm protecting my money. I wanna see you put up that fence by yourself. That's what I want to see. You'll be here another six months without me.

TROY: Nigger, you ain't right.

BONO: When it comes to my money . . . I'm as right as fireworks on the Fourth of July.

TROY: All right, we gonna see now. You better get out your bankbook.

(Bono exits, and Troy continues to work. Rose enters from the house.)

ROSE: What they say down there? What's happening with Gabe?

TROY: I went down there and got him out. Cost me fifty dollars. Say he was disturbing the peace. Judge set up a hearing for him in three weeks. Say to show cause why he shouldn't be recommitted.

ROSE: What was he doing that cause them to arrest him?

TROY: Some kids was teasing him and he run them off home. Say he was howling and carrying on. Some folks seen him and called the police. That's all it was.

ROSE: Well, what's you say? What'd you tell the judge?

TROY: Told him I'd look after him. It didn't make no sense to recommit the man. He stuck out his big greasy palm and told me to give him fifty dollars and take him on home.

ROSE: Where's he at now? Where'd he go off to?

TROY: He's gone on about his business. He don't need nobody to hold his hand.

ROSE: Well, I don't know. Seem like that would be the best place for him if they did put him into the hospital. I know what you're gonna say. But that's what I think would be best.

TROY: The man done had his life ruined fighting for what? And they wanna take and lock him up. Let him be free. He don't bother nobody.

ROSE: Well, everybody got their own way of looking at it I guess. Come on and get your lunch. I got a bowl of lima beans and some cornbread in the oven.

Come on get something to eat. Ain't no sense you fretting over Gabe. (Turns to go in the house)

TROY: Rose . . . got something to tell you.

ROSE: Well, come on . . . wait till I get this food on the table.

TROY: Rose!

(She stops and turns around.)

I don't know how to say this. (Pause) I can't explain it none. It just sort of grows on you till it gets out of hand. It starts out like a little bush . . . and the next thing you know it's a whole forest.

ROSE: Troy . . . what is you talking about?

TROY: I'm talking, woman, let me talk. I'm trying to find a way to tell you . . . I'm gonna be a daddy. I'm gonna be somebody's daddy.

ROSE: Troy . . . you're not telling me this? You're gonna be . . . what?

TROY: Rose . . . now . . . see . . .

ROSE: You telling me you gonna be somebody's daddy? You telling your wife this?

(Gabriel enters from the street. He carries a rose in his hand.)

GABRIEL: Hey, Troy! Hey, Rose!

ROSE: I have to wait eighteen years to hear something like this.

GABRIEL: Hey, Rose . . . I got a flower for you. (Hands it to her) That's a rose. Same rose like you is.

ROSE: Thanks, Gabe.

GABRIEL: Troy, you ain't mad at me is you? Them bad mens come and put me away. You ain't mad at me is you?

TROY: Naw, Gabe, I ain't mad at you.

ROSE: Eighteen years and you wanna come with this.

GABRIEL (Takes a quarter out of his pocket): See what I got? Got a brand-new quarter.

TROY: Rose . . . it's just . . .

ROSE: Ain't nothing you can say, Troy. Ain't no way of explaining that.

GABRIEL: Fellow that give me this quarter had a whole mess of them. I'm gonna keep this quarter till it stop shining.

ROSE: Gabe, go on in the house there. I got some watermelon in the frigidaire. Go on and get you a piece.

GABRIEL: Say, Rose . . . you know I was chasing hellhounds and them bad mens come and get me and take me away. Troy helped me. He come down there and told them they better let me go before he beat them up. Yeah, he did!

ROSE: You go on and get you a piece of watermelon, Gabe. Them bad mens is gone now.

GABRIEL: Okay, Rose . . . gonna get me some watermelon. The kind with the stripes on it.

(Gabriel exits into the house.)

ROSE: Why, Troy? Why? After all these years to come dragging this in to me now. It don't make no sense at your age. I could have expected this ten or fifteen years ago, but not now.

TROY: Age ain't got nothing to do with it, Rose.

ROSE: I done tried to be everything a wife should be. Everything a wife could be. Been married eighteen years and I got to live to see the day you tell me you been seeing another woman and done fathered a child by her. And you know I ain't never wanted no half nothing in my family. My whole family is half. Everybody got different fathers and mothers . . . my two sisters and my brother. Can't hardly tell who's who. Can't never sit down and talk about Papa and Mama. It's your papa and your mama and my papa and my mama . . .

TROY: Rose . . . stop it now.

ROSE: I ain't never wanted that for none of my children. And now you wanna drag your behind in here and tell me something like this.

TROY: You ought to know. It's time for you to know.

ROSE: Well, I don't want to know, goddamn it!

TROY: I can't just make it go away. It's done now. I can't wish the circumstance of the thing away.

ROSE: And you don't want to either. Maybe you want to wish me and my boy away. Maybe that's what you want? Well, you can't wish us away. I've got eighteen years of my life invested in you. You ought to have stayed upstairs in my bed where you belong.

TROY: Rose . . . now listen to me . . . we can get a handle on this thing. We can talk this out . . . come to an understanding.

ROSE: All of a sudden it's "we." Where was "we" at when you was down there rolling around with some godforsaken woman? "We" should have come to an understanding before you started making a damn fool of yourself. You're a day late and a dollar short when it comes to an understanding with me.

TROY: It's just . . . She gives me a different idea . . . a different understanding about myself. I can step out of this house and get away from the pressures and problems . . . be a different man. I ain't got to wonder how I'm gonna pay the bills or get the roof fixed. I can just be a part of myself that I ain't never been.

ROSE: What I want to know . . . is do you plan to continue seeing her. That's all you can say to me.

TROY: I can sit up in her house and laugh. Do you understand what I'm saying. I can laugh out loud . . . and it feels good. It reaches all the way down to the bottom of my shoes. (Pause) Rose, I can't give that up.

ROSE: Maybe you ought to go on and stay down there with her . . . if she a better woman than me.

TROY: It ain't about nobody being a better woman or nothing. Rose, you ain't to blame. A man couldn't ask for no woman to be a better wife than you've been. I'm responsible for it. I done locked myself into a pattern trying to take care of you all that I forgot about myself.

ROSE: What the hell was I there for? That was my job, not somebody else's.

TROY: Rose, I done tried all my life to live decent . . . to live a clean . . . hard . . . useful life. I tried to be a good husband to you. In every way I knew how. Maybe I come into the world backwards, I don't know. But . . . you born with two strikes on you before you come to the plate. You got to guard it closely . . . always looking for the curveball on the inside corner. You can't afford to let none get past you. You can't afford a call strike. If you going down . . . you going down swinging. Everything lined up against you. What you gonna do. I fooled them,

Rose. I bunted. When I found you and Cory and a halfway decent job . . . I was safe. Couldn't nothing touch me. I wasn't gonna strike out no more. I wasn't going back to the penitentiary, I wasn't gonna lay in the streets with a bottle of wine. I was safe. I had me a family. A job. I wasn't gonna get that last strike.

I was on first looking for one of them boys to knock me in. To get me home.

ROSE: You should have stayed in my bed, Troy.

TROY: Then when I saw that girl . . . she firmed up my backbone. And I got to thinking that if I tried . . . I just might be able to steal second. Do you understand, after eighteen years I wanted to steal second.

ROSE: You should have held me tight. You should have grabbed me and held on.

TROY: I stood on first base for eighteen years and I thought . . . well, goddamn it . . . go on for it!

ROSE: We're not talking about baseball! We're talking about you going off to lay in bed with another woman . . . and then bring it home to me. That's what we're talking about. We ain't talking about no baseball.

TROY: Rose, you're not listening to me. I'm trying the best I can to explain it to you. It's not easy for me to admit that I been standing in the same place for eighteen years.

ROSE: I been standing with you! I been right here with you, Troy. I got a life too. I gave eighteen years of my life to stand in the same spot with you. Don't you think I ever wanted other things? Don't you think I had dreams and hopes? What about my life? What about me? Don't you think it ever crossed my mind to want to know other men? That I wanted to lay up somewhere and forget about my responsibilities? That I wanted someone to make me laugh so I could feel good? You not the only one who's got wants and needs. But I held on to you, Troy. I took all my feelings, my wants and needs, my dreams . . . and I buried them inside you. I planted a seed and watched and prayed over it. I planted myself inside you and waited to bloom. And it didn't take me no eighteen years to find out the soil was hard and rocky and it wasn't never gonna bloom.

But I held on to you, Troy. I held you tighter. You was my husband. I owed you everything I had. Every part of me I could find to give you. And upstairs in that room . . . with the darkness falling in on me . . . I gave everything I had to try and erase the doubt that you wasn't the finest man in the world. And wherever you was going . . . I wanted to be there with you. 'Cause you was my husband. 'Cause that's the only way I was gonna survive as your wife. You always talking about what you give . . . and what you don't have to give. But you take too. You take . . . and don't even know nobody's giving!

(Rose turns to exit into the house; Troy grabs her arm.)

TROY: You say I take and don't give!

ROSE: Troy! You're hurting me.

TROY: You say I take and don't give.

ROSE: Troy . . . you're hurting my arm! Let go!

TROY: I done give you everything I got. Don't you tell that lie on me.

ROSE: Troy!

TROY: Don't you tell that lie on me!

(Cory enters from the house.)

CORY: Mama!

ROSE: Troy, you're hurting me.

TROY: Don't you tell me about no taking and giving.

(Cory comes up behind Troy and grabs him. Troy, surprised, is thrown off balance just as Cory throws a glancing blow that catches him on the chest and knocks him down. Troy is stunned, as is Cory.)

ROSE: Troy. Troy. No!

(Troy gets to his feet and starts at Cory.)

Troy . . . no. Please! Troy!

(Rose pulls on Troy to hold him back. Troy stops himself.)

TROY (To Cory): All right. That's strike two. You stay away from around me, boy. Don't you strike out. You living with a full count. Don't you strike out.

(Troy exits out the yard as the lights go down on the scene.)

Scene 2

It is six months later, early afternoon. Troy enters from the house and starts to exit the yard. Rose enters from the house.

ROSE: Troy, I want to talk to you.

TROY: All of a sudden, after all this time, you want to talk to me, huh? You ain't wanted to talk to me for months. You ain't wanted to talk to me last night. You ain't wanted no part of me then. What you wanna talk to me about now?

ROSE: Tomorrow's Friday.

TROY: I know what day tomorrow is. You think I don't know tomorrow's Friday? My whole life I ain't done nothing but look to see Friday coming and you got to tell me it's Friday.

ROSE: I want to know if you're coming home.

TROY: I always come home, Rose. You know that. There ain't never been a night I ain't come home.

ROSE: That ain't what I mean . . . and you know it. I want to know if you're coming straight home after work.

TROY: I figured I'd cash my check . . . hang out at Taylors' with the boys . . . maybe play a game of checkers . . .

ROSE: Troy, I can't live like this. I won't live like this. You livin' on borrowed time with me. It's been going on six months now you ain't been coming home.

TROY: I be here every night. Every night of the year. That's three hundred sixty-five days.

ROSE: I want you to come home tomorrow after work.

TROY: Rose . . . I don't mess up my pay. You know that now. I take my pay and I give it to you. I don't have no money but what you give me back. I just want to have a little time to myself . . . a little time to enjoy life.

ROSE: What about me? When's my time to enjoy life?

TROY: I don't know what to tell you, Rose. I'm doing the best I can.

ROSE: You ain't come home from work but time enough to change your clothes and run out . . . and you wanna call that the best you can do?

TROY: I'm going over to the hospital to see Alberta. She went into the hospital this afternoon. Look like she might have the baby early. I won't be gone long.

ROSE: Well, you ought to know. They went over to Miss Pearl's and got Gabe today. She said you told them to go ahead and lock him up.

TROY: I ain't said no such thing. Whoever told you that is telling a lie. Pearl ain't doing nothing but telling a big fat lie.

ROSE: She ain't had to tell me. I read it on the papers.

TROY: I ain't told them nothing of the kind.

ROSE: I saw it right there on the papers.

TROY: What it say, huh?

ROSE: It said you told them to take him.

TROY: Then they screwed that up, just the way they screw up everything. I ain't worried about what they got on the paper.

ROSE: Say the government send part of his check to the hospital and the other part to you.

TROY: I ain't got nothing to do with that if that's the way it works. I ain't made up the rules about how it work.

ROSE: You did Gabe just like you did Cory. You wouldn't sign the paper for Cory . . . but you signed for Gabe. You signed that paper.

(The phone is heard ringing inside the house.)

TROY: I told you I ain't signed nothing, woman! The only thing I signed was the release form. Hell, I can't read, I don't know what they had on that paper! I ain't signed nothing about sending Gabe away.

ROSE: I said send him to the hospital . . . you said let him be free . . . now you done went down there and signed him to the hospital for half his money. You went back on yourself, Troy. You gonna have to answer for that.

TROY: See now . . . you been over there talking to Miss Pearl. She done got mad 'cause she ain't getting Gabe's rent money. That's all it is. She's liable to say anything.

ROSE: Troy, I seen where you signed the paper.

TROY: You ain't seen nothing I signed. What she doing got papers on my brother anyway? Miss Pearl telling a big fat lie. And I'm gonna tell her about it too! You ain't seen nothing I signed. Say . . . you ain't seen nothing I signed.

(Rose exits into the house to answer the phone. She returns.)

ROSE: Troy . . . that was the hospital. Alberta had the baby.

TROY: What she have? What is it?

ROSE: It's a girl.

TROY: I better get on down to the hospital to see her.

ROSE: Troy . . .

TROY: Rose . . . I got to go see her now. That's only right . . . what's the matter . . . the baby's all right, ain't it?

ROSE: Alberta died having the baby.

TROY: Died . . . you say she's dead? Alberta's dead?

ROSE: They said they done all they could. They couldn't do nothing for her.

TROY: The baby? How's the baby?

ROSE: They say it's healthy. I wonder who's gonna bury her.

TROY: She had family, Rose. She wasn't living in the world by herself.

ROSE: I know she wasn't living in the world by herself.

TROY: Next thing you gonna want to know if she had any insurance.

ROSE: Troy, you ain't got to talk like that.

TROY: That's the first thing that jumped out your mouth. "Who's gonna bury her?"

Like I'm fixing to take on that task for myself.

ROSE: I am your wife. Don't push me away.

TROY: I ain't pushing nobody away. Just give me some space. That's all. Just give me some room to breathe.

(Rose exits into the house. Troy walks about the yard.)

(With a quiet rage that threatens to consume him) All right . . . Mr. Death. See now . . . I'm gonna tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna take and build me a fence around this yard. See? I'm gonna build me a fence around what belongs to me. And then I want you to stay on the other side. See? You stay over there until you're ready for me. Then you come on. Bring your army. Bring your sickle. Bring your wrestling clothes. I ain't gonna fall down on my vigilance this time. You ain't gonna sneak up on me no more. When you ready for me . . . when the top of your list say "Troy Maxson" . . . that's when you come around here. You come up and knock on the front door. Ain't nobody else got nothing to do with this. This is between you and me. Man to man. You stay on the other side of that fence until you ready for me. Then you come up and knock on the front door. Anytime you want. I'll be ready for you.

(The lights fade to black.)

Scene 3

The lights come up on the porch. It is late evening three days later. Rose sits listening to the ball game, waiting for Troy. The final out of the game is made and Rose switches off the radio. Troy enters the yard carrying an infant wrapped in blankets. He stands back from the house and calls.

Rose enters and stands on the porch. There is a long, awkward silence, the weight of which grows heavier with each passing second.

TROY: Rose . . . I'm standing here with my daughter in my arms. She ain't but a wee bitty little old thing. She don't know nothing about grownups' business.

She innocent . . . and she ain't got no mama.

ROSE: What you telling me for, Troy?

(She turns and exits into the house.)

TROY: Well . . . I guess we'll just sit out here on the porch.

(He sits down on the porch. There is an awkward indelicateness about the way he handles the baby. His largeness engulfs and seems to swallow her. He speaks loud enough for Rose to hear:)

A man's got to do what's right for him. I ain't sorry for nothing I done. It felt right in my heart. (To the baby) What you smiling at? Your daddy's a big man. Got these great big old hands. But sometimes he's scared. And right now your daddy's scared 'cause we sitting out here and ain't got no home. Oh, I been homeless before. I ain't had no little baby with me. But I been homeless. You just be out on the road by your lonesome and you see one of them trains coming and you just kinda go like this . . . (Singing, as a lullaby:)

Please, Mr. Engineer, let a man ride the line
 Please, Mr. Engineer, let a man ride the line
 I ain't got no ticket please let me ride the blinds.¹

(Rose enters from the house. Troy hearing her steps behind him, stands and faces her.)

She's my daughter, Rose. My own flesh and blood. I can't deny her no more than I can deny them boys. (Pause) You and them boys is my family. You and them and this child is all I got in the world. So I guess what I'm saying is . . . I'd appreciate it if you'd help me take care of her.

ROSE: Okay, Troy . . . you're right. I'll take care of your baby for you . . . 'cause . . . like you say . . . she's innocent . . . and you can't visit the sins of the father upon the child. A motherless child has got a hard time. (Takes the baby from him) From right now . . . this child got a mother. But you a womanless man.

(Rose turns and exits into the house with the baby. The lights fade to black.)

Scene 4

It is two months later. Lyons enters from the street. He knocks on the door and calls.

LYONS: Hey, Rose! (Pause) Rose!

ROSE (From inside the house): Stop that yelling. You gonna wake up Raynell. I just got her to sleep.

LYONS: I just stopped by to pay Papa this twenty dollars I owe him. Where's Papa at?

ROSE: He should be here in a minute. I'm getting ready to go down to the church. Sit down and wait on him.

LYONS: I got to go pick up Bonnie over her mother's house.

ROSE: Well, sit it down there on the table. He'll get it.

LYONS: (Enters the house and sets the money on the table): Tell Papa I said thanks. I'll see you again.

ROSE: All right, Lyons. We'll see you.

(Lyons starts to exit as Cory enters.)

CORY: Hey, Lyons.

1. That is, hitch a free ride on the platform outside a rail car with no door at one end (hence, "blind").

LYONS: What's happening, Cory. Say man, I'm sorry I missed your graduation. You know I had a gig and couldn't get away. Otherwise, I would have been there, man. So what you doing?

CORY: I'm trying to find a job.

LYONS: Yeah, I know how that go, man. It's rough out here. Jobs are scarce.

CORY: Yeah, I know.

LYONS: Look here, I got to run. Talk to Papa . . . he know some people. He'll be able to help get you a job. Talk to him . . . see what he say.

CORY: Yeah . . . all right, Lyons.

LYONS: You take care. I'll talk to you soon. We'll find some time to talk.

(Lyons exits the yard. Cory wanders over to the tree, picks up the bat and assumes a batting stance. He studies an imaginary pitcher and swings. Dissatisfied with the result, he tries again. Troy enters. They eye each other for a beat. Cory puts the bat down and exits the yard. Troy starts into the house as Rose exits with Raynell. She is carrying a cake.)

TROY: I'm coming in and everybody's going out.

ROSE: I'm taking this cake down to the church for the bake sale. Lyons was by to see you. He stopped by to pay you your twenty dollars. It's laying in there on the table.

TROY (Going into his pocket): Well . . . here go this money.

ROSE: Put it in there on the table, Troy. I'll get it.

TROY: What time you coming back?

ROSE: Ain't no use in you studying me. It don't matter what time I come back.

TROY: I just asked you a question, woman. What's the matter . . . can't I ask you a question?

ROSE: Troy, I don't want to go into it. Your dinner's in there on the stove. All you got to do is heat it up. And don't you be eating the rest of them cakes in there. I'm coming back for them. We having a bake sale at the church tomorrow.

(Rose exits the yard. Troy sits down on the steps, takes a pint bottle from his pocket, opens it and drinks. He begins to sing:)

TROY:

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
Had an old dog his name was Blue
You know Blue was mighty true
You know Blue was a good old dog
Blue treed a possum in a hollow log
You know from that he was a good old dog.

(Bono enters the yard.)

BONO: Hey, Troy.

TROY: Hey, what's happening, Bono?

BONO: I just thought I'd stop by to see you.

TROY: What you stop by and see me for? You ain't stopped by in a month of Sundays. Hell, I must owe you money or something.

BONO: Since you got your promotion I can't keep up with you. Used to see you every day. Now I don't even know what route you working.

TROY: They keep switching me around. Got me out in Greentree now . . . hauling white folks' garbage.

BONO: Greentree, huh? You lucky, at least you ain't got to be lifting them barrels. Damn if they ain't getting heavier. I'm gonna put in my two years and call it quits.

TROY: I'm thinking about retiring myself.

BONO: You got it easy. You can drive for another five years.

TROY: It ain't the same, Bono. It ain't like working the back of the truck. Ain't got nobody to talk to . . . feel like you working by yourself. Naw, I'm thinking about retiring. How's Lucille?

BONO: She all right. Her arthritis get to acting up on her sometime. Saw Rose on my way in. She going down to the church, huh?

TROY: Yeah, she took up going down there. All them preachers looking for somebody to fatten their pockets. (Pause) Got some gin here.

BONO: Naw, thanks. I just stopped by to say hello.

TROY: Hell, nigger . . . you can take a drink. I ain't never known you to say no to a drink. You ain't got to work tomorrow.

BONO: I just stopped by. I'm fixing to go over to Skinner's. We got us a domino game going over his house every Friday.

TROY: Nigger, you can't play no dominoes. I used to whup you four games out of five.

BONO: Well, that learned me. I'm getting better.

TROY: Yeah? Well, that's all right.

BONO: Look here . . . I got to be getting on. Stop by sometime, huh?

TROY: Yeah, I'll do that, Bono. Lucille told Rose you bought her a new refrigerator.

BONO: Yeah, Rose told Lucille you had finally built your fence . . . so I figured we'd call it even.

TROY: I knew you would.

BONO: Yeah . . . okay. I'll be talking to you.

TROY: Yeah, take care, Bono. Good to see you. I'm gonna stop over.

BONO: Yeah. Okay, Troy.

(Bono exits. Troy drinks from the bottle.)

TROY:

Old Blue died and I dug his grave
Let him down with a golden chain
Every night when I hear old Blue bark
I know Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.
Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

(Cory enters the yard. Cory and Troy eye each other for a beat. Cory walks over to Troy, who sits in the middle of the steps.)

CORY: I got to get by.

TROY: Say what? What's you say?

CORY: You in my way. I got to get by.

TROY: You got to get by where? This is my house. Bought and paid for. In full. Took me fifteen years. And if you wanna go in my house and I'm sitting on the steps . . . you say excuse me. Like your mama taught you.

CORY: Come on, Pop . . . I got to get by.

(Cory starts to maneuver his way past Troy. Troy grabs his leg and shoves him back.)

TROY: You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY: I live here too!

TROY (Advancing on him): You just gonna walk over top of me in my own house?

CORY: I ain't scared of you.

TROY: I ain't asked if you was scared of me. I asked you if you was fixing to walk over top of me in my own house? That's the question. You ain't gonna say excuse me? You just gonna walk over top of me?

CORY: If you wanna put it like that.

TROY: How else am I gonna put it?

CORY: I was walking by you to go into the house 'cause you sitting on the steps drunk, singing to yourself. You can put it like that.

TROY: Without saying excuse me??? (Cory doesn't respond) I asked you a question. Without saying excuse me???

CORY: I ain't got to say excuse me to you. You don't count around here no more.

TROY: Oh, I see . . . I don't count around here no more. You ain't got to say excuse me to your daddy. All of a sudden you done got so grown that your daddy don't count around here no more . . . Around here in his own house and yard that he done paid for with the sweat of his brow. You done got so grown to where you gonna take over. You gonna take over my house. Is that right? You gonna wear my pants. You gonna go in there and stretch out on my bed. You ain't got to say excuse me 'cause I don't count around here no more. Is that right?

CORY: That's right. You always talking this dumb stuff. Now, why don't you just get out my way.

TROY: I guess you got someplace to sleep and something to put in your belly. You got that, huh? You got that? That's what you need. You got that, huh?

CORY: You don't know what I got. You ain't got to worry about what I got.

TROY: You right! You one hundred percent right! I done spent the last seventeen years worrying about what you got. Now it's your turn, see? I'll tell you what to do. You grown . . . we done established that. You a man. Now, let's see you act like one. Turn your behind around and walk out this yard. And when you get out there in the alley . . . you can forget about this house. See? 'Cause this is my house. You go on and be a man and get your own house. You can forget about this. 'Cause this is mine. You go on and get yours 'cause I'm through with doing for you.

CORY: You talking about what you did for me . . . what'd you ever give me?

TROY: Them feet and bones! That pumping heart, nigger! I give you more than anybody else is ever gonna give you.

CORY: You ain't never gave me nothing! You ain't never done nothing but hold me back. Afraid I was gonna be better than you. All you ever did was try and make me scared of you. I used to tremble every time you called my name. Every time I heard your footsteps in the house. Wondering all the time . . . what's Papa gonna say if I do this? . . . What's he gonna say if I do that? . . . What's Papa gonna say if I turn on the radio? And Mama, too . . . she tries . . . but she's scared of you.

TROY: You leave your mama out of this. She ain't got nothing to do with this.

CORY: I don't know how she stand you . . . after what you did to her.

TROY: I told you to leave your mama out of this! (Advances on Cory)

CORY: What you gonna do . . . give me a whupping? You can't whup me no more.

You're too old. You just an old man.

TROY (Shoves him on his shoulder): Nigger! That's what you are! You just another nigger on the street to me!

CORY: You crazy! You know that?

TROY: Go on now! You got the devil in you. Get on away from me!

CORY: You just a crazy old man . . . talking about I got the devil in me.

TROY: Yeah, I'm crazy! If you don't get on the other side of that yard . . . I'm gonna show you how crazy I am! Go on . . . get the hell out of my yard.

CORY: It ain't your yard. You took Uncle Gabe's money he got from the Army to buy this house and then you put him out.

TROY (Advances on Cory): Get your black ass out of my yard!

(Troy's advance backs Cory up against the tree. Cory grabs the bat.)

CORY: I ain't going nowhere! Come on . . . put me out! I ain't scared of you.

TROY: That's my bat!

CORY: Come on!

TROY: Put my bat down!

CORY: Come on, put me out.

(Cory swings at Troy, who backs across the yard.)

What's the matter? You so bad . . . put me out!

(Troy advances on Cory, who backs up.)

Come on! Come on!

TROY: You're gonna have to use it! You wanna draw that bat back on me . . . you're gonna have to use it.

CORY: Come on! . . . Come on!

(Cory swings the bat at Troy a second time. He misses. Troy continues to advance on him.)

TROY: You're gonna have to kill me! You wanna draw that bat back on me. You're gonna have to kill me.

(Cory, backed up against the tree, can go no farther. Troy taunts him. He sticks out his head and offers him a target.)

Come on! Come on!

(Cory is unable to swing the bat. Troy grabs it.)

Then I'll show you.

(Cory and Troy struggle over the bat. The struggle is fierce and fully engaged. Troy ultimately is the stronger, and takes the bat from Cory and stands over him ready to swing. He stops himself.)

Go on and get away from around my house.

(Cory, stung by his defeat, picks himself up, walks slowly out of the yard and up the alley.)

CORY: Tell Mama I'll be back for my things. (Exits)

TROY: They'll be on the other side of that fence.

I can't taste nothing. Hallelujah! I can't taste nothing no more. (Assumes a batting posture and begins to taunt Death, the fastball in the outside corner)
Come on! It's between you and me now! Come on! Anytime you want! Come on! I be ready for you . . . but I ain't gonna be easy.

(The lights go down on the scene.)

Scene 5

The time is 1965. The lights come up in the yard. It is the morning of Troy's funeral. A funeral plaque with a light hangs beside the door. There is a small garden plot off to the side. There is noise and activity in the house as Rose, Gabriel, Lyons and Bono have gathered. The door opens and Raynell, seven years old, enters dressed in a flannel nightgown. She crosses to the garden and pokes around with a stick. Rose calls from the house.

ROSE: Raynell!

RAYNELL: Mam?

ROSE: What you doing out there?

RAYNELL: Nothing.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Girl, get in here and get dressed. What you doing?

RAYNELL: Seeing if my garden grewed.

ROSE: I told you it ain't gonna grow overnight. You got to wait.

RAYNELL: It don't look like it never gonna grow. Dag!

ROSE: I told you a watched pot never boils. Get in here and get dressed.

RAYNELL: This ain't even no pot, Mama.

ROSE: You just have to give it a chance. It'll grow. Now you come on and do what I told you. We got to be getting ready. This ain't no morning to be playing around. You hear me?

RAYNELL: Yes, Mam.

(Rose exits into the house. Raynell continues to poke at her garden with a stick. Cory enters. He is dressed in a Marine corporal's uniform, and carries a duffel bag. His posture is that of a military man, and his speech has a clipped sternness.)

CORY (To Raynell): Hi. (Pause) I bet your name is Raynell.

RAYNELL: Uh-huh.

CORY: Is your mama home?

(Raynell runs up on the porch and calls through the screen door:)

RAYNELL: Mama . . . there's some man out here. Mama?

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Cory? Lord have mercy! Look here, you all!

(Rose and Cory embrace in a tearful reunion as Bono and Lyons enter from the house dressed in funeral clothes.)

BONO: Aw, looka here . . .

ROSE: Done got all grown up!

CORY: Don't cry, Mama. What you crying about?

ROSE: I'm just so glad you made it.

CORY: Hey, Lyons. How you doing, Mr. Bono.

(Lyons goes to embrace Cory.)

LYONS: Look at you, man. Look at you. Don't he look good, Rose. Got them corporal stripes.

ROSE: What took you so long.

CORY: You know how the Marines are, Mama. They got to get all their paperwork straight before they let you do anything.

ROSE: Well, I'm sure glad you made it. They let Lyons come. Your Uncle Gabe's still in the hospital. They don't know if they gonna let him out or not. I just talked to them a little while ago.

LYONS: A corporal in the United States Marines.

BONO: Your daddy knew you had it in you. He used to tell me all the time.

LYONS: Don't he look good, Mr. Bono?

BONO: Yeah, he remind me of Troy when I first met him. (Pause) Say, Rose, Lucille's down at the church with the choir. I'm gonna go down and get the pallbearers lined up. I'll be back to get you all.

ROSE: Thanks, Jim.

CORY: See you, Mr. Bono.

(Bono exits.)

LYONS (With his arm around Raynell): Cory . . . look at Raynell. Ain't she precious? She gonna break a whole lot of hearts.

ROSE: Raynell, come and say hello to your brother. This is your brother, Cory. You remember Cory.

RAYNELL: No, Mam.

CORY: She don't remember me, Mama.

ROSE: Well, we talk about you. She heard us talk about you. (To Raynell) This is your brother Cory. Come on and say hello.

RAYNELL: Hi.

CORY: Hi. So you're Raynell. Mama told me a lot about you.

ROSE: You all come on into the house and let me fix you some breakfast. Keep up your strength.

CORY: I ain't hungry, Mama.

LYONS: You can fix me something, Rose. I'll be in there in a minute.

ROSE: Cory, you sure you don't want nothing. I know they ain't feeding you right.

CORY: No, Mama . . . thanks. I don't feel like eating. I'll get something later.

ROSE: Raynell . . . get on upstairs and get that dress on like I told you.

(Rose and Raynell exit into the house.)

LYONS: So . . . I hear you thinking about getting married.

CORY: Yeah, I done found the right one, Lyons. It's about time.

LYONS: Me and Bonnie been split up about four years now. About the time Papa retired. I guess she just got tired of all them changes I was putting her through. (Pause) I always knew you was gonna make something out yourself. Your head was always in the right direction. So . . . you gonna stay in . . . make it a career . . . put in your twenty years?

CORY: I don't know. I got six already, I think that's enough.

LYONS: Stick with Uncle Sam and retire early. Ain't nothing out here. I guess Rose told you what happened with me. They got me down the workhouse. I thought I was being slick cashing other people's checks.

CORY: How much time you doing?

LYONS: They give me three years. I got that beat now. I ain't got but nine more months. It ain't so bad. You learn to deal with it like anything else. You got to take the crooked with the straights. That's what Papa used to say. He used to say that when he struck out. I seen him strike out three times in a row . . . and the next time up he hit the ball over the grandstand. Right out there in Homestead Field.² He wasn't satisfied hitting in the seats . . . he wanted to hit it over everything! After the game he had two hundred people standing around waiting to shake his hand. You got to take the crooked with the straights. Yeah, Papa was something else.

CORY: You still playing?

LYONS: Cory . . . you know I'm gonna do that. There's some fellows down there we got us a band . . . we gonna try and stay together when we get out . . . but yeah, I'm still playing. It still helps me to get out of bed in the morning. As long as it do that I'm gonna be right there playing and trying to make some sense out of it.

ROSE (Calling): Lyons, I got these eggs in the pan.

LYONS: Let me go on and get these eggs, man. Get ready to go bury Papa. (Pause) How you doing? You doing all right?

(Cory nods. Lyons touches him on the shoulder and they share a moment of silent grief. Lyons exits into the house. Cory wanders about the yard. Raynell enters.)

RAYNELL: Hi.

CORY: Hi.

RAYNELL: Did you used to sleep in my room?

CORY: Yeah . . . that used to be my room.

RAYNELL: That's what Papa call it. "Cory's room." It got your football in the closet.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Raynell, get in there and get them good shoes on.

RAYNELL: Mama, can't I wear these? Them other one hurt my feet.

2. Among the most renowned teams in the Negro League, the Homestead Grays originated in Homestead, Pennsylvania, just south of Pittsburgh, but moved to Pittsburgh's Forbes Field in the late 1930s.

ROSE: Well, they just gonna have to hurt your feet for a while. You ain't said they hurt your feet when you went down to the store and got them.

RAYNELL: They didn't hurt then. My feet done got bigger.

ROSE: Don't you give me no backtalk now. You get in there and get them shoes on.

(Raynell exits into the house.)

Ain't too much changed. He still got that piece of rag tied to that tree. He was out here swinging that bat. I was just ready to go back in the house. He swung that bat and then he just fell over. Seem like he swung it and stood there with this grin on his face . . . and then he just fell over. They carried him on down to the hospital, but I knew there wasn't no need . . . Why don't you come on in the house?

CORY: Mama . . . I got something to tell you. I don't know how to tell you this . . . but I've got to tell you . . . I'm not going to Papa's funeral.

ROSE: Boy, hush your mouth. That's your daddy you talking about. I don't want hear that kind of talk this morning. I done raised you to come to this? You standing there all healthy and grown talking about you ain't going to your daddy's funeral?

CORY: Mama . . . listen . . .

ROSE: I don't want to hear it, Cory. You just get that thought out of your head.

CORY: I can't drag Papa with me everywhere I go. I've got to say no to him. One time in my life I've got to say no.

ROSE: Don't nobody have to listen to nothing like that. I know you and your daddy ain't seen eye to eye, but I ain't got to listen to that kind of talk this morning. Whatever was between you and your daddy . . . the time has come to put it aside. Just take it and set it over there on the shelf and forget about it. Disrespecting your daddy ain't gonna make you a man, Cory. You got to find a way to come to that on your own. Not going to your daddy's funeral ain't gonna make you a man.

CORY: The whole time I was growing up . . . living in his house . . . Papa was like a shadow that followed you everywhere. It weighed on you and sunk into your flesh. It would wrap around you and lay there until you couldn't tell which one was you anymore. That shadow digging in your flesh. Trying to crawl in. Trying to live through you. Everywhere I looked, Troy Maxson was staring back at me . . . hiding under the bed . . . in the closet. I'm just saying I've got to find a way to get rid of that shadow, Mama.

ROSE: You just like him. You got him in you good.

CORY: Don't you tell me that, Mama.

ROSE: You Troy Maxson all over again.

CORY: I don't want to be Troy Maxson. I want to be me.

ROSE: You can't be nobody but who you are, Cory. That shadow wasn't nothing but you growing into yourself. You either got to grow into it or cut it down to fit you. But that's all you got to make life with. That's all you got to measure yourself against that world out there. Your daddy wanted you to be everything he wasn't . . . and at the same time he tried to make you into everything he was. I don't know if he was right or wrong . . . but I do know he meant to do more good than he meant to do harm. He wasn't always right. Sometimes when he touched he bruised. And sometimes when he took me in his arms he cut.

When I first met your daddy I thought, "Here is a man I can lay down with and make a baby." That's the first thing I thought when I seen him. I was thirty years old and had done seen my share of men. But when he walked up to me and said, "I can dance a waltz that'll make you dizzy," I thought, "Rose Lee, here is a man that you can open yourself up to and be filled to bursting. Here is a man that can fill all them empty spaces you been tipping around the edges of." One of them empty spaces was being somebody's mother.

I married your daddy and settle down to cooking his supper and keeping clean sheets on the bed. When your daddy walked through the house he was so big he filled it up. That was my first mistake. Not to make him leave some room for me. For my part in the matter. But at that time I wanted that. I wanted a house that I could sing in. And that's what your daddy gave me. I didn't know to keep up his strength I had to give up little pieces of mine. I did that. I took on his life as mine and mixed up the pieces so that you couldn't hardly tell which was which anymore. It was my choice. It was my life and I didn't have to live it like that. But that's what life offered me in the way of being a woman and I took it. I grabbed hold of it with both hands.

By the time Raynell came into the house, me and your daddy had done lost touch with one another. I didn't want to make my blessing off of nobody's misfortune . . . but I took on to Raynell like she was all them babies I had wanted and never had. (The phone rings) Like I'd been blessed to relive a part of my life. And if the Lord see fit to keep up my strength . . . I'm gonna do her just like your daddy did you . . . I'm gonna give her the best of what's in me.

RAYNELL (Entering, still with her old shoes): Mama . . . Reverend Tolliver on the phone.

(Rose exits into the house.)

Hi.

CORY: Hi.

RAYNELL: You in the Army or the Marines?

CORY: Marines.

RAYNELL: Papa said it was the Army. Did you know Blue?

CORY: Blue? Who's Blue?

RAYNELL: Papa's dog what he sing about all the time.

CORY (Singing):

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
I had a dog his name was Blue
You know Blue was mighty true
You know Blue was a good old dog
Blue treed a possum in a hollow log
You know from that he was a good old dog.
Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

(Raynell joins in singing.)

CORY AND RAYNELL:

Blue treed a possum out on a limb

Blue looked at me and I looked at him
 Grabbed that possum and put him in a sack
 Blue stayed there till I came back
 Old Blue's feets was big and round
 Never allowed a possum to touch the ground.

Old Blue died and I dug his grave
 I dug his grave with a silver spade
 Let him down with a golden chain
 And every night I call his name
 Go on Blue, you good dog you
 Go on Blue, you good dog you

RAYNELL:

Blue laid down and died like a man
 Blue laid down and died . . .

CORY AND RAYNELL:

Blue laid down and died like a man
 Now he's treeing possums in the Promised Land
 I'm gonna tell you this to let you know
 Blue's gone where the good dogs go
 When I hear Old Blue bark
 When I hear Old Blue bark
 Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark
 Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.

(Rose comes to the screen door.)

ROSE: Cory, we gonna be ready to go in a minute.

CORY (To Raynell): You go on in the house and change them shoes like Mama told you so we can go to Papa's funeral.

RAYNELL: Okay, I'll be back.

(Raynell exits into the house. Cory gets up and crosses over to the tree. Rose stands at the screen door watching him. Gabriel enters from the alley.)

GABRIEL (Calling): Hey, Rose!

ROSE: Gabe?

GABRIEL: I'm here, Rose. Hey, Rose, I'm here!

(Rose enters from the house.)

ROSE: Lord . . . Look here, Lyons!

LYONS (Enters from the house): See, I told you, Rose . . . I told you they'd let him come.

CORY: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

LYONS: How you doing, Uncle Gabe?

GABRIEL: Hey, Rose. It's time. It's time to tell Saint Peter to open the Gates. Troy, you ready? You ready, Troy. I'm gonna tell Saint Peter to open the Gates. You get ready now.

(Gabriel, with great fanfare, braces himself to blow. The trumpet is without a mouthpiece. He puts the end of it into his mouth and blows with great force, like a man who has been waiting some twenty-odd years for this single moment. No sound comes out of the trumpet. He braces himself and blows again with the same result. A third time he blows. There is a weight of impossible description that falls away and leaves him bare and exposed to a frightful realization. It is a trauma that a sane and normal mind would be unable to withstand. He begins to dance. A slow, strange dance, eerie and life-giving. A dance of atavistic³ signature and ritual. Lyons attempts to embrace him. Gabriel pushes Lyons away. Gabriel begins to howl in what is an attempt at song, or perhaps a song turning back into itself in an attempt at speech. He finishes his dance and the Gates of Heaven stand open as wide as God's closet.)

That's the way that go!

(Blackout.)

QUESTIONS

1. In interviews, August Wilson describes FENCES as revolving so completely around its central character that it might “almost” be called “The Life of Troy Maxson or just Troy Maxson.” To what extent does and doesn’t that seem true?
2. Wilson also describes the play as “examin[ing] Troy’s life layer by layer” to find out why he made the choices he made” (see “Authors on Their Work” below). How do you think the play ultimately answers that question? What does it seem to present as the key to Troy’s character or as the thing he values most?
3. According to the play, how have circumstances helped to make Troy the man he is? How might he and his life have been different had he turned fifty-three in either 1947 or 1967? had he been white?
4. Does Troy’s character develop over the course of the play or only the way others see him? Why and how so?
5. What is the effect and significance of the fact that the play ends after Troy’s death? How would the play work differently and carry a different meaning if its final scene were omitted? if Troy died onstage?
6. What might the fence come to stand for or symbolize in the play? Why might Fences, plural, be a more apt title than The Fence?
7. How are father-son relationships depicted in the play? How does Troy’s relationship with his father compare to and shape his relationship with his sons? Why do you think the play includes Lyons, as well as Cory?
8. How might Rose or your impression of her evolve over the course of the play? Why does she adopt Raynell, and what effect does this choice seem to have? Why might she begin to attend church?
9. What is the significance and effect of Wilson’s choice to set the play in the Maxson’s front yard? to punctuate the play with scenes that take place on Friday nights? not to show us Troy at work, Cory playing football, and so on?

3. Characterized by a reversion to an ancient or ancestral form.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Why is Troy Maxson so insistent that his son quit the football team? What about your own cultural and historical context might make his attitude seem surprising? Write a response paper or essay exploring these questions.
2. Write an essay exploring Gabriel's role in the play. What is significant about his injuries and their cause, for example? about his fixation with Judgment Day? about his actions in the play's final scene? What might his final, "frightful realization" (1281) be, and why, according to Wilson's stage directions, might "the Gates of Heaven stand open as wide as God's closet" only after that realization and the "atavistic" dance that follows it?
3. Write an essay exploring Wilson's characterization of Rose. What might the play suggest, through her, about the options available to, or conflicts faced by, women in general or African American women in particular in the 1950s? To what extent might Wilson's play reproduce or challenge our preconceptions about such women? Alternatively, consider how FENCES might reproduce or challenge stereotypical views of black men.
4. Research theories of tragedy and the tragic hero. Drawing on both these and evidence from Wilson's play, explain whether and how FENCES might be considered a tragedy or Troy Maxson a tragic hero.
5. Write an epilogue to FENCES, a scene depicting Rose, Lyons, Cory, or Raynell in 1975. What do you imagine has happened to this character, and why and how so? If Cory had a child, for example, what would his relationship with that child be like? What might he say to his child about his father, his mother, and his own childhood?

AUTHORS ON THEIR WORK

AUGUST WILSON (1945–2005)

From Dennis Watlington, "Hurdling Fences" (1989)*

I wanted to explore our commonalities of culture. What you have in Fences is a very specific situation, a black family which the forces of racism have molded and shaped, but you also have a husband-wife, father-son. White America looks at black America in this glancing manner. They pass right by the Troy Maxsons of the world and never stop to look at them. They talk about niggers as lazy and shiftless. Well, here's a man with responsibilities as prime to his life. I wanted to examine Troy's life layer by layer and find out why he made the choices he made. (109)

From "Men, Women, and Culture: A Conversation with August Wilson" (1993)

[INTERVIEWER]: What makes Troy heroic? He's an ex-con, ex-baseball player, now a garbage collector; he exploits his brother and cheats on his wife—what is redeeming about him as an African American man?

WILSON: I think that, for me, this may be nothing more than his willingness to wrestle with his life, his willingness to engage no matter what the circumstances of his life. He hasn't given up despite the twists and turns it's given him. I find that both noble and heroic. (172)

QUIARA ALEGRÍA HUDES

(b. 1977)

Water by the Spoonful

Though she now lives in New York City with her lawyer husband and two small children, Quiara Alegría Hudes hails from Philadelphia, the city that still serves as inspiration and setting for much of her work. The daughter of a Jewish carpenter and a Puerto Rican mother and stepfather, Hudes spent her childhood exploring the city's ethnically and economically diverse neighborhoods, especially the predominantly African American West Philly area she called home and the North Philly barrios where many of her maternal relatives still live. Hudes had her first play produced by Philadelphia Young Playwrights when she was only ten. Yet when she became the first in her family to attend college, at Yale, she majored in music. After graduation, Hudes returned home, launching a successful career as a musician-composer before heading to Brown University. Here she earned an MFA (2003) and completed two plays—the award-winning Yamaya's Belly (2005), about a young Cuban boy who dreams of immigrating to the United States, and The Adventures of Barrio Grll!, which she later turned into a children's musical. Hudes received the first of three Pulitzer nominations for her work on another musical, the Tony Award–winning In the Heights (2007), featuring music and lyrics by Hamilton creator and star Lin-Manuel Miranda. But her real acclaim as a dramatist rests on a trilogy inspired by, and developed partly in collaboration with, her “story-centric family,” especially Elliot Ruiz, a cousin wounded in the Iraq War. Water by the Spoonful (2011), which won a Pulitzer, is the second play in the sequence that also includes Elliot, a Soldier's Fugue (2006) and The Happiest Song Plays Last (2012). Together, says Hudes, these plays tell a distinctly “American story” about issues and people we too often “don't talk about,” in part by exploiting and exploring diverse, often distinctly twenty-first-century ways of both talking and storytelling.

CHARACTERS

ELLIOT ORTIZ, an Iraq vet with a slight limp, works at Subway sandwich shop, scores an occasional job as a model or actor, Yazmin's cousin, Odessa's birth son, Puerto Rican, twenty-four.

YAZMIN ORTIZ, in her first year as an adjunct professor of music, Odessa's niece and Elliot's cousin, Puerto Rican, twenty-nine.

HAIKUMOM, aka Odessa Ortiz, founder of www.recover-together.com, works odd janitorial jobs, lives one notch above squalor, Puerto Rican, thirty-nine.

FOUNTAINHEAD, aka John, a computer programmer and entrepreneur, lives on Philadelphia's Main Line,¹ white, forty-one.

CHUTES&LADDERS, lives in San Diego, has worked a low-level job at the IRS since the Reagan years,² his real name is Clayton "Buddy" Wilkie, African American, fifty-six.

ORANGUTAN, a recent community college graduate, her real name is Madeleine Mays and before that Yoshiko Sakai, Japanese by birth, thirty-one.

A GHOST, also plays Professor Aman, an Arabic professor at Swarthmore;³ also plays a Policeman in Japan.

SETTING: 2009. Six years after Elliot left for Iraq. Philadelphia, San Diego, Japan and Puerto Rico.

The stage has two worlds. The "real world" is populated with chairs. The chairs are from many locations—living rooms, an office, a seminar room, a church, a diner, internet cafés, etc. They all have the worn-in feel of life. A duct-taped La-Z-Boy. Salvaged trash chairs. A busted-up metal folding chair from a rec center. An Aero chair. An Eames chair.⁴ A chair/desk from a college classroom. Diner chairs. A chair from an internet café in Japan. Living room chairs. Library chairs. A church pew. Facing in all different directions.

The "online world" is an empty space. A space that connects the chairs.

MUSIC: Jazz. John Coltrane.⁵ The sublime stuff (A Love Supreme). And the noise (Ascension).

NOTE: Unless specifically noted, when characters are online, don't have actors typing on a keyboard. Treat it like regular conversation rather than the act of writing or typing. They can be doing things people do in the comfort of their home, like eating potato chips, walking around in jammies, cooking, doing dishes, clipping nails, etc.

Scene One

Swarthmore College. Elliot and Yaz eat breakfast. Elliot wears a Subway sandwich shop polo shirt.

ELLIOT: This guy ain't coming. How do you know him?

YAZ: We're on a committee together.

ELLIOT: My shift starts in fifteen.

YAZ: All right, we'll go.

ELLIOT: Five more minutes. Tonight on the way home, we gotta stop by Whole Foods.

YAZ: Sure, I need toothpaste.

1. Series of affluent towns in Philadelphia's western suburbs, along the old Main Line of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

2. 1981–89, during the presidency of Ronald Reagan (1911–2004). IRS: Internal Revenue Service (acronym).

3. Highly ranked private liberal arts college (founded 1864) located eleven miles southwest of Philadelphia.

4. High-end chair designed in 1956 by renowned husband-and-wife team Charles (1907–78) and Ray Eames (1912–88).

5. American jazz saxophonist and composer (1926–67), pioneer of "free jazz."

Liza Colón-Zayas, Sue Jean Kim, and Frankie R. Faison in the Second Stage Theater production of Water by the Spoonful, 2012

ELLIOT: You gotta help me with my mom, Yaz.

YAZ: You said she had a good morning.

ELLIOT: She cooked breakfast.

YAZ: Progress.

ELLIOT: No. The docs said she can't be eating all that junk, it'll mess with her chemo, so she crawls out of bed for the first time in days and cooks eggs for breakfast. In two inches of pork-chop fat. I'm like, Mom, recycle glass and plastic, not grease. She thinks putting the egg on top of a paper towel after you cook it makes it healthy. I told her, Mom, you gotta cook egg whites. In Pam spray. But it has to be her way. Like, "That's how we ate them in Puerto Rico and we turned out fine." You gotta talk to her. I'm trying to teach her about quinoa. Broccoli rabe. Healthy shit. So I get home the other day, she had made quinoa with bacon. She was like, "It's healthy!"

YAZ: That's Ginny. The more stubborn she's being, the better she's feeling.

ELLIOT: I gave those eggs to the dogs when she went to the bathroom.

YAZ (Pulls some papers from her purse): You wanna be my witness?

ELLIOT: To what?

(Yaz signs the papers.)

YAZ: My now-legal failure. I'm divorced.

ELLIOT: Yaz. I don't want to hear that.

YAZ: You've been saying that for months and I've been keeping my mouth closed.

I just need a John Hancock.

ELLIOT: What happened to "trial separation"?

YAZ: There was a verdict. William fell out of love with me.

ELLIOT: I've never seen you two argue.

YAZ: We did, we just had smiles on our faces.

ELLIOT: That's bullshit. You don't divorce someone before you even have a fight with them. I'm calling him.

YAZ: Go ahead.

ELLIOT: He was just texting me about going to the Phillies game on Sunday.

YAZ: So, go. He didn't fall out of love with the family, just me.

ELLIOT: I'm going to ask him who he's been screwing behind your back.

YAZ: No one, Elliot.

ELLIOT: You were tappin' some extra on the side?

YAZ: He woke up one day and I was the same as any other person passing by on the street, and life is short, and you can only live in mediocrity so long.

ELLIOT: You two are the dog and the owner that look like each other. Ya'll are the Cosby Show.⁶ Conundrum, Yaz and William make a funny, end-of episode. You show all us cousins, maybe we can't ever do it ourselves, but it is possible.

YAZ: Did I ever say, "It's possible"?

ELLIOT: By example.

YAZ: Did I ever say those words?

(Professor Aman enters.)

AMAN: Yazmin, forgive me. You must be . . .

ELLIOT: Elliot Ortiz. Nice to meet you, I appreciate it.

AMAN: Professor Aman. (They shake) We'll have to make this short and sweet, my lecture begins . . . began . . . well, talk fast.

ELLIOT: Yaz, give us a second?

YAZ: I'll be in the car. (Exits)

ELLIOT: I'm late, too, so . . .

AMAN: You need something translated.

ELLIOT: Just a phrase. Thanks, man.

AMAN: Eh, your sister's cute.

ELLIOT: Cousin. I wrote it phonetically. You grow up speaking Arabic?

AMAN: English. What's your native tongue?

ELLIOT: Spanglish. (Hands Aman a piece of paper)

AMAN: Mom-ken men fad-luck ted-dini ga-waz saf-far-i. Mom-ken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari. Am I saying that right?

ELLIOT (Spooked): Spot on.

AMAN: You must have some familiarity with Arabic to remember it so clearly.

ELLIOT: Maybe I heard it on TV or something.

AMAN: An odd phrase.

ELLIOT: It's like a song I can't get out of my head.

AMAN: Yazmin didn't tell me what this is for.

ELLIOT: It's not for anything.

AMAN: Do you mind me asking, what's around your neck?

ELLIOT: Something my girl gave me.

AMAN: Can I see? (Elliot pulls dog tags from under his shirt) Romantic gift. You were in the army.

6. Television sitcom (1984–92) about a close-knit upper-middle-class African American family starring comedian Bill Cosby (b. 1937).

ELLIOT: Marines.

AMAN: Iraq?

ELLIOT: For a minute.

AMAN: Were you reluctant to tell me that?

ELLIOT: No.

AMAN: Still in the service?

ELLIOT: Honorable discharge. Leg injury.

AMAN: When?

ELLIOT: A few years ago.

AMAN: This is a long time to have a phrase stuck in your head.

ELLIOT: What is this, man?

AMAN: You tell me.

ELLIOT: It's just a phrase. If you don't want to translate, just say so.

AMAN: A college buddy is making a film about Marines in Iraq. Gritty, documentary-style. He's looking for some veterans to interview. Get an authentic point of view. Maybe I could pass your number on to him.

ELLIOT: Nope. No interviews for this guy.

AMAN: You're asking me for a favor. (Pause) Yazmin told me you're an actor. Every actor needs a break, right?

ELLIOT: I did enough Q&As about the service. People manipulate you with the questions.

AMAN: It's not just to interview. He needs a right-hand man, an expert to help him. How do Marines hold a gun? How do they kick in civilian doors, this sort of thing. How do they say "Ooh-rah" in a patriotic manner?

ELLIOT: Are you his headhunter or something?

AMAN: I'm helping with the translations, I have a small stake and I want the movie to be accurate. And you seem not unintelligent. For a maker of sandwiches. (Hands him a business card) He's in L.A. In case you want a career change. I give you a cup of sugar, you give me a cup of sugar.

ELLIOT: If I have a minute, I'll dial the digits. (Takes the business card) So what's it mean?

AMAN: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari. Rough translation, "Can I please have my passport back?"

Scene Two

Odessa's living room and kitchen. She makes coffee. She goes over to her computer, clicks a button. On a screen we see:

HAIKUMOM, SITEADMIN
STATUS: ONLINE

HAIKUMOM: Rise and shine, kiddos, the rooster's a-crowin', it's a beautiful day to be sober. (No response) Your Thursday morning haiku:⁷

if you get restless

7. Originally Japanese poetic form that, in its English-language incarnations, traditionally consists of seventeen syllables divided into three lines of five, seven, and five syllables, respectively.

buy a hydrangea or rose water it, wait, bloom

(Odessa continues making coffee. A computer dings and on another screen we see:)

ORANGUTAN
STATUS: ONLINE

ORANGUTAN: Ninety-one days. Smiley face.

HAIKUMOM (Relieved): Orangutan! Jesus, I thought my primate friend had disappeared back to the jungle.

ORANGUTAN: Disappeared? Yes. Jungle? Happily, no.

HAIKUMOM: I'm trying to put a high-five emoticon, but my computer is being a capital B. So, high-five!

(They high-five in the air. Another computer screen lights up:)

CHUTES&LADDERS
STATUS: ONLINE

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan? I was about to send a search party after your rear end. Kid, log on. No news is bad news.

ORANGUTAN: Chutes&Ladders, giving me a hard time as usual. I'd expect nothing less.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your last post says: "Day One. Packing bags, gotta run," and then you don't log on for three months?

ORANGUTAN: I was going to Japan, I had to figure out what shoes to bring.

HAIKUMOM: The country?

CHUTES&LADDERS: What happened to Maine?

ORANGUTAN: And I quote, "Get a hobby, find a new job, an exciting city, go teach English in a foreign country." Did you guys think I wouldn't take your seasoned advice? I was batting 0 for ten, and for the first time, guys, I feel fucking free.

HAIKUMOM (Nonjudgmental): Censored.

ORANGUTAN: I wake up and I think, What's the world got up its sleeve today? And I look forward to the answer. So, thank you.

CHUTES&LADDERS: We told you so.

ORANGUTAN (Playful): Shut up.

HAIKUMOM: You're welcome.

ORANGUTAN: I gave my parents the URL. My username, my password. They logged on and read every post I've ever put on here and for once they said they understood. They had completely cut me off, but after reading this site they bought me the plane ticket. One way. I teach English in the mornings. I have a class of children, a class of teens, and a class of adults, most of whom are older than me. I am free in the afternoons. I have a paycheck which I use for legal things like ice cream, noodles and socks. I walk around feeling like maybe I am normal. Maybe, just possibly, I'm not that different. Or maybe it's just homeland delusions.

CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: Homeland?

HAIKUMOM: You're Japanese?

ORANGUTAN: I was, for the first eight days of my life. Yoshiko Sakai. Then on day nine I was adopted and moved to Cape Lewiston, Maine, where I became Ma— M.M., and where in all my days I have witnessed one other Asian. In the Superfresh. Deli counter.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Japan . . . Wow, that little white rock sure doesn't discriminate.

HAIKUMOM: Amen.

ORANGUTAN: Mango Internet Café. I'm sitting in an orange plastic chair, a little view of the Hokkaido waterfront.

HAIKUMOM: Japan has a waterfront?

CHUTES&LADDERS: It's an island.

HAIKUMOM: Really? Are there beaches? Can you go swimming?

ORANGUTAN: The ocean reminds me of Maine. Cold water, very quiet, fisherman, boats, the breeze. I wouldn't try swimming. I'm just a looker. I was never one to actually have an experience.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Ah, the ocean . . . There's only one thing on this planet I'm more scared of than that big blue lady.

HAIKUMOM: Let me guess: landing on a sliding board square?⁸

CHUTES&LADDERS: Lol, truer words have never been spoken. You know I was born just a few miles from the Pacific. In the fresh salt air. Back in "those days" I'm at Coronado Beach⁹ with a few "friends" doing my "thing" and I get sucked up under this wave. I gasp, I breathe in and my lungs fill with water. I'm like, this is it, I'm going to meet my maker. I had never felt so heavy, not even during my two OD's.¹ I was sinking to the bottom and my head hit the sand like a lead ball. My body just felt like an anvil. The next thing I know there's fingers digging in my ankles. This lifeguard pulls me out, I'm throwing up salt water. I say to him, "Hey blondie, you don't know me from Adam but you are my witness: today's the day I start to live." And this lifeguard, I mean he was young with these muscles, this kid looks at me like, "Who is this big black dude who can't even doggy paddle?" When I stand up and brush the sand off me, people applaud. An old lady touches my cheek and says, "I thought you were done for." I get back to San Diego that night, make one phone call, the next day I'm in my first meeting, sitting in a folding chair, saying the serenity prayer.²

8. In Milton Bradley's board game Chutes & Ladders (based on the ancient Indian game Snakes and Ladders), some squares are connected by sliding boards, or "chutes." Players landing on the square picturing the top of the chute advance or "slide" directly to the square picturing the bottom of the chute.

9. On Coronado Island, just off the coast of San Diego, California.

1. Overdoses (acronym).

2. Authored by American theologian Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971) and adopted by Alcoholics Anonymous and other twelve-step addiction-recovery programs, it reads, "God, grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, / The courage to change the things I can, / And the wisdom to know the difference."

ORANGUTAN: I hate to inflate your already swollen ego, but that was a lucid, touching story. By the way, did you get the lifeguard's name? He sounds hot.

HAIKUMOM: Hey Chutes&Ladders, it's never too late to learn. Most YMCAs offer adult swimming classes.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'll do the world a favor and stay out of a speedo.

ORANGUTAN: Sober air toast. To lifeguards.

CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: To lifeguards.

ORANGUTAN, CHUTES&LADDERS AND HAIKUMOM: Clink.

HAIKUMOM: Chutes&Ladders, I'm buying you a pair of water wings.

Scene Three

John Coltrane's A Love Supreme plays. A Subway sandwich shop on Philadelphia's Main Line. Elliot sits behind the counter. The phone rings. He gets up, hobbles to it—he walks with a limp.

ELLIOT: Subway Main Line. Lar! Laaar, what's it doing for you today? Staying in the shade? I got you, how many you need? Listen, the delivery guy's out and my little sports injury is giving me hell so can you pick up? Cool, sorry for the inconvenience. Let me grab a pen. A'ight, pick a hoagie, any hoagie!

(Elliot begins writing the order.

Lights rise to a seminar room at Swarthmore College. We find Yaz mid-class. She hits a button on a stereo and the Coltrane stops playing.)

YAZ: Coltrane's A Love Supreme, 1964. Dissonance is still a gateway to resolution. A B-diminished chord is still resolving to? C-major. A tritone is still resolving up to? The major sixth. Diminished chords, tritones, still didn't have the right to be their own independent thought. In 1965 something changed. The ugliness bore no promise of a happy ending. The ugliness became an end in itself. Coltrane democratized the notes. He said, they're all equal. Freedom. It was called Free Jazz but freedom is a hard thing to express musically without spinning into noise. This is from Ascension, 1965.

(She plays Ascension. It sounds uglier than the first sample. In the Subway, a figure comes into view. It is the Ghost.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(Elliot tries to ignore the Ghost, reading off the order.)

ELLIOT: That's three teriyaki onion with chicken. First with hots and onions. Second with everything. Third with extra bacon. Two spicy Italian with American cheese on whole grain. One BMT on flatbread. Good so far?

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ELLIOT: Five chocolate chip cookies, one oatmeal raisin. Three Baked Lay's, three Doritos. Two Sprite Zeros, one Barq's, one Coke, two orange sodas. How'd I do?

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ELLIOT: All right, that'll be ready in fifteen minutes. One sec for your total.

(Elliot gets a text message. He reads it; his entire demeanor shifts.)

Lar, I just got a text. There's a family emergency, I can't do this order right now.

(Elliot hangs up. He exits, limping away.)

YAZ: Oh come on, don't make that face. I know it feels academic. You're going to leave here and become R&B hit makers and Sondheim³ clones and never think about this noise again. But this is Coltrane, people, this is not Schoenberg!⁴ This is jazz, stuff people listen to voluntarily. Shopping period is still on—go sit in one session of “Germans and Noise” down the hall and you'll come running back begging for this muzak.

(Yaz turns off the music.)

In fact, change the syllabus. No listening report next week. Instead, I want you to pinpoint the first time you really noticed dissonance. The composer, the piece, the measures. Two pages analyzing the notes and two pages describing the experience personally. This is your creation myth.⁵ Before you leave this school you better figure out that story and cling to it for dear life or you'll be a stockbroker within a year.

I was thirteen, I worked in a corrugated box factory all summer, I saved up enough to find my first music teacher—up to that point I was self-taught, playing to the radio. I walked into Don Rappaport's room at Settlement Music School.⁶ He was old, he had jowls, he was sitting at the piano and he said, “What do you do?” I said, “I'm a composer, sir.” Presumptuous, right? I sat down and played Mr. Rappaport a Yazmin original. He said, “It's pretty, everything goes together. It's like an outfit where your socks are blue and your pants, shirt, hat are all blue.” Then he said, “Play an F-sharp major in your left hand.” Then he said, “Play a C-major in your right hand.” “Now play them together.” He asked me, “Does it go together?” I told him, “No, sir.” He said, “Now go home and write.” My first music lesson was seven minutes long. I had never really heard dissonance before.

(Yaz's phone vibrates. She sees the caller with concern.)

Let's take five.

(As students file out, Yaz makes a phone call. Lights up on Elliot outside the Subway.)

(“What's the bad news?”) You called three times.

ELLIOT: She's still alive.

YAZ: Okay.

3. Stephen Sondheim (b. 1930), multi-award-winning American composer-lyricist best known for hit Broadway musicals including West Side Story (1957), for which he wrote the lyrics only; Sweeney Todd (1979); and Into the Woods (1986).

4. Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951), influential avant-garde Austrian classical pianist, composer, and music theorist.

5. Narrative recounting a particular culture or religion's understanding of how something (usually the world itself) came to be.

6. Philadelphia institution originally founded (1908) to provide free music instruction to newly arrived immigrants but today offering music, dance, and visual arts classes to children and adults across the city “without regard to age, race or financial circumstances.” Hudes is an alumna.

ELLIOT: Jefferson Hospital. They admitted her three hours ago. Pop had the courtesy to text me.

YAZ: Are you still at work?

ELLIOT: Just smashed the bathroom mirror all over the floor. Boss sent me out to the parking lot.

YAZ: Wait there. I'm on my way.

ELLIOT: "Your mom is on breathing machine." Who texts that? Who texts that and then doesn't pick up the phone?

YAZ: I'll be there within twenty.

ELLIOT: Why did I come to work today?

YAZ: She had a good morning. You wanted your thing translated.

ELLIOT: She cooked and I wouldn't eat a bite off the fork. There's a Subway hoagies around the corner and I had to work half an hour away.

YAZ: You didn't want your buddies to see you working a normal job.

ELLIOT: Not normal job. Shit job. I'm a butler. A porter of sandwiches.

YAZ: Ginny's been to Hades and back, stronger each time.

ELLIOT: What is Hades?

YAZ: In Greek mythology, the river through the underworld—

ELLIOT: My mom's on a machine and you're dropping vocab words?!

(A ding.)

YAZ: Text message, don't hang up. (She looks at her phone. A moment, then) You still there?

ELLIOT: It was my dad wasn't it? Yaz, spit it out.

YAZ: It was your dad.

ELLIOT: And? Yaz, I'm about to start walking down Lancaster Avenue for thirty miles till I get back to Philly and I don't care if I snap every wire out my leg and back—I need to get out of here. I need to see Mom, I need to talk to her!

YAZ: He said, "Waiting for Elliot till we turn off the machine."

The chat room. A screen lights up:

FOUNTAINHEAD⁷

STATUS: ONLINE

FOUNTAINHEAD: I've uh, wow, hello there everyone. Delete, delete. Good afternoon. Evening. Delete.

(Deep breath.)

Things I am taking:

—My life into my own hands.

—My gorgeous, deserving wife out for our seventh anniversary.

7. Title of a best-selling 1943 novel by Ayn Rand (1905–82), a famous evocation of her individualist philosophy.

Me: mildly athletic, but work twice as hard. Won state for javelin two years straight. Ran a half marathon last fall. Animated arguer. Two medals for undergrad debate. MBA from Wharton.⁸ Beautiful wife, two sons. Built a programming company from the ground up, featured in the New York Times' Circuits section, sold it at its peak, bought a yellow Porsche, got a day job to keep myself honest. Salary was 300K, company was run by morons, got laid off, handsome severance, which left me swimming in cash and free time.

Me and crack: long story short, I was at a conference with our CFO and two programmers and a not-unattractive lady in HR.⁹ They snorted, invited me to join. A few weeks later that little rock waltzed right into my hand. I've been using off and on since. One eight ball every Saturday, strict rations, portion control. Though the last three or four weeks, it's less like getting high and more like trying to build a time machine. Anything to get back the romance of that virgin smoke.

Last weekend I let myself buy more than my predetermined allotment—I buy in small quantity, because as with my food, I eat what's on my plate. Anyway, I ran over a curb, damaged the underside of my Porsche. Now it's in the shop and I'm driving a rental Mustang. So, not rock bottom but a rental Ford is as close to rock bottom as I'd like to get. Fast forward to tonight. I'm watching my wife's eyelids fall and telling myself, "You are on punishment, Poppa. Daddy's on time out. Do not get out of bed, do not tiptoe down those stairs, do not go down to that basement, do not sit beside that foosball table, do not smoke, and please do not crawl on the carpet looking for one last hit in the fibers."

(Pause.)

In kindergarten my son tested into G and T. Gifted and talented. You meet with the school, they tailor the program to the kid. Math, reading, art, whatever the parent chooses. I said, "Teach my son how to learn. How to use a library. How to find original source material, read a map, track down the experts so he becomes an expert." Which gets me to—

You: the experts. It's the first day of school and I'm knocking at your classroom door. I got my No. 2 pencils, I'll sit in the front row, pay attention, and do my homework. No lesson is too basic. Teach me every technique. Any tip so that Saturday doesn't become every day. Any actions that keep you in the driver seat. Healthy habits and rational thoughts to blot out that voice in the back of my head.

Today, I quit. My wife cannot know, she'd get suspicious if I were at meetings all the time. There can be no medical records, so therapy is out. At least it's not heroin, I'm not facing a physical war. It's a psychological battle and I'm armed with two weapons: willpower and the experts.

I'm taking my wife out tomorrow for our seventh anniversary and little does she know that when we clink glasses, I'll be toasting to Day One.

(Odessa is emotional. Chutes&Ladders and Orangutan seem awestruck.)

8. Famed business school (founded 1881) of the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. MBA: master of business administration (acronym).

9. Human resources (acronym). CFO: chief financial officer (acronym).

ORANGUTAN (Clapping): That was brave.

CHUTES&LADDERS: What. The.

HAIKUMOM: Careful.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fuck.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

ORANGUTAN: I'm making popcorn. Oh, this is gonna be fun!

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, speaking of experts, I've been meaning to become an asshole. Can you teach me how?

HAIKUMOM: Censored!

ORANGUTAN: "Tips"? This isn't a cooking website. And what is a half marathon?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Maybe it's something like a half crack addict. Or a half husband.

ORANGUTAN: Was that an addiction coming out or an online dating profile? "Married Male Dope Fiend. Smokin' hot."

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, you sound like the kind of guy who's read *The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People*¹ cover to cover. Was one of those habits crack? Give the essays a rest and type three words. "I'm. A. Crackhead."

ORANGUTAN: You know, adderall is like totes² cool. Us crackheads, we're like yucky and stuff. We're like so nineties. Go try the adderall edge!

HAIKUMOM: Hey.

ORANGUTAN: The guy's a hoax. Twenty bucks says he's pranking. Let's start a new thread.

HAIKUMOM: Hi, Fountainhead, welcome. As the site administrator, I want to honestly congratulate you for accomplishing what so many addicts only hope for: one clean day. Any time you feel like using, log on here instead. It's worked for me. When it comes to junkies, I dug lower than the dungeon. Once upon a time I had a beautiful family, too. Now all I have is six years clean. Don't lose what I lost, what Chutes&Ladders lost.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Excuse me.

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan, I just checked and Fountainhead has no aliases and has never logged onto this site before under a different pseudonym, which are the usual markers of a scam.

ORANGUTAN: I'm just saying. Who toasts to their first day of sobriety?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I hope it's seltzer in that there champagne glass.

ORANGUTAN: Ginger ale, shirley temple.

CHUTES&LADDERS: "A toast, honey. I had that seven-year itch so I became a crackhead."

CHUTES&LADDERS AND ORANGUTAN: Clink.

HAIKUMOM: Hey; kiddos. Your smiley administrator doesn't want to start purging messages. For rules of the forums click on this link. No personal attacks.

ORANGUTAN: We don't come to this site for a pat on the back.

HAIKUMOM: I'm just saying. R-e-s-p-e-c-t.

1. Popular business self-help book (1989) by Stephen R. Covey (1932–2012) stressing the principles of independence and self-mastery, interdependence, and continuous improvement.

2. Totally (slang). Adderall: stimulant used to treat narcolepsy and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD).

CHUTES&LADDERS: I will always give crack the respect it deserves. Some purebred poodle comes pissing on my tree trunk? Damn straight I'll chase his ass out my forest.

HAIKUMOM: This here is my forest. You two think you were all humble pie when you started out? Check your original posts.

ORANGUTAN: Oh, I know mine. "I-am-scared-I-will-kill-myself-talk-me-off-the-ledge."

HAIKUMOM: So unless someone gets that desperate they don't deserve our noble company? "Suffer like me, or you ain't legit"?

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom's growing claws.

HAIKUMOM: Just don't act entitled because you got so low. (To Fountainhead) Sorry. Fountainhead, forgive us. We get very passionate because—

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, your Porsche has a massive engine. You got bulging marathon muscles. I'm sure your penis is as big as that javelin you used to throw.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

CHUTES&LADDERS: But none of those things come close to the size of your ego. If you can put that aside, you may, may stand a chance. Otherwise, you're fucked, my friend.

HAIKUMOM: Message purged.

ORANGUTAN: OH MY GOD, WE'RE DYING HERE, DO WE HAVE TO BE SO POLITE ABOUT IT?

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

ORANGUTAN: Oh my G-zero-D. Democracy or dictatorship?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey Fountainhead, why the silence?

(Fountainhead logs off.)

HAIKUMOM: Nice work, guys. Congratulations.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You don't suppose he's . . . crawling on the carpet looking for one last rock??

ORANGUTAN: Lordy lord lord, I'm about to go over his house and start looking for one myself!

HAIKUMOM: That's why you're in Japan, little monkey. For now, I'm closing this thread. Fountainhead, if you want to reopen it, email me directly.

Scene Five

A flower shop in Center City³ Philadelphia. Yaz looks over some brochures. Elliot enters, his limp looking worse.

YAZ: I was starting to get worried. How you holding?

ELLIOT: Joe's Gym, perfect remedy.

YAZ: You went boxing? Really?

ELLIOT: I had to blow off steam. Women don't get it.

YAZ: Don't be a pig. You've had four leg surgeries, no more boxing.

ELLIOT: Did Odessa call?

YAZ: You know how she is. Shutting herself out from the world.

3. Downtown district, the city's business and transportation hub.

ELLIOT: We need help this week.

YAZ: And I got your back.

ELLIOT: I'm just saying, pick up the phone and ask, "Do you need anything, Elliot?"

YAZ: I did speak to your dad. Everyone's gathering at the house. People start arriving from PR⁴ in a few hours. The next door neighbor brought over two trays of pigs feet.

ELLIOT: I just threw up in my mouth.

YAZ: Apparently a fight broke out over who gets your mom's pocketbooks.

ELLIOT: Those pleather things from the ten-dollar store?

YAZ: Thank you, it's not like she had Gucci purses!

ELLIOT: People just need to manufacture drama.

YAZ: He said they were tearing through Ginny's closets like it was a shopping spree. "I want this necklace!" "I want the photo album!" "Yo, those chancletas⁵ are mine!" I'm like, damn, let the woman be buried first.

ELLIOT: Yo, let's spend the day here.

YAZ (Handing him some papers): Brochures. I was being indecisive so the florist went to work on a wedding bouquet. I ruled out seven, you make the final call. Celebration of Life, Blooming Garden, Eternity Wreath.

ELLIOT: All of those have carnations. I don't want a carnation within a block of the church.

YAZ: You told me to eliminate seven. I eliminated seven. Close your eyes and point.

ELLIOT: Am I a particularly demanding person?

YAZ: Yes. What's so wrong with a carnation?

ELLIOT: You know what a carnation says to the world? That they were out of roses at the 7-Eleven. It should look something like Mom's garden.

YAZ (In agreement): Graveside Remembrances? That looks something like it . . . I'm renominating Graveside Remembrances. Putting it back on the table.

ELLIOT: You couldn't find anything tropical? Yaz, you could find a needle in a damn haystack and you couldn't find a bird of paradise or something?

YAZ: He just shoved some brochures in my hand.

ELLIOT (Stares her down): You have an awful poker face.

YAZ: Now, look here.

ELLIOT: You did find something.

YAZ: No. Not exactly.

ELLIOT: How much does it cost? Yaz, this is my mom we're talking about.

YAZ: Five hundred more. Just for the casket piece.

ELLIOT: You can't lie for shit, you never could.

YAZ: Orchid Paradise.

(Yaz hands him another brochure. They look at it together.)

ELLIOT: Aw damn. Damn. That looks like her garden.

YAZ: Spitting image.

ELLIOT (Pointing): I think she grew those.

YAZ: Right next to the tomatoes.

4. Puerto Rico (acronym).

5. Sandals or flip-flops (Spanish slang).

ELLIOT: But hers were yellow. Fuck.

YAZ: It's very odd to order flowers when someone dies. Because the flowers are just gonna die, too. "Would you like some death with your death?"

ELLIOT (A confession): I didn't water them.

YAZ (Getting it): What, are you supposed to be a gardener all of a sudden?

ELLIOT: It doesn't rain for a month and do I grab the hose and water Mom's garden one time?

YAZ: You were feeding her. Giving her meds. Bathing her. I could've come over and watered a leaf. A single petal.

ELLIOT: The last four days, she'd wake me up in the middle of the night. "Did you water the flowers?" "Yeah, Mom, just like you told me to yesterday." "Carry me out back, I want to see." "Mom, you're too heavy, I can't carry you down those steps one more time today."

YAZ: Little white lies.

ELLIOT: Can you do the sermon?

YAZ: This is becoming a second career.

ELLIOT: Because you're the only one who doesn't cry.

YAZ: Unlike Julia.

ELLIOT (Imitating): "¡Ay dios mio!⁶ ¡Ay! ¡Ay!"

YAZ: I hate public speaking.

ELLIOT: You're a teacher.

YAZ: It's different when it's ideas. Talking about ideas isn't saying something, it's making syllables with your mouth.

ELLIOT: You love ideas. All you ever wanted to do was have ideas.

YAZ: It was an elaborate bait and switch. The ideas don't fill the void, they just help you articulate it.

ELLIOT: You've spoken at city hall. On the radio.

YAZ: You're the face of Main Line Chevrolet. (Pause) Can I do it in English?

ELLIOT: You could do it in Russian for all I care. I'll just be in the front row acting like my cheek is itchy so no one sees me crying.

YAZ: The elders want a good Spanish sermon.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny was it. You're the elder now.

YAZ: I'm twenty-nine.

ELLIOT: But you don't look a day over fifty.

YAZ: You gotta do me a favor in return. I know this is your tragedy but . . . Call William. Ask him not to come to the funeral.

ELLIOT: Oh shit.

YAZ: He saw the obit in the Daily News.

ELLIOT: They were close. Mami Ginny loved that blond hair. She was the madrina⁷ of your wedding.

YAZ: William relinquished mourning privileges. You fall out of love with me, you lose certain rights. He calls talking about, "I want the condo." Fuck that. Fuck that. Coming from you it won't seem bitter. Wants the fucking condo all for hisself. That I decorated, that I painted. "Oh, and where's the funeral, by the way?" You know, he's been to four funerals in the Ortiz clan and I could feel

6. Oh Lord or Oh my God (Spanish).

7. Matron of honor (Spanish).

it, there was a part of him, under it all, that was disgusted. The open casket. The prayers.

ELLIOT: It is disgusting.

YAZ: Sitting in the pew knowing what freaks we are.

ELLIOT: He's good people.

YAZ: I was probably at his side doing the same thing, thinking I'm removed, that I'm somehow different.

ELLIOT: Hey, hey, done.

YAZ: One more condition. I go to Puerto Rico with you. We scatter her ashes together.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny couldn't be buried in Philly. She had to have her ashes thrown at a waterfall in El Yunque,⁸ just to be the most Puerto Rican mother-fucker around.

YAZ: I saw your Colgate ad.

ELLIOT: Dang, cousin Yaz watches Spanish TV?

YAZ: Shut up.

ELLIOT: I walked into the casting office, flashed my pearly whites, showed them my military ID and I charmed them.

YAZ: Do it.

ELLIOT: Give me a dollar.

YAZ: For that big cheeseburger smile?

(She gives him a dollar.)

ELLIOT (Smiling): "Sonrisa,⁹ baby!"

(Yaz cracks up laughing, which devolves into tears.)

How we gonna pay for Orchid Paradise?

YAZ: They should have a frequent-flower card. They punch a hole. Buy nine funeral bouquets, get the tenth free. We'd be living in a house full of lilies. Look at that guy. Arranging his daisies like little treasures. What do you think it's like to be him? To be normal?

ELLIOT: Normal? A hundred bucks says that dude has a closet full of animal porno at home.

YAZ: I bet in his family, funerals are rare occasions. I bet he's never seen a cousin get arrested. Let alone one under the age of eighteen. I bet he never saw his eight-year-old cousin sipping rum through a twisty straw or . . . I just remembered this time cousin Maria was babysitting me . . .

ELLIOT: Fat Maria or Buck Tooth Maria?

YAZ: Pig.

ELLIOT: Ah, Fat Maria.

YAZ: I was dyeing her hair. I had never dyed hair before so I asked her to read me the next step and she handed me the box and said, "You read it." And I said, "My rubber gloves are covered in toxic goop, I can't really hold that right now." And so she held it in front of my eyes and said, "You gonna have to read it because I sure as hell can't."

8. Tropical rain forest in Puerto Rico, part of the U.S. National Forest System.

9. Smile (Spanish).

ELLIOT: I been knowed that.

YAZ: I said, "But you graduated from high school." She said, "They just pass you, I just stood in the back." I was in fourth grade. I could read! (Pause) I have a degree written in Latin that I don't even understand. I paid seventeen thousand dollars for my piano.

ELLIOT: Oh shit.

YAZ: I have a mortgage on my piano. Drive two miles north? William told me every time I went to North Philly, I'd come back different. His family has Quaker Oats for DNA. They play Pictionary on New Year's. I'd sit there wishing I could scoop the blood out my veins like you scoop the seeds out a pumpkin and he'd be like, "Whatchu thinking about, honey?" And I'd be like, "Nothing. Let's play some Pictionary."

ELLIOT: Yo, being the scholarship case at an all-white prep school really fucked with your head, didn't it?

YAZ: I should've gone to Edison.

ELLIOT: Public school in el barrio.¹ You wouldn't have survived there for a day.

YAZ: Half our cousins didn't survive there.

ELLIOT: True. But you would've pissed your pants. At least their pants was dry when they went down.

YAZ: You're sick.

ELLIOT: And the ladies love me.

YAZ: I thought abuela² dying, that would be the end of us. But Ginny grabbed the torch. Christmas, Easter. Now what? Our family may be fucked-up but we had somewhere to go. A kitchen that connected us. Plastic-covered sofas where we could park our communal asses.

ELLIOT: Pop's selling the house. And the plastic-covered sofas. He's moving back to the Bronx, be with his sisters.

YAZ: You going with him? (Elliot shrugs) Wow. I mean, once that living room is gone, I may never step foot in North Philly again.

ELLIOT: Washed up at age twenty-four. Disabled vet. Motherless chil'. Working at Subway. Soon-to-be homeless.

YAZ: My couch is your couch.

ELLIOT: Until William takes your couch.

YAZ: My cardboard box is your cardboard box.

ELLIOT: I could go out to L.A. and be a movie star.

YAZ: You need a manager? Shoot I'm coming witchu. Forget Philly.

ELLIOT: Change of scene, baby. Dream team.

YAZ: Probably we should order some flowers first, though. Don'tcha think? (Elliot nods. To the florist) Sir?

Scene Six

The chat room. Orangutan is online, seems upset.

1. Spanish-speaking district or neighborhood.

2. Grandmother (Spanish).

ORANGUTAN: 2:38 A.M. Tuesday. The witching hour.

(Chutes&Ladders logs on.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: 1:38 P.M. Monday. The lunch hour.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in a gay bar slash internet café in the city of Sapporo. Deafening dance music.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sure you should be in a bar, little monkey?

ORANGUTAN (Disappointed): I flew halfway around the world and guess what? It was still me who got off the plane. (Taking comfort) Sapporo is always open. The world turns upside down at night.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're in a city named after a beer sitting in a bar. Go home.

ORANGUTAN: Everything in this country makes sense but me. The noodles in soup make sense. The woodpecker outside my window every evening? Completely logical. The girls getting out of school in their miniskirts and shy smiles? Perfectly natural. I'm floating. I'm a cloud. My existence is one sustained out-of-body experience. It doesn't matter if I change my shoes, there's not a pair I've ever been able to fill. I'm a baby in a basket on an endless river. Wherever I go I don't make sense there.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey, little monkey. How many days you got?

ORANGUTAN: I think day ninety-six is when the demons really come out to play.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Ninety-six? Girl, hang your hat on that.

ORANGUTAN: I really really really want to smoke crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yeah, well don't.

ORANGUTAN: Distract me from myself. What do you really really really want, Chutes&Ladders?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I wouldn't say no to a new car—my Tercel is one sorry sight.

ORANGUTAN: What else?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Tuesday's crossword. On Monday I'm done by the time I sit at my desk. I wish every day could be a Tuesday.

ORANGUTAN: What about your son? Don't you really really really want to call him?

CHUTES&LADDERS: By all accounts, having me be a stranger these ten years has given him the best decade of his life.

ORANGUTAN: I've known you for how long?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Three Christmas Eves. When you logged on you were a stone-cold user. We sang Christmas carols online all night. Now you've got ninety days.

ORANGUTAN: Can I ask you a personal question? What's your day job?

CHUTES&LADDERS: IRS. GS4 paper pusher.

ORANGUTAN: Got any vacation days?

CHUTES&LADDERS: A solid collection. I haven't taken a vacation in ten years.

ORANGUTAN: Do you have money?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Enough to eat steak on Friday nights. Enough to buy pay-per-view boxing.

ORANGUTAN: Yeah, I bet that's all the pay-per-view you buy. (Pause) Enough money to fly to Japan?

(Pause.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: You should know I'm fifty years old on a good day. I eat three and a half doughnuts for breakfast and save the remaining half for brunch. I have small hands, six toes on my left foot. And my face resembles a corgi.

ORANGUTAN: If I was looking for a hot screw I wouldn't be logging on to this site.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Damn, was it something I said?

ORANGUTAN (With honest admiration): I've been on this planet for thirty-one years and you're the only person I've ever met who's more sarcastic than I am yet still believes in God.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Taking the compliment): Says the agnostic.

ORANGUTAN: The atheist. Who is very envious of believers. My brain is my biggest enemy—always arguing my soul into a corner. (Pause) I like you. Come to Japan. We can go get an ice cream. I can show you the countryside.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I don't have a passport. If my Tercel can't drive there, I generally don't go.

ORANGUTAN: Come save me in Japan. Be my knight in shining armor.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'll admit, I'm a dashing concept. If you saw my flesh and blood, you'd be disappointed.

ORANGUTAN: I see my flesh and blood every day and I've learned to live with the disappointment.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'm the squarest of the square. I live in a square house on a square block watching a square box eating square-cut fries.

ORANGUTAN: I get it. You were the kid who colored inside the lines.

CHUTES&LADDERS: No, I was the kid who ate the crayons. Was. I went clean and all personality left my life. Flew right out the window. I had to take life on life's terms. Messy, disappointing, bad shit happens to good people, coffee stains on my necktie, boring life.

ORANGUTAN: Maybe we could hang out and have a relationship that has very little to do with crack or addiction or history. We could watch DVDs and microwave popcorn and take walks on the waterfront while we gossip about celebrities. It could be the land of the living.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Stay in the box. Keep things in their place. It's a simple, effective recipe for ten clean years.

ORANGUTAN: Forget simple. I want a goddamn challenge.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're in recovery and work in a foreign country. That's a challenge.

ORANGUTAN: No. No it's fucking not. Not if I just stay anonymous and alone. Like every day of my shit life so far. A friend, the kind that is nice to you and you are nice to in return. That would push the comfort zone. The invitation is open. Come tear my shyness open.

CHUTES&LADDERS: All right, now you're being weird. Can we change the subject?

(Haikumom appears. She's reading the newspaper.)

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan, cover your ears.

ORANGUTAN: Big Brother, always watching.

HAIKUMOM: Cover your ears, kiddo.

ORANGUTAN: That doesn't really work online.

HAIKUMOM: Okay, Chutes and Ladders, can we g-chat? One on one?

ORANGUTAN: Come on! No talking behind backs.

HAIKUMOM: Fine. Chutes&Ladders, you listening?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Lord have mercy spit it out.

HAIKUMOM: Orangutan may be immature . . .

ORANGUTAN: Hey.

HAIKUMOM: She may be annoying at times . . .

ORANGUTAN: What the f?

HAIKUMOM: She may be overbearing and self-obsessed and a little bit of a concern troll and she can type faster than she can think which often leads to diarrhea of the keyboard—

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your point?

HAIKUMOM: But she's telling you, "Be my friend." When's the last time someone opened your closet door, saw all them skeletons, and said, "Wassup?! Can I join the party?"

CHUTES&LADDERS: All right, my wrist is officially slapped. Thank you, oh nagging wives.

HAIKUMOM: Internal Revenue Service, 300 North Los Angeles Street 90012? Is that you?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Need my name, too? It's Wilkie. I'll leave it at that.

HAIKUMOM: I'm sending you a care package. Orangutan, you can uncover your ears now. I love you.

ORANGUTAN: Middle finger.

(Fountainhead's log-on appears.)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hey all, thanks for the warm two-by-four to my head.

HAIKUMOM: All right, look who's back.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Knives sharpened? Last night we ran out of butter while my wife was cooking and she sent me to the store and it took every bit of strength I could summon not to make a "wrong turn" to that parking lot I know so well. I got the butter and on the car ride home, I couldn't help it, I drove by the lot, and there was my dealer in the shadows. My brain went on attack. "Use one more time just to prove you won't need another hit tomorrow." I managed to keep on driving and bring the butter home. Major victory. And my wife pulls it out of the plastic bag and says, "This is unsalted. I said salted." Then she feels guilty so she says never mind, never mind, she'll just add a little extra salt to the pie crust but I insist. "No, no, no, my wife deserves the right kind of butter and she's gonna get it!" I mean, I bark it, I'm already halfway out the door, my heart was racing all the way to the parking lot and raced even harder when I sat in the car and smoked. So, Michael Jordan³ is benched with a broken foot. But he'll come back in the finals.

HAIKUMOM: Thanks for the update, Fountainhead. You may not believe this, but we were missing you and worried about you. Don't beat yourself up about the slip. You had three days clean. This time you'll make it to day four.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Be ambitious. Why not reach for a whopping five?

ORANGUTAN: Maybe you'll make it to day thirty if you tell your wife.

3. American basketball player (b. 1963) named in 1996 one of the fifty greatest players in NBA history.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I told you, I have my reasons, I cannot do that. My wife has some emotional issues.

ORANGUTAN (Sarcastic): No!

FOUNTAINHEAD: Listen? Please? Are you capable of that? She's in therapy twice a week. Depression, manic. I don't want to be the reason she goes down a tailspin. I actually have her best interest in mind.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yawn.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Ah, Chutes&Ladders. I could feel you circling like a vulture. Weigh in, by all means.

CHUTES&LADDERS: And I repeat. Yawn.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Chutes&Ladders, why do I get the feeling you'd be the first in line for tickets to watch me smoke again? That you'd be in the bleachers cheering if I relapse?

CHUTES&LADDERS: How can you relapse when you don't even think you're addicted?

FOUNTAINHEAD: If you read my original post clearly, I wrote that it's a psychological addiction, not like heroin.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well see then, you're not a junkie after all.

FOUNTAINHEAD: What is this, first-grade recess?

CHUTES&LADDERS: No, this is a site for crackheads trying not to be crackheads anymore. If you're not a crackhead, leave, we don't want you, you are irrelevant, get off my lawn, go.

HAIKUMOM: Chutes&Ladders, please.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I got this.

ORANGUTAN: He's still logged on.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hey Fountainhead, why did you come to this website?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I thoroughly enjoy getting shit on.

HAIKUMOM: Censored.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why do you want to be here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Want? The two times I've logged on here I've wanted to vomit.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well? Did you receive some sort of invitation? Did one of us ask you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Look, I'm the first to say it. I have a problem.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Adam had problems. Eve had problems. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: To get information.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Go to Wikipedia. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I smoke crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Go to a dealer. Why are you here?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Because I plan to stop smoking crack.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fine, when your son has a tummy-ache in the middle of the night and walks in on you tweaking and geeking just tell him, "Don't worry, Junior, Daddy's sucking on a glass dick—"

HAIKUMOM (Overlaps): Hey!

CHUTES&LADDERS: "—but Daddy makes 300K and this is all a part of Daddy's Plan!"

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'M A FUCKING CRACKHEAD.

HAIKUMOM (Apologetic): Censored.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Fuck you, Chutes&Ladders.

HAIKUMOM: Bleep.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Fuck you . . . Don't talk about my sons. Don't fucking talk about my boys.

HAIKUMOM: Bleep again.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Are you happy, Chutes&Ladders?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Absolutely not, my friend. I'm a crackhead, too, and I wouldn't wish it on my worst enemy.

FOUNTAINHEAD: And I made 300K, I'm currently unemployed. An unemployed crackhead. At least I still have all my teeth. (They laugh) Better than I can say for my dealer.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Being a friend): Ex-dealer, man.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Ex-dealer. Thank you.

HAIKUMOM: Fountainhead, welcome to the dinner party. Granted, it's a party we never wanted to be invited to, but pull up a chair and pass the salt. Some people here may pour it in your wounds. Just like you, we've all crawled on the floor with a flashlight. We've thrown out the brillo and bought some more. But guess what? You had three days. For three days straight, you didn't try to kill yourself on an hourly basis. Please. Talk to your wife about your addiction. You need every supporting resource. You are in for the fight of your life. You mentioned Wharton. I live in Philly. If you're still in the area and you have an emergency or even a craving, email me directly. Any time of night. Don't take it lightly when I say a sober day for you is a sober day for me. I know you can do this but I know you can't do it alone. So stop being a highly functioning isolator and start being a highly dysfunctional person. The only way out it is through it.

ORANGUTAN (Nostalgic): Slogans . . .

HAIKUMOM: Ya'll know I know 'em all.

CHUTES&LADDERS: They saved my life.

ORANGUTAN: Your personal favorite. Go.

HAIKUMOM: "Nothing changes if nothing changes."

(Elliot appears at the boxing gym, punching a bag. The Ghost watches him.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ORANGUTAN: "It came to pass, it didn't come to stay."

FOUNTAINHEAD: "I obsessively pursue feeling good, no matter how bad it makes me feel."

CHUTES&LADDERS: Okay, now!

ORANGUTAN: Nice!

HAIKUMOM: Rookie don't play!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

ORANGUTAN: "One hit is too many, one thousand never enough."

HAIKUMOM: "Have an at-ti-tude of gra-ti-tude."

CHUTES&LADDERS: "If you are eating a shit sandwich, chances are you ordered it."

ORANGUTAN: Ding ding ding. We have a winner!

HAIKUMOM: Censored. But good one.

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

HAIKUMOM (Turning a page in the paper): Oh shit!

ORANGUTAN: CENSORED!!!!!! YES!!!!!! Whoooooo!

HAIKUMOM: You got me.

ORANGUTAN (Victorious): You know how long I've been waiting to do that?!

HAIKUMOM: My sister Ginny's in the Daily News! A nice big picture!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

HAIKUMOM: "Eugenia P. Ortiz, A Force For Good In Philadelphia!" Okay, now!

(Elliot punches harder. His leg is starting to bother him.)

ELLIOT: Your leg feels great. Your leg feels like a million bucks. No pain. No pain.

HAIKUMOM: "In lieu of flowers contributions may be made to . . ."

(Haikumom drops the newspaper.

The Ghost blows on Elliot, knocking him to the floor.)

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(Intermission.)

Scene Seven

A diner. Odessa and John, aka Fountainhead, sit in a booth.

ODESSA: To lapsed Catholics. (They clink coffee mugs) And you thought we had nothing in common.

JOHN: When did you become interested in Buddhism?

ODESSA: My older brother used to terrorize me during mass. He would point to a statue, tell me about the evil spirit hiding behind it. Fangs, claws. I thought Saint Lazarus⁴ was gonna come to life and suck my eyes out. Buddhism? Not scary. If there's spirits, they're hiding inside you.

JOHN: Aren't those the scariest kind?

ODESSA: So, how many days do you have? It should be two now.

JOHN: I put my sons' picture on my cell phone so if I get the urge, I can just look at them instead.

ODESSA: How many days?

JOHN (Small talk): I love Puerto Rico. On my honeymoon we stayed at that hotel in Old San Juan, the old convent. (Odessa shrugs) And that Spanish fort at the top of the city? El Morro?

ODESSA: I've always been meaning to make it there.

JOHN: There are these keyholes where the cannons used to fit, and the view of the waves through them, you can practically see the Spanish armada approaching.

ODESSA: I mean, one of these days I've gotta make it to PR.

JOHN: Oh. I just figured . . .

ODESSA: The Jersey Shore. Atlantic City. The Philadelphia airport. Oh, I've been places.

JOHN: On an actual plane?

ODESSA: I only fly first-class, and I'm still saving for that ticket.

(Odessa's cell phone rings.)

4. In the Gospel of John, Jesus restores Lazarus to life four days after his death.

JOHN: You're a popular lady.

ODESSA (Into her phone, her demeanor completely changing): What? I told you, the diner on Spring Garden and Third. I'm busy, come in an hour. One hour. Now stop calling me and asking fucking directions. (She hangs up)

JOHN: Says the one who censors.

ODESSA: My sister died.

JOHN: Right. You sure you're okay?

ODESSA: She's dead, ain't nothing left to do. People act like the world is going to fall apart.

JOHN: You write very Zen⁵ messages. And yet.

ODESSA: My family knows every button to push.

JOHN: My condolences. (Pause) You don't strike me as a computer nerd. I used to employ an entire floor of them.

ODESSA: You should've seen me at first, pecking with two fingers. Now I'm like an octopus with ten little tentacles. In my neck of the woods staying clean is like trying to tap-dance on a minefield. The website fills the hours. So how are we gonna fill yours, huh? When was the last time you picked up a javelin?

JOHN: Senior year of high school.

ODESSA (Hands him a sheet of paper): There's a sober softball league. Fairmount Park, games on Sundays. Sober bowling on Thursdays.

JOHN: I lied in my first post. I've been smoking crack for two years. I've tried quitting hundreds of times. Day two? Please, I'm in the seven-hundredth day of hell.

ODESSA: You got it out of your system. Most people lie at one time or another on the site. The good news is, two years in, there's still time. (Hands him another sheet of paper) Talbott Recovery Center in Atlanta. It's designed for professionals with addictions. Paradise Recovery in Hawaii. They actually check your income before admitting you. Just for the wealthy. This place in Jersey, it's right over the bridge, they have an outpatient program for professionals like you.

JOHN: I'm tenacious. I'm driven. I love my parents.

ODESSA: Pitchforks against tanks.

JOHN: I relish in paying my taxes.

ODESSA: And you could be dead tomorrow. (Pause) Is your dealer male or female?

JOHN: I had a few. Flushed their numbers down the toilet like you suggested.

ODESSA: Your original connection. The one who got you hooked.

JOHN: Female.

ODESSA: Did you have sex with her?

JOHN: You don't beat around the bush do you?

ODESSA: I'll take that as a yes. (No answer) Do you prefer sex when you're high to sex when you're sober?

JOHN: I've never really analyzed it.

ODESSA: It can be a dangerous cocktail. Some men get off on smoking and fucking.

JOHN: All men get off on fucking.

5. Japanese school of Buddhism stressing the achievement of enlightenment through meditation, often using brief, enigmatic, often paradoxical statements (koans) to transcend rational thought.

ODESSA: Are you scared your wife will find out you're addicted to crack? Or are you scared she'll find out what came of your wedding vows?

JOHN: I should go.

ODESSA: We just ordered.

JOHN: I promised my son. There's a science fair tomorrow. Something about dioramas and crazy glue.

ODESSA: Don't talk about them. Get sober for them.

JOHN: Fuck you.

ODESSA: Leave me three bucks for your coffee cuz I ain't got it.

(He stands, pulls out three dollars. She throws the money back at him.)

You picked up the phone and called me.

JOHN (He sits down again): I don't know how to do this. I've never done this before.

ODESSA: I have and it usually doesn't end up so good. One in twenty, maybe, hang around. Most people just don't write one day and then thirty days and then you're wondering . . . And sometimes you get the answer. Cuz their wife looks on their computer and sees the website and logs on and writes, "I found him face down in the snow."

JOHN: How many day ones did you have?

ODESSA: Seven years' worth.

JOHN: Do you still crave?

ODESSA: On the good days, only every hour. Would you rather be honest with your wife, or would you rather end up like me? (Pause) That wasn't rhetorical.

JOHN: You're not exactly what I wanted to be when I grew up.

ODESSA: Truth. Now we're talking.

(Elliot and Yaz enter.)

YAZ: There she is.

(Elliot and Yaz sit down in the booth.)

ELLIOT: You were supposed to meet us at the flower place.

YAZ: The deposit was due at nine.

ODESSA: My alarm clock didn't go off.

ELLIOT: Were you up on that chat room all night?

ODESSA (Ignoring him, to a waiter, off): Can I get a refill, please?

ELLIOT: Where's the money?

ODESSA: I told you I don't have any money.

ELLIOT: And you think I do? I been paying for Mami Ginny's meds for six months straight—

ODESSA: Well get it from Yaz's mom.

YAZ: My mom put in for the headstone. She got an expensive one.

ODESSA: Headstone? She's getting cremated.

YAZ: She still needs a proper Catholic piece of granite. Right beside abuela, right beside your dad and sister and brother.

ELLIOT: And daughter.

YAZ: Everyone agreed.

ODESSA: No one asked my opinion.

ELLIOT: Everyone who showed up to the family meeting.

ODESSA: I wasn't invited.

YAZ: I texted you twice.

ODESSA: I was out of minutes.

ELLIOT: We just spoke on the phone.

ODESSA: Whatchu want me to do, Elliot, if I say I ain't got no fucking money, I ain't got no money.

JOHN: Hi, I'm John, nice to meet you.

YAZ: Yazmin.

ELLIOT: You one of Mom's rehab buddies?

JOHN: We know each other from work.

ELLIOT: You scrub toilets?

ODESSA (To John): I'm a practitioner of the custodial arts.

ELLIOT: Is she your sponsor?

JOHN (To Odessa): I thought this was going to be a private meeting.

ELLIOT: I'm her son.

JOHN (To Odessa): You must have been young.

ELLIOT: But I was raised by my Aunt Ginny and that particular aunt just died.

(To Odessa) So now, you got three hours to find some money to pay for one basket of flowers in the funeral of the woman who changed my pampers.

YAZ: We're all supposed to be helping out.

ODESSA: You both know I run out of minutes all the time. No one could be bothered to drive by and tell me face to face?

ELLIOT: Because you always bothered to drive by and say hello to Mami Ginny when you knew she was sick? Because you bothered to hit me up one time this week and say, "Elliot, I'm sorry your mom died."

ODESSA: You still got one mom alive.

ELLIOT: Really? You want to go there?

YAZ: The flower place needs the money today.

ODESSA: She was my sister and you are my son, too.

YAZ: Guys. Two hundred dollars by end of business day.

ODESSA: That's my rent.

ELLIOT: Then fifty.

ODESSA: I just spent fifty getting my phone back on.

ELLIOT: Ten dollars. For the woman who raised your son! Do we hear ten dollars? Going once!

ODESSA: I spent my last ten at the post office.

ELLIOT: Going twice!

(John goes into his wallet.)

JOHN: Here's fifty.

(They all look at him like he's crazy. He pulls out some more money.)

Two hundred?

(Elliot pushes the money back to John with one pointer finger, as if the bills might be contaminated.)

ELLIOT: No offense, I don't take money from users.

JOHN: I'm not . . . I think that was my cue.

ODESSA: Sit down. My son was just going.

ELLIOT: Did World's Best Mom here tell you about her daughter?

ODESSA: I'm about to throw this coffee in your fucking face.

YAZ: Come on, Elliot, I'll pay for the flowers.

(Elliot doesn't get up.)

ELLIOT: I looked at that chat room once. The woman I saw there? She's literally not the same person I know. (To John) Did she tell you how she became such a saint?

JOHN: We all have skeletons.

ELLIOT: Yeah well she's an archaeological dig. Did she tell you about her daughter?

ODESSA (Suddenly resigned): Go ahead, I ain't got no secrets.

YAZ (Getting up): Excuse me.

ELLIOT: Sit here and listen, Yaz. You were born with a silver spoon and you need to know how it was for me.

YAZ: I said I'd pay for the goddamn flowers so LET'S GO. NOW!

ELLIOT: My sister and I had the stomach flu, right? For a whole day we couldn't keep nothing down.

ODESSA: Three days . . . You were vomiting three days straight.

ELLIOT: Medicine, juice, anything we ate, it would come right back up. (To John) Your co-worker here took us to Children's Hospital.

ODESSA: Jefferson.

ELLIOT: It was wall-to-wall packed. Every kid in Philly had this bug. ERs were turning kids away. They gave us a flier about stomach flu and sent us home. Bright blue paper. Little cartoon diagrams. It said give your kids a spoonful of water every five minutes.

ODESSA: A teaspoon.

ELLIOT: A small enough amount that they can keep it down. Five minutes. Spoon. Five minutes. Spoon. I remember thinking, Wow, this is it. Family time. Quality time. Just the three of us. Because it was gentle, the way you said, "Open up." I opened my mouth, you put that little spoon of water into my mouth. That little bit of relief. And then I watched you do the same thing with my little sister. And I remember being like, "Wow, I love you, Mom. My moms is all right." Five minutes. Spoon. Five minutes. Spoon. But you couldn't stick to something simple like that. You couldn't sit still like that. You had to have your thing. That's where I stop remembering.

ODESSA: I left.

ELLIOT: A Department of Human Services report. That's my memory. Six hours later a neighbor kicks in the door. Me and my sister are lying in a pile of laundry. My shorts was all messed up. And what I really don't remember is my sister. Quote: "Female infant, approximately two years, pamper and tear ducts dry, likely cause of death, dehydration." Cuz when you dehydrate you can't form a single tear.

JOHN (To Elliot): I'm very sorry . . . (He puts some money on the table) For the coffee. (Exits)

ELLIOT: That's some friend you got there.

(Pause.)

YAZ: Mary Lou. We can at least say her name out loud. Mary Lou. Mary Lou. (To Odessa) One time you came to babysit me, you brought Elliot and Mary Lou—she was still in pampers—and Mary Lou had this soda from 7-Eleven. She didn't want to give me a sip. You yelled at her so bad, you totally cursed her out and I said, "You're not supposed to yell at people like that!" And you said, "No, Yaz, let her cry. She's gotta learn that ya'll are cousins, ya'll are flesh and blood, and we share everything. You hear me, Yaz? In this family we share everything." You walked out of the room, came back from the kitchen with four straws in your hand, sat us down on the floor in a circle, pointed to me and said, "You first." I sipped. "Elliot's turn." He sipped. "Mary Lou's turn." She sipped. Then you sipped. You made us do like that, taking turns, going around the circle, till the cup was empty.

(Odessa hands Elliot a key.)

ODESSA: The pawn shop closes at five. Go into my house. Take my computer. Pawn it. However much you get, put towards a few flowers, okay?

(Odessa exits.)

Scene Eight

Split scene: Odessa's living room and the chat room.

Chutes&Ladders holds a phone.

ORANGUTAN: Did you hit the call button yet?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'm working on it.

ORANGUTAN: Where are you? Are you at home?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Jeopardy!'s on mute.

ORANGUTAN: Dude, turn off the tube. This is serious. Did you even dial?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yeah, yeah. (He does) All right, it's ringing. What am I going to say?

ORANGUTAN: "Hi, Son, it's Dad."

CHUTES&LADDERS: Wendell. That's his name. (Hangs up) No answer.

ORANGUTAN: As in, you hung up?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yes. I hung up.

ORANGUTAN: Dude, way too quick!

CHUTES&LADDERS: What do you have, a stopwatch? Do you know the average time before someone answers a telephone?

ORANGUTAN: 3.2 rings.

CHUTES&LADDERS: According to . . .

ORANGUTAN: I don't reveal my sources.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Look, my son's a grown man with a good life.

ORANGUTAN: Quit moping and dial Wendell's number.

CHUTES&LADDERS: This Japan thing is cramping my style. Different networks, different time zones. No concurrent Jeopardy! watching.

ORANGUTAN: Deflection: nostalgia.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Humor me.

ORANGUTAN (Humoring him): How's my little Trebeky⁶ doing?

CHUTES&LADDERS: He's had work done. Man looks younger than he did twenty years ago.

ORANGUTAN: Needle or knife?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Needle. His eyes are still in the right place.

ORANGUTAN: Well, it's working. Meow. Purrrrr. Any good categories?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Before and After.

ORANGUTAN: I love Before and After! But I'll go with . . . Quit Stalling for two hundred. (She hums the Jeopardy! theme)

CHUTES&LADDERS: It's ringing.

ORANGUTAN: My stopwatch is running.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Still ringing.

ORANGUTAN: You're going to be great.

CHUTES&LADDERS: It rang again.

ORANGUTAN: You're a brave soul.

(We hear a man's voice at the other end of the line say, "Hello?" Chutes&Ladders hangs up.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: He must not be around.

ORANGUTAN: Leave a voice mail.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Maybe next time.

(Chutes&Ladders logs off.)

ORANGUTAN: Hey! Don't log off, come on. Chutes&Ladders. Whatever happened to tough love? Log back on, we'll do a crossword. You can't fly before "Final Jeopardy!" Sigh. Anyone else online? Haikumom? I'm still waiting for that daily poem . . . Bueller? Bueller?

(In Odessa's living room, Elliot and Yaz enter.)

YAZ: Wow, look at that computer. Stone age.

ELLIOT: Fred Flinstone shit.

YAZ: Positively Dr. Who.⁷

ELLIOT: Dr. Who?

YAZ: That computer is actually worse than what they give the adjuncts⁸ at Swarthmore.

ELLIOT: What does "adjunct" even mean?

YAZ: Exactly. It's the nicest thing she owns.

ELLIOT: Let's not act like this is some heroic sacrifice. Like this makes her the world's martyr.

YAZ: We're not going to get more than fifteen bucks for it.

ELLIOT: Symbols matter, Yaz. This isn't about the money. This is shaking hands. This is tipping your hat. This is holding the door open. This is the bare minimum, the least effort possible to earn the label “person.” (Looks at the screen) What do you think her password is? (Types) “Odessa.” Nope. “Odessa-aortiz.” Nope.

YAZ: It’s probably Elliot.

(He types. Haikumom’s log-on appears.)

ELLIOT: The irony.

YAZ: I think legally that might be like breaking and entering.

ELLIOT (Typing): Hello? Oh shit it posted.

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom! Hit me with those seventeen syllables, baby!

YAZ: Haikumom? What the hell is that?

ELLIOT: Her username. She has the whole world thinking she’s some Chinese prophet.

YAZ: Haiku are Japanese.

ELLIOT: “Haiku are Japanese.” (Typing) Hello, Orangutan. How are you?

ORANGUTAN (Formal): I am fine. How are you?

ELLIOT (Typing): So, I guess you like monkeys, huh?

ORANGUTAN: An orangutan is a primate.

YAZ: Elliot.

ELLIOT: Chill.

ORANGUTAN: And this primate has ninety-eight days. That deserves a poem, don’t you think?

ELLIOT (Typing): I don’t have a poem, but I have a question. What does crack feel like?

ORANGUTAN: What?

YAZ: Elliot, cut it out.

ELLIOT (Typing): Sometimes I’m amazed I don’t know firsthand.

ORANGUTAN: Who is this?

ELLIOT (Typing): How does it make your brain feel?

ORANGUTAN: Like it’s flooded with dopamine.⁹ Listen, cyber-stalker, if you came here for shits and giggles, we are a sadly unfunny bunch.

ELLIOT (Typing): Are you just a smoker or do you inject it right into your eyeballs?

ORANGUTAN: Who the fuck is this?

ELLIOT (Typing): Haikumom.

ORANGUTAN: Bullshit, you didn’t censor me. Quit screwing around, hacker, who are you?

YAZ: You think Ginny would want you acting this way?

ELLIOT: I think Mami Ginny would want Mami Odessa to pay for a single flower on her fucking casket.

YAZ (Types): This is not Haikumom. It’s her son.

ORANGUTAN: Well, if you’re looking for the friends and family thread, you have to go to the home page and create a new log-on. This particular forum is for people actually in recovery. Wait, her son the actor? From the Crest ad?

ELLIOT (Typing): Colgate.

9. A primary neurotransmitter (a chemical used to send signals between nerve cells), affecting motor function, emotions, learning, and behavior, associated especially with pleasure.

ORANGUTAN: "Sonrisa baby!" I saw that on YouTube! Your teeth are insanely white. Ever worked in Hollywood?

ELLIOT (Typing): Psh. I just had this guy begging me to do a feature film. Gritty, documentary-style, about Marines in Iraq. I just don't want to do anything cheesy.

ORANGUTAN: So you're the war hero . . .

ELLIOT (Typing): Haikumom brags.

ORANGUTAN: How's your recovery going? (No answer) This is the crack forum, but there's a really good pain-meds forum on this site, too. Link here.

YAZ: What is she talking about?

ORANGUTAN: There's a few war vets on that forum, just like you. You'd be in good company.

YAZ: Pain meds? Elliot? (He doesn't respond. Yaz types) What are you talking about?

ORANGUTAN: Haikumom told us about your history.

YAZ (Typing): What history?

ORANGUTAN: Sorry. Maybe she told us in confidence.

ELLIOT: Confidence? They call this shit "world wide" for a reason.

YAZ (Typing): I can search all the threads right now.

ORANGUTAN: That you had a bunch of leg surgeries in Iraq. That if a soldier said they hurt, the docs practically threw pills at them. That you OD'd three times and were in the hospital for it. She was real messed up about it. I guess she had hoped the fruit would fall a little farther from the tree.

YAZ (To Elliot): Is this true?

ELLIOT: I wasn't a soldier. I was a Marine. Soldiers is the army.

YAZ: Oh my god.

ELLIOT (Takes the keyboard, types): What I am: sober. What I am not and never will be: a pathetic junkie like you.

(He unplugs the computer. He throws the keyboard on the ground. He starts unplugging cables violently.)

YAZ: Hold on. Just stop it, Elliot! Stop it!

ELLIOT: The one time I ever reached out to her for anything and she made me a story on a website.

YAZ: Why wouldn't you ask me for help? Why would you deal with that alone?

ELLIOT: The opposite of alone. I seen barracks that looked like dope houses. It was four months in my life, it's over. We've chopped up a lot of shit together, Yaz, but we ain't gonna chop this up. This shit stays in the vault. You got me?

YAZ: No!

ELLIOT: Yaz. (He looks her straight in the eye) Please. Please.

YAZ: I want to grab the sky and smash it into pieces. Are you clean?

ELLIOT: The only thing I got left from those days is the nightmares. That's when he came, and some days I swear he ain't never gonna leave.

YAZ: Who?

(Elliot tries to walk away from the conversation, but the Ghost is there, blocking his path.)

Who?!

ELLIOT (Almost like a child): Please, Yaz. Please end this conversation. Don't make me beg, Yaz.

YAZ: The pawn shop closes in fifteen minutes. I'll get the monitor, you grab the computer.

Scene Nine

Chutes&Ladders is at work, on his desk phone. A bundled pile of mail is on his desk. He takes off the rubber band, browses. Junk, mostly.

CHUTES&LADDERS (Into the work phone): That's right. Three Ws. Dot. Not the word, the punctuation mark. I-R-S. Not "F" like flamingo; "S" like Sam. Dot. Yup, another one. Gov. Grover orange victor.

(Orangutan appears, online.)

ORANGUTAN: I'm doing it. I'm almost there. And I can chat! Japan is so advanced. Internet cafes are like parking meters here.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Where are you and what are you doing?

ORANGUTAN: Sapporo train station. Just did some research. Get this: in the early eighties, they straightened all the rivers in Hokkaido.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why?

ORANGUTAN: To create jobs the government straightened the rivers! Huge bodies of water, manual laborers, scientists, engineers, bulldozers, and the rivers became straight! How nuts is that?

CHUTES&LADDERS: People can't leave good enough alone. Why are humans so damn restless?

ORANGUTAN: It's not restlessness. It's ego. Massive, bizarre ego.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Can't let a river be a river. (Into the phone) The forms link is on the left.

ORANGUTAN: Now it's the aughts, people keep being born, jobs still need creating, but there's no curves left to straighten, so, drum roll, the government is beginning a new program to put all the original turns back in the rivers!

CHUTES&LADDERS: Well good luck to them, but no amount of engineering can put a wrinkle back in Nicole Kidman's¹ forehead.

ORANGUTAN: Ever heard of Kushiro?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Is that your new boyfriend's name?

ORANGUTAN: Ha. Ha ha ha. It's home of the hundred-mile-long Kushiro River, which is the pilot project, the first river they're trying to recurve.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Kushiro River. Got it. Burned in the brain. One day I'll win a Trivial Pursuit's² wedge with that. (Into the phone) You, too, ma'am. (He hangs up)

ORANGUTAN: My train to Kushiro leaves in twenty minutes. My heart is pounding.

1. Australian actress (b. 1967) whose adventures in plastic surgery have been the stuff of tabloid rumor since at least 2008.

2. Board game in which players win wedge-shaped game pieces by correctly answering trivia questions.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I don't follow.

ORANGUTAN: Kushiro is the town where I was born. I'm going. I'm doing it.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hold on, now you're throwing curveballs.

ORANGUTAN: In my hand is a sheet of paper. On the paper is the address of the house where my birth parents once lived. I'm going to knock on their door.

(Chutes&Ladder's desk phone rings.)

CHUTES&LADDERS (Into the phone): Help desk, please hold. (To Orangutan) How long have you had that address for?

ORANGUTAN: It's been burning a hole in my pocket for two days. I hounded my mom before I left Maine. She finally wrote down the name of the adoption agency. The first clue, the first evidence of who I was I ever had. I made a vow to myself, if I could stay sober for three months, I would track my parents down. So a few days ago class ended early, I went to the agency, showed my passport, and thirty minutes later I had an address on a piece of paper. Ask me anything about Kushiro. All I've done the last two days is research it. I'm an expert. Population, 190,000. There's a tech school, there's an airport.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why are you telling me this? To get my blessing?

ORANGUTAN: I tell you about the things I do.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You don't want my opinion, you want my approval.

ORANGUTAN: Hand it over.

CHUTES&LADDERS: No.

ORANGUTAN: Don't get monosyllabic.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Take that piece of paper and use it as kindling for a warm winter fire.

ORANGUTAN: Jeez, what did they slip into your Wheaties this morning?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Do a ritual burning and never look back. You have three months. Do you know the worth in gold of three months? Don't give yourself a reason to go back to the shadows.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in recovery. I have no illusions about catharsis. I realize what will most likely happen is nothing. Maybe something tiny. A microscopic butterfly flapping her microscopic wings.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Live in the past, follow your ass.

ORANGUTAN: Don't you have the slightest ambition?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Yes, and I achieve it every day: Don't use and don't hurt anyone. Two things I used to do on a daily basis. I don't do them anymore. Done. Dream realized. No more dreaming.

(His phone rings again.)

(Into the phone) Continue holding, please.

ORANGUTAN: When was the last time you went out on a limb?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Three odd weeks ago.

ORANGUTAN: Did you try hazelnut instead of french roast? Did you listen to Soul Mornings instead of NPR?³

CHUTES&LADDERS: There's a new secretary down the hall, she's got a nice smile. I decided to go say hello. We had a little back and forth. I said, let's have lunch, she said maybe but meant no, I turned away, looked down and my tie was floating in my coffee cup.

ORANGUTAN: I waited three months to tell you this, every step of the way, the train ride, what the river looks like. What their front door looks like. (Pause) I'm quitting this site. I hate this site. I fucking hate this site.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You're already losing it and you haven't even gotten on the train.

ORANGUTAN: Three days ago I suggested you and I meet face to face and you blew a fucking gasket.

CHUTES&LADDERS: That's what this is about?

ORANGUTAN: Don't flatter yourself. This is about me wanting relationships. With humans, not ones and zeroes. So we were once junkies. It's superficial. It's not real friendship.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I beg to differ.

ORANGUTAN: Prove me wrong.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Search down that address and a hundred bucks says your heart comes back a shattered light bulb.

ORANGUTAN: You mean, gasp, I'll actually FEEL something?

CHUTES&LADDERS: What are you going to do if the address is wrong? What if the building's been bulldozed? What if some new tenant lives there? What if the woman who gave you birth then gave you away answers the door?

ORANGUTAN: I DON'T KNOW! A concept you clearly avoid at all costs. Learn how to live, that's all I'm goddamn trying to do!

(His phone rings. He picks up the receiver and hangs it up.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: I have three grandsons. You know how I know that? Because I rang my son's doorbell one day. Step 9,⁴ make amends. And his wife answered, and I don't blame her for hating me. But I saw three little boys in that living room and one of those boys said, "Daddy, who's that man at the door?" And my son said to my grandson, "I don't know. He must be lost." My son came outside, closed the door behind him, exchanged a few cordial words and then asked me to go.

ORANGUTAN: So I shouldn't even try.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I had five years sober until that day.

ORANGUTAN: You really believe in your heart of hearts I should not even try. (Pause) Coward.

(His phone rings. He unplugs the phone line.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: You think it's easy being your friend?

ORANGUTAN: Sissy. You walk the goddamn earth scared of your own shadow, getting smaller and smaller, until you disappear.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You tease me. You insult me. It's like breathing to you.

4. In the twelve-step addiction-recovery program first pioneered by Alcoholics Anonymous. In their original form, steps 8 and 9 read, "Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all" and "Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others."

ORANGUTAN: You fucking idiot. Why do little girls tease little boys on the playground at recess? Why the fuck were cooties invented? You fucking imbecile!

CHUTES&LADDERS: You disappeared for three months. I couldn't sleep for three months!

ORANGUTAN: I wanted to impress you. I wanted to log on and show you I could be better. And I was an idiot because you're just looking for cowards like you. I'm logging off. This is it. It's over.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan.

ORANGUTAN: Into the abyss I climb, looking for a flesh-and-blood hand to grasp onto.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Little monkey, stop it.

ORANGUTAN: I'm in the station. My train is in five minutes, you gave me all the motivational speech I need, I'm going to the platform, I'm getting on the train, I'm going to see the house where I was born.

CHUTES&LADDERS: "To Chutes&Ladders Wilkie." "From Haikumom Ortiz."

(He rips it open, pulls out a deflated orange water wing, puts it over his hand.)

Scene Ten

Split scene. Lights rise on a church. Elliot and Yaz stand at the lectern.

YAZ: It is time to honor a woman.⁵

ELLIOT: A woman who built her community with a hammer and nails.

YAZ: A woman who knew her nation's history. Its African roots. European roots. Indigenous roots. A woman who refused to be enslaved but lived to serve.

ELLIOT: A carpenter, a nurse, a comedian, a cook.

YAZ: Eugenia Ortiz.

ELLIOT: Mami Ginny.

(Lights rise on Odessa's house. She sits on her floor. She scoops a spoonful of water from a mug, pours it onto the floor in a slow ribbon.)

YAZ: She grew vegetables in her garden lot and left the gate open so anyone could walk in and pick dinner off the vine.

ELLIOT: She drank beer and told dirty jokes and even the never-crack-a-smile church ladies would be rolling laughing.

YAZ: She told me every time I visited, "Yaz, you're going to Juilliard."⁶

5. This eulogy is inspired by and owes much debt to Roger Zepernick's eulogy for Eugenia Burgos [Hudes's note]. Zepernick is an ordained Lutheran minister and onetime director of Centro Pedro Claver, a North Philadelphia social services organization. Eugenia "Ginny" Perez Burgos—Hudes's maternal aunt and a North Philadelphia neighborhood activist and city administrator—died of bone cancer in 2009 at age fifty-nine; obituaries credit her with raising two sons, Shawn Ortiz and Elliot Ruiz.

6. Elite performing arts conservatory (founded 1905) housed in New York City's Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

ELLIOT: Every morning when I left for school, “Elliot, nobody can make you invisible but you.”

LOUDSPEAKER (An announcement in Japanese): 3:00 express to Kushiro now boarding on track one. Please have tickets out and ready for inspection.

YAZ: Zero.

ELLIOT: Birth children.

YAZ: One.

ELLIOT: Adopted son.

(Odessa pours another spoonful of water on the floor. Again, it creates a slow ribbon.)

YAZ: Three.

ELLIOT: Years in the army nurse corps.

YAZ: Three.

ELLIOT: Arrests for civil disobedience. I was in Iraq and she was demonstrating for peace.

YAZ: Forty-seven.

ELLIOT: Wheelchair ramps she installed in homes with disabled children or elderly.

(Odessa pours another spoonful of water on the floor. A small pool is forming.)

YAZ: Twelve.

ELLIOT: Abandoned lots she turned into city-recognized public gardens.

(Another spoonful.)

YAZ: Twenty-two.

ELLIOT: Godchildren recognized by this church.

(Another spoonful.)

YAZ: One hundred and thirty.

ELLIOT: Abandoned homes she refurbished and sold to young families.

LOUDSPEAKER (Another announcement in Japanese): Final boarding call, 3:00 express to Kushiro, track one.

(Orangutan is still on the platform. She seems frozen, like she cannot move.)

YAZ: All while having a fresh pot of rice and beans on the stove every night. For any hungry stranger. And the pilgrims stopped. And they planted roots, because she was here. We are the living, breathing proof.

ELLIOT: I am the . . . Excuse me.

(He exits.)

YAZ: Elliot is the standing, walking testimony to a life. She. Was. Here.

(Odessa turns the cup upside down. It is empty.)

Scene Eleven

Chutes&Ladders at his desk. In front of him: an inflated orange water wing.

CHUTES&LADDERS (On the phone): Yeah, it's a 1995 Tercel. Midnight blue. It's got a few miles. A hundred and twenty thousand. But like I said, I'll give it to you for three hundred below Kelley Blue Book. Yup, automatic. Just got new brake pads. Cassette deck, mint condition. I'll even throw in a few tapes. Tina Turner and Lionel Richie.⁷ Oh, hold on, call-waiting.

(He presses mute. Sings to himself:)

A tisket, a tasket.
A green and yellow basket.
I bought a basket for my mommy.
On the way I dropped it.
Was it red? No no no no!
Was it brown? No no no no!⁸

(Back into the phone) Sorry about that. I got someone else interested. No, it's all right, I have them on hold. You need to see this thing tonight if you're serious. I put this listing up thirty minutes ago, my phone is ringing off the hook. 6:30? Hey I didn't mention. Little lady has racing stripes.

Scene Twelve

Split scene. Lights rise on the Sapporo train station, same as before. Orangutan has laid down on the platform and fallen asleep, her backpack like a pillow.

Lights rise on Odessa's house, that night. Her phone rings. We hear loud knocking.

ELLIOT (Offstage): Mami Odessa! Open the door!

(More ringing.)

(Offstage) Yo, Mom!

YAZ (Offstage): She's not there.

ELLIOT (Offstage): Can't you hear her phone ringing? Move out the way.

YAZ (Offstage): Be careful, your leg!

(A few kicks and the door bursts open. Yaz and Elliot enter, switch on the lights. Odessa is in a heap, motionless, on the floor. Yaz runs and holds Odessa in her arms.)

Oh shit. Odessa! Odessa! Wake up.

(Yaz slaps Odessa's face a few times.)

Her pulse is racing.

7. American pop singer-songwriter (b. 1949) popular in the 1980s. Tina Turner: singer-actress (b. 1939) widely known as "the Queen of Rock 'n' Roll"; first rocketing to fame in the 1960s (alongside husband Ike), she enjoyed a new wave of international success thanks to her comeback album, Private Dancer (1984).

8. Slightly mangled version of "A-Tisket, A-Tasket," a song first recorded in 1938 by jazz legend Ella Fitzgerald (1917–96), based on a traditional nursery rhyme.

*(Yaz opens her cell phone, dials.
Elliot finds a spoon on the floor.)*

ELLIOT: Oh no. Oh no you fucking didn't! MOM!!! Get up!

YAZ (Into the phone): Hi, I need an ambulance. I have someone unconscious here.

I think it's an overdose, crack cocaine. Yes, she has a pulse. 33 Ontario Street.

No, no seizures, she's just a lump. Well what should we do while we wait?

Okay. Yes. (She hangs up) They're on their way. Elevate her feet.

ELLIOT: Help me get her to the sofa. One, two, three.

(Elliot lifts her with Yaz's help. They struggle under her weight. In fact they lift the air. Odessa stands up, lucid, and watches the action: Elliot and Yaz struggling under her invisible weight.)

YAZ: Watch her head.

ELLIOT: Aw, fuck, my leg.

YAZ: Careful.

(They set "Odessa" on the sofa, while Odessa watches, unseen, calm.)

ODESSA: I must be in the terminal. Between flights. The layover.

YAZ: Oh god, not two in one day, please.

ELLIOT: She's been through this shit a million times. She's a survivor! WAKE

UP! Call your mom. She'll get here before the ambulance.

(Yaz dials.)

ODESSA: I've been to the airport, one time. My dad flew here from Puerto Rico. First time I met him. We stood by the baggage claim, his flight was late, we waited forever. There was one single, lone suitcase, spinning around a carousel.

YAZ (To Elliot): Voice mail. (Into the phone) Mom? Call me back immediately, it's an emergency.

ELLIOT: Give me that. (Grabs the phone) Titi, Odessa fucking OD'd and she's dying on her living room floor and I can't take this anymore! COME GET US before I walk off and leave her on the sofa! (He hangs up)

YAZ: If you need to, go. No guilt. I got this.

ELLIOT: She's my mom. Can I be angry? Can you let me be angry?

YAZ: Why is this family plagued? (Elliot moves to go) Where are you going?

ELLIOT: To find something fragile.

(He exits. We hear something shatter.)

ODESSA: Everyone had cleared away from the carousel. Everyone had their bags. But this one was unclaimed. It could still be there for all I know. Spiraling. Spinning. Looking for an owner. Abandoned.

(In the Sapporo station, a Policeman enters with a bright, beaming flashlight and points it at Orangutan.)

In Odessa's house, a radiant white light suddenly pours in from above. Odessa looks up, is overwhelmed. It is beautiful. Yaz sees it.)

YAZ: Dear god, do you see that?

(Elliot enters. Watching Yaz, he looks up.)

ELLIOT (Not seeing it): What?

YAZ (To Odessa): It's okay, Odessa, go, go, we love you, I love you Titi,⁹ you are good, you are good. Oh my god, she's beautiful.

ELLIOT: What are you talking about?

YAZ: It's okay, it's okay. We love you Odessa.

POLICEMAN (In Japanese): Miss, miss, are you okay?

ORANGUTAN (Waking): English, please.

POLICEMAN: No sleeping on the floor.

ORANGUTAN (Getting up slowly): Sorry.

POLICEMAN: Are you sick?

ORANGUTAN: No.

POLICEMAN: Are you intoxicated?

ORANGUTAN: No. I'm very sorry. I just got tired. I'll go. I'm going.

POLICEMAN: Please, can I give you a hand?

ORANGUTAN: No. I got it.

(Orangutan exits. The Policeman turns off his flashlight, exits.

The sound of an ambulance siren. Suddenly the white light disappears. Odessa crawls onto the couch and slips into Yaz's arms, where she's been all along.)

YAZ: Holy shit . . .

ELLIOT: What's happening, Yaz? What the fuck was that?

YAZ: You've got to forgive her, Elliot. You have to.

Scene Thirteen

The chat room.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Oh nagging wives? Orangutan? Hello? Earth to Orangutan. Come on, three days straight I been worrying about you. I have time-sensitive information. Ground control to Major Orangutan.¹

ORANGUTAN: Ta-da.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Where you been?

ORANGUTAN: Here. There. Morrissey and Nine Inch Nails² on loop.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Is that what the kids like these days?

ORANGUTAN (Rolls eyes): That was me rolling my eyes.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess what I did.

ORANGUTAN (Shrugs): That was me shrugging.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess.

ORANGUTAN: Guess what I didn't do?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Meet your birth parents?

ORANGUTAN: Board the train.

9. Auntie (Spanish).

1. David Bowie's 1969 song "Space Oddity" includes the lines "Ground Control to Major Tom: your circuit's dead, there's something wrong."

2. American industrial rock band (founded 1988). Morrissey: English singer-songwriter (b. 1959), vocalist of the influential rock band The Smiths (1982–87).

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sorry.

ORANGUTAN: Don't apologize. You had my number.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Guess what I did.

ORANGUTAN: Told me so. Had my shit pegged.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I sold my Tercel. My plane lands in Narita Airport a week from this Wednesday.

ORANGUTAN: What?

CHUTES&LADDERS: American Airlines Flight 3312. Arriving 10:01 A.M.

ORANGUTAN: You're a dumbass. Tokyo? Do you have any idea how far that is from Hokkaido? And how much a ticket on the train costs? Oy, and how the hell am I going to get out of teaching that day? Oh, you dollface, you ducky!

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'll be wearing a jean jacket and a Padres cap. That's how you'll know me.

ORANGUTAN: Oh Chutes&Ladders. You old bag of bones, you! You old so-and-so, you mensch,³ you human being! Why the hell didn't you tell me?

CHUTES&LADDERS: I'm just hoping I have the guts to get on the plane.

ORANGUTAN: Of course you're getting on that damn plane! For me you did this?

(Fountainhead logs on.)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hey everyone. I managed to find one computer here at the hospital that works. Odessa asked me to post a message on her behalf. She landed on: "Go." Hit reset on the timer. Back to day one.

ORANGUTAN: Who's Odessa?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Sorry. Haikumom.

ORANGUTAN: What? Do you log on here just to mock us?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Hold on, is she okay?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Cardiac arrest. They said she was one hair from a coma. She hadn't used in six years and her system went nuts.

CHUTES&LADDERS: So she's alive?

FOUNTAINHEAD: And just barely ticking. Tubes in and out of her nose. She's responsive, she mumbled a few words.

ORANGUTAN: You can't be serious.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Why are you there? Were you using with her?

FOUNTAINHEAD: No.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Did you sell her the stuff?

FOUNTAINHEAD: No, Jesus, of course not. She gave them my number, I'm her emergency contact. Why, I have no idea, we're practically strangers. Getting here to the hospital, seeing her like that . . . I don't mean this as an insult, but she looked not human. Bones with skin covering. Mummy-like.

ORANGUTAN: Fuck. You.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'm being descriptive. I'm being honest. The thought of my boys walking in on me like that. My wife finding me . . .

ORANGUTAN: That woman is the reason I'm. Oh god, you get complacent for one second! One second! You get comfortable for one minute! Fountainhead, go to the stats page. You'll see. There's thousands of members on this site. People

3. Person of great integrity; a really good, stand-up guy (Yiddish).

she has saved, people she may yet save some day. I am one of them. You are one of them.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead, does she have family there? Has anyone come through her room?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Apparently a son and a niece but they had to catch a flight to San Juan.⁴

CHUTES&LADDERS: No parents? No other children? A friend? A neighbor?

FOUNTAINHEAD: None showed up.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Fountainhead. You have a family, I absolutely understand that, and I mean zero disrespect when I say, when I beg of you this: your job on this earth has just changed. It is not to stay clean. It's not to be a husband or a father or a CEO. It's to stay by that woman's side. Make sure she gets home safe. Bathe her. Feed her. Get her checked into a rehab, inpatient. Do not leave her side for a second. Can you do this?

FOUNTAINHEAD: I have one day clean. I'm not meant to be a saint.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Tell me now, swear on your mother's name, otherwise I'm on the first flight to Philadelphia.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I don't know.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Look man, do you believe in God?

FOUNTAINHEAD: Sure, along with unicorns and the boogeyman.

CHUTES&LADDERS: How about miracles?

FOUNTAINHEAD: When the Phils are winning.

CHUTES&LADDERS: How about actions? I bet you believe in those.

FOUNTAINHEAD: Yeah.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Your lifeboat has just arrived. Get on board or get out of the way.

FOUNTAINHEAD: I'll take care of Odessa. You have my word. My solemn word.

(Pause) She did manage to say one thing: Someone has to take over site admin. She doesn't want the chat room full of curse words.

(Yaz appears. A screen lights up:)

FREEDOM&NOISE
STATUS: ONLINE

FREEDOM&NOISE: I'm good with computers. I'll throw my hat in the ring.

CHUTES&LADDERS: Freedom&Noise, are you new here?

FREEDOM&NOISE: Yes. Very.

(Fountainhead's phone rings.)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Freedom&Noise, email me offline. Link attached. I gotta go.

CHUTES&LADDERS: You gave us your word. Don't be a stranger.

(Fountainhead logs off. Into the phone:)

FOUNTAINHEAD: Hi, honey, sorry I haven't called sooner. Something came up.

Listen, I'm not coming home tonight, just order in. I have a friend who got Puerto Rico. A hotel room. Yaz is online.

FREEDOM&NOISE: Hello, I am Freedom&Noise, your interim site manager, currently logging on from the Rainforest B&B in Puerto Rico. I am not a user, I've smoked pot twice, both times when I was thirteen, and am therefore unqualified for this position. There was a young woman I once knew. Let's call her “O.” My crazy aunt, a fun babysitter, the baddest hide-and-seek player north of Girard Avenue. We played dress-up, built boob traps and forts, and when I was eight, she disappeared. No explanation, no acknowledgment she had ever existed, the grown-ups in the family had taken a vow of silence, and O. had been erased. My freshman year at college, I returned home for Thanksgiving, and thanks to a snow delay I walked into the middle of turkey dinner itself, and there was O., a plate full of food, chowing down. I hadn't seen her in ten years. After dinner she told me to congratulate her, it was her anniversary. I said, “Did you get married?” She pulled a necklace out from under her shirt and said, “You know what these gold letters mean? The ‘N’ is for narcotics, the ‘A’ is for anonymous and today is my two-year anniversary of being clean.” (Pause) A few days ago I met a new woman: Haikumom. A woman who created a living, breathing ecosystem, and since I've never sown a single seed, let alone planted a garden, the least I can do is censor you, fix glitches—and one other thing . . . Formulating first line. Did Haikumom really do these on the fly? Five-seven-five, right? (Counting the syllables on her fingers) Box full of ashes . . .

(Elliot enters from the bathroom, freshly showered, pulling on a shirt)

ELLIOT: Whatchu looking at, Willis?⁵

YAZ: Sh. I'm counting syllables.

(Elliot looks over Yaz's shoulder at the computer.)

ELLIOT: Hold up. Don't read that shit, Yaz.

YAZ: You know how Odessa got into haiku in the first place?

ELLIOT: For real, close the computer.

YAZ: I went through this Japanese minimalist phase freshman year. Rock Gardens, Zen Buddhism, the works. I gave her a haiku collection for Christmas.

ELLIOT: Yeah, and you gave me a midget tree that died by New Year's.

YAZ: Bonsai. You didn't water it.

5. Play on “Whatchu talkin' about, Willis?,” catchphrase of a character (played by diminutive actor Gary Coleman [1968–2010]) on the popular 1980s sitcom Diff'rent Strokes.

ELLIOT (Closing Yaz's laptop): For the two days I'm away from Philly, let me be away from Philly?

YAZ: You know where I was gonna be by thirty? Two kids. Equal-housework marriage. Tenure, no question. Waaaay tenured, like by the age of twenty-four. Carnegie Hall debuts: Yazmin Ortiz's "Oratorio for Electric Guitar and Children's Choir." I wrote a list on a piece of paper and dug a hole in Fairmount Park and put it in the ground and said, "When I turn thirty, I'll dig it up and cross it all off." And I promise you I'll never have the courage to go to that spot with a shovel and face my list full of crumbs, decoys and bandaids.

ELLIOT: Married with kids, what an awful goal.

YAZ: Odessa's done things.

ELLIOT: Well, when you throw her a parade, don't expect me to come.

YAZ: You've done things.

ELLIOT: I wouldn't come to my own parade, either.

YAZ: Ginny did things. What have I done?

ELLIOT: Second-grade Language Arts. You glued my book report.

YAZ: I couldn't stop your leg from getting chewed up.

ELLIOT: Fairmount little league basketball. You kept score, you brought our equipment.

YAZ: I didn't hold your hand when you were in the desert popping pills trying to make yourself disappear. I didn't keep Odessa away from that needle. I didn't water a single plant in Ginny's garden. We're in PR and I'm gonna dig a new hole and I'm not putting a wish or a list in there, I'm putting a scream in there. And I'm gonna sow it like the ugliest foulest and most necessary seed in the world and it's going to bloom! This time it's going to fucking bloom!

ELLIOT: My eyes just did this weird thing. For a second, it was Mom standing in front of me.

YAZ: Odessa?

ELLIOT: Ginny.

YAZ: Elliot, your birth mother saved your life by giving you away. Tell me I'm wrong.

(Elliot doesn't respond. Yaz begins gathering her stuff hastily.)

Now we got some ashes to throw. El Yunque closes in an hour and a half.

ELLIOT: Maybe we should do this tomorrow.

YAZ: I gotta make a call. I'll be in the lobby!

(She exits.)

ELLIOT: Yaz?

(The Ghost appears. He's probably been there the whole time.)

Yaz!

GHOST: Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost reaches out his hand to touch Elliot.)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The second they make contact, Elliot spins on his heels and grabs the Ghost. The Ghost defends himself, pulling away. They start pushing, grabbing, fighting. The Ghost is looking for something—is it Elliot's wallet?)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost finds Elliot's wallet and tears through it, hurling its contents onto the floor. Elliot attacks again, but this time the Ghost reaches out his hand and touches Elliot's face. Elliot freezes, unable to move, as the Ghost's hands glide across his features, considering each one with authority, taking inventory.)

Momken men-fadluck ted-dini gawaz saffari?

(The Ghost is gone. Elliot catches his breath, shaken. He reaches into his pocket and pulls out a bottle of pills. He puts one pill in his hand. Then he empties the entire bottle of pills into his hand. He stares at the pills, wanting to throw them away.)

Scene Fifteen

Split scene. Odessa's bathroom. The bathtub is filled with water. John enters, carrying a very weak Odessa. Odessa is wearing shorts and a bra, a modest outfit for bathing. John lowers her gently into the bathtub.

JOHN: Does that feel okay?

(Odessa barely nods.)

It's not too hot or cold?

(Odessa shakes her head.)

I don't know how to do this. These are things women do. Take care of sick people. Make the wounds go away.

(He takes a sponge and starts to bathe her.)

Is this okay?

(He lifts her arms and washes her armpits. Embarrassed at first, but quickly gets the swing of it.)

We check you in at 4:30 so we have plenty of time to clean you up and get you in good clothes, okay? You'll go in there looking like a decent woman.

(Odessa whispers something inaudible.)

What was that?

(She gestures for him to lean in. She whispers into his ear.)

One more time.

(She whispers a little louder.)

Did someone take swimming lessons?

(She whispers again.)

Did someone put on water wings?

(She nods. He continues to bathe her, gently, in silence as:

Lights rise on Tokyo. Narita Airport. Orangutan sits on the floor by the luggage carousel. At her feet is a sign that says Chutes&Ladders. She throws the sign like a frisbee across the floor and gets up to leave. Chutes&Ladders enters, rolling a suitcase behind him. He waves to Orangutan.)

CHUTES&LADDERS: Orangutan?

ORANGUTAN: What the holy hell?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Sorry. Sorry. I tried calling but my cell doesn't work here. I told you I'm no good at this fancy kind of living.

ORANGUTAN: You were supposed to land yesterday, you were too scared to get on the plane. You rebook, you were supposed to land today, forty-five minutes ago. Everyone got their luggage already. The last person pulled the last suitcase from the carousel half an hour ago. I thought, Wow, this one sure knows how to play a joke on the ladies. I thought you had left me at the fucking altar.

CHUTES&LADDERS: I got sick on the flight. Totally embarrassing. I had a panic attack as the plane landed and I started tossing into the doggy bag right next to this nice old lady. I've been sitting on the bathroom floor emptying my stomach. Then I had to find a toothbrush and toothpaste and mouthwash because I didn't want to greet you with bad breath and all.

(She looks skeptical. She sniffs his mouth quickly.)

ORANGUTAN: Minty. (Pause) Oh, you dummy, you big old dummy. COME HERE, you San Diego Padre.

(They hug. A warm and brief greeting.)

What's your name?

CHUTES&LADDERS: Clay. Clayton "Buddy" Wilkie.

ORANGUTAN: I'm Madeleine Mays.

CHUTES&LADDERS: It's weird, huh?

ORANGUTAN: Totally weird. The land of the living.

(They hug. They melt into each other's arms. A hug of basic survival and necessary friendship. Then, they exit, rolling Chutes&Ladders's suitcase off as lights rise in:

Puerto Rico. A rock outcropping looking out over a waterfall. Elliot is there, looking down at the water.)

ELLIOT (Looking down): Oh shit! Yaz, you gotta see this! Yaz? Fucking Johnny Appleseed of El Yunque.

(Yaz enters holding a soil-covered flower bulb. She compares the root against a field book.)

YAZ: I found my spiral ginger! This is going right next to the aloe by the kitchen door, baby!

ELLIOT: Yo, this science experiment ain't getting past security.

YAZ: Experiment my ass. I'm planting these in Ginny's garden.

ELLIOT: Customs gonna sniff that shit from a mile away.

YAZ (Putting the bulb in a ziploc baggie full of dirt and bulbs): China rose . . . Sea grape . . . Some kind of fern . . .

ELLIOT: When they cuff those wrists, I don't know you.

YAZ: I'll hide them in my tampon box.

ELLIOT: That don't work. My first trip to PR, Mami Ginny smuggled a coqui⁶ back with her kotex and got arrested. Front page of the Daily News.

YAZ: Good shit. (A dirty little secret) You know what Grandma did?

ELLIOT: Do I want to?

YAZ: She used to smuggle stuff back, too. She'd tuck it below her boobs. She had storage space under there!

ELLIOT: Yeah after she was sixty and had nursed seven kids. Yo you think if I jumped off this rock right now and dove into that water, I'd survive?

YAZ: Just watch out for the huge boulders and the footbridge.

ELLIOT: It's tempting. That spray. (His phone beeps) Reception in the rainforest.

YAZ: Kind of ruins the romance.

ELLIOT (Reads a text message): Damn, that was fast.

YAZ: What?

ELLIOT: Pop sold the house. Did he even put out a listing?

YAZ: Not that I know of.

ELLIOT: That's like a VW bus going from zero to sixty in three seconds. Don't make no sense.

YAZ: Must have been an inside job.

ELLIOT: I guess so.

YAZ: A way way inside job . . .

ELLIOT: Yaz . . .

YAZ (Conspiratorially): Yeeeeees?

ELLIOT: What did you do?

YAZ (Very conspiratorially): Nothing . . .

ELLIOT: Holy shit!

YAZ: Put my Steinway⁷ on craigslist. Got four responses before you made it down to the lobby. My eighty-eight keys are worth more than Ginny's whole house. Sadly. I'll buy an upright.

ELLIOT: You are one crazy motherfucking adjunct! Yo, I don't know if el barrio is ready for you. I don't know if they can handle you!

YAZ: Oh, they gonna handle me.

ELLIOT: Wait wait wait. You need a title.

YAZ: Yaz will do just fine.

ELLIOT: Hells no. Command respect. I step on those corners, I'm Big El. (Pause) "Professor."

YAZ: "Professor."

ELLIOT: You like that, huh?

6. Singing tree frog native to Puerto Rico.

7. Piano made by the legendary German American firm Steinway & Sons (founded 1853).

YAZ: It'll be the Cousins House. We'll renovate the kitchen. You redo the plumbing, I'll hook up a little tile backsplash.

ELLIOT: I watched Bob Vila⁸ with Pop, but I ain't no handyman.

YAZ: Just wait, Mr. Home Depot. You're gonna be like, "Fuacata,⁹ fuacata, fuacata," with your power drill and nail gun and vise grips.

ELLIOT: Something like that.

YAZ: Well? Get to it. Toss 'em.

ELLIOT: Me? Why the hell do you think I let you come along?

(He hands Yaz the box.)

YAZ: Well then say something. Pray.

ELLIOT: I'm all out of prayers.

YAZ: Me, too. Make a toast.

ELLIOT: To LAX. I'm not flying back with you.

YAZ: What do you mean?

ELLIOT: I called from the hotel and changed my flight. One-way ticket. Watch out, Hollywood. (Pause) You know how you had to shake me awake last night?

YAZ (Demeanor shifting): You were literally sobbing in your sleep.

ELLIOT: This dream was different than usual. I'm fixing a Subway hoagie, I feel eyes on the back of my neck, I turn around and expect to see him, the first guy I shot down in Iraq. But instead it's Mami Ginny. Standing next to the bread oven, smiling. You know how her eyes smile?

YAZ: Best smile in the world.

ELLIOT: Looking at me, her son. Coming to say good-bye.

YAZ: That's beautiful.

ELLIOT: She puts on her glasses to see my face even better. She squints and something changes. The moment I come into focus, her eyes widen. Her jaw drops, she starts trembling. Then she starts to cry. Something she's seeing scares her. Then she starts to scream. Loud, like, "Ahhh! Ahhh!" She won't stop looking at me, but she's terrified, horrified by what she sees. And I don't know if my lip is bleeding or there's a gash on my forehead or she's looking through my eyes and seeing straight into my fucking soul.

YAZ: Jesus.

ELLIOT: I wanted Mami Odessa to relapse, Yaz. I wanted her to pick up that needle. I knew precisely what to do, what buttons to push, I engineered that shit, I might as well have pushed the thing into her vein. Because I thought, Why would God take the good one? Yo, take the bad mom instead! I was like, Why wouldn't you take the bad fucking mom? If I stay in Philly, I'm gonna turn into it. I'm gonna become one of them. I'm already halfway there. You've got armor, you've got ideas, but I don't.

YAZ: Go. Go and don't you ever, ever look back.

(She takes his hand.)

But if you do, there will be a plastic-covered sofa waiting for you.

8. Host (b. 1946) of a series of home-improvement shows, beginning with This Old House (1979–89).

9. Onomatopoeic interjection akin to "Wham!" or "Bam!" (Cuban Spanish).

(Below them, in Philadelphia, John is done bathing Odessa. He lifts her and holds her like an angel above the bathtub. She is dripping wet and seems almost radiant, and yet deeply, deeply sick.)

I'm the elder now. I stay home. I hold down the fort.

ELLIOT: I'm walking.

YAZ: On three?

YAZ AND ELLIOT: One.

Two.

Three.

(They toss the ashes. Blackout.)

QUESTIONS

1. WATER BY THE SPOONFUL features many entirely fictional characters, situations, and events, including the online community created by “Haikumom” and the death of Elliot’s infant sister. Yet as the biographical headnote and textual footnotes suggest, the play was also inspired in part by real people and events: Hudes’s cousin Elliot Ruiz was raised by their aunt Ginny, who died of cancer; he was wounded in Iraq; Odessa is based in part on a cousin who is a former drug addict; and so on. How, if at all, might this knowledge affect your response to the play and its characters?
2. How do the characters of Elliot and Yaz each develop over the course of the play? What role in that development is played by their experiences in both real and online worlds?
3. As readers or spectators of Hudes’s play, we first get to know Odessa via her online interactions, and throughout the play we see much more of these than does Elliott or Yaz. How does that affect how we view and feel about Odessa, Elliott, and their individual and mutual conflicts? Why might Hudes have chosen to structure the play in this way?
4. How would you articulate the main theme of the play? Might it have to do with notions of family? with the ways we help and hurt others? with the process of trauma and recovery? something else entirely?
5. How might Yaz’s discussion of musical dissonance provide a language for articulating the play’s themes or describing its structure?
6. Especially in terms of conflict or theme, what role is played by Fountainhead, Chutes&Ladders, and Orangutan? How, if at all, might it matter that Fountainhead is the play’s only white or upper-middle-class character? that Chutes&Ladders and Orangutan end up meeting in the real world?

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING

1. Though WATER BY THE SPOONFUL begins by alternating scenes set entirely in the real world with scenes set wholly in the virtual world, later scenes tend to be more complicated. Scene 10, for example, is a “split scene” that shifts among Ginny’s funeral, Odessa’s house, and a train station in Sapporo, Japan. Choose one of these “split scenes” and write an informal response paper about it. How do the various elements of the scene work together and perhaps comment on each other? How might the scene be staged so as to emphasize those connections without confusing the audience?
2. Write an essay exploring what WATER BY THE SPOONFUL seems to suggest about the power and limits of online selves and communities. What might the virtual world allow us to be and do that the real world doesn’t, and vice versa?

3. Write an essay exploring the water imagery in Hudes's play. By its end, what various meanings might the phrase "water by the spoonful" accrue?
4. WATER BY THE SPOONFUL features a cast of characters who at first seem very different from each other in terms of their personalities, their backgrounds, their situations in life, and their conflicts. Yet over the course of the play we and they arguably discover just how similar they are. Choose any two characters from the play, perhaps those that initially seem the most different or far removed from each other. Then write an essay comparing the characters and their development over the course of the play. What similarities emerge as the play progresses? To what extent and how do the characters themselves come to appreciate these similarities? What might the play ultimately say or show us through these characters?
5. Charles Isherwood, writing in The New York Times, describes WATER BY THE SPOONFUL's theme as involving "the myriad ways in which human lives can intersect, and the potentially great rewards—or irreparable damage—that can result from the unlikely spark of those connections." Others instead describe the play as exploring the difficulty and importance of forgiving both ourselves and others; the idea "that no one is above reproach—or beyond redemption"; "the true meaning of family" (theatreworks.org); or the "life-affirming message" that "[p]eople instinctively take care of each other" and that "hitting bottom is the start of the trip back up" (Richard Zoglin, in Time). Write an essay defending and developing one of these claims.

Exploring Contexts

27 | THE AUTHOR'S WORK AS CONTEXT: WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

When we read, we inevitably compare. We compare the writer's style to the styles of other writers; we compare characters within a story or play to one another and to people we know; we compare our life experiences to the many imaginary experiences that unfold before us as we read. Our interpretations of literature are fueled by comparison.

Reading several works by a single author is one of the most rewarding and enlightening types of comparison we can employ as active readers of literature. Such comparisons serve a variety of purposes: They help us develop a sense of the overall shape of the writer's work (that is, the writer's oeuvre, or canon); they reveal the kinds of characters, plots, and dramatic situations the author tends to create; they offer a glimpse into the author's particular way of looking at the world. At the same time, such comparisons can enrich our understanding of any one work by drawing our attention to features we might not have thought much about otherwise, including those unique to it.

THE LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE: A BIOGRAPHICAL MYSTERY

This chapter offers you the opportunity to compare two plays by one of history's most vital and versatile playwrights: William Shakespeare. Shakespeare is a particularly enticing subject for this kind of comparative study in part because we know so little about him. While we can enhance our reading of many writers' work by studying the letters, essays, diaries, and other documents in which they comment directly on their lives and writing, Shakespeare left behind none of these. The only records that exist are a handful of official ones—marriage licenses, property deeds, and wills.

These tell a brief story. Shakespeare's origins were humble: His grandfather, Richard, rented the land he farmed, near Stratford-upon-Avon, a market town in the English midlands. Richard's son, John, married the daughter of one of Richard's former landlords and moved to town. There he became a tradesman prosperous and respected enough to buy quite a bit of property and to hold several civic offices, including that of mayor.

Shakespeare's birthplace

The family's star was on the rise by the time William was born (sometime in April 1564). Though most likely neither of Shakespeare's parents could read or write (certainly they had no formal schooling), his father's involvement in city government brought with it the privilege of enrolling William in the local free grammar school. Here Shakespeare learned how to read and write, not only in English but also in Latin and perhaps Greek. His schoolmasters also probably required him to read such standard classical works as Ovid's Metamorphoses and the plays of Plautus and Terence (which greatly influenced the plays he would later write). In 1582, Shakespeare married Anne Hathaway, the daughter of a local farmer; in the next three years, the couple had three children, including a set of twins.

From the time of the twins' birth in 1585 until 1592, Shakespeare's life becomes—for us—a blank: All we know is that by the latter date he was a successful actor and playwright spending most of his time in London. (We know this, in part, because Shakespeare was prominent enough to be called an “upstart crow” in a book published by a rival playwright in 1592; apparently, this London-born, university-educated author felt a bit threatened by the undereducated provincial.) Though, in 1594, the “upstart crow” achieved a measure of renown as a poet by publishing two lengthy narrative poems (Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece), his career from this time until his death centered mainly on his work with the Lord Chamberlain's (later King's) Men—one of the two most prominent acting companies of his day. Shakespeare's work with the company was multifaceted: An actor with the troupe and its chief dramatist, he was also a shareholder who helped manage the troupe's affairs (including the building of the Globe Theatre, on the South Bank of the River Thames, in 1599). Being a shareholder ensured that he prospered along with the company (especially after they secured the patronage of the king in 1603). As a result, Shakespeare enjoyed a level of economic prosperity and a kind of status that wouldn't have been possible to a mere actor, playwright, or poet. The Crown granted Shakespeare's father (and thus the playwright) the title of “gentleman” in the late 1590s. And at his death in 1616, Shakespeare left his family substantial property in both London and Stratford (where the family had continued to live).

Such facts remind us that Shakespeare was, after all, a real and in some ways rather ordinary person—who ultimately convinced audiences and rivals alike that he was more than an “upstart crow,” but who did not, as a recent biographer reminds us, “in his own day inspire the mysterious veneration that afterwards came to surround him.” These mundane facts tell us almost nothing, however, about the man’s or the artist’s inner life—his personal opinions, his motives, his loves, his dislikes, his politics, his “philosophy.” These we can only infer by reading and comparing his poems and plays. Luckily, Shakespeare left us a lot of these, including 154 sonnets (some of which are included in this book) and at least thirty-eight plays. Scholars believe Shakespeare cowrote at least one more play, and others may yet be discovered and authenticated.

EXPLORING SHAKESPEARE’S WORK: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT’S DREAM AND HAMLET

Given that his plays include thirteen comedies, ten tragedies, ten English histories, and five romances, variety is a distinctive feature of Shakespeare’s work as a playwright. It is fitting, then, that the two plays included in this chapter—A MIDSUMMER NIGHT’S DREAM and HAMLET—seem, at first glance, so different. A Midsummer Night’s Dream, written in about 1595, is generally considered one of the last of Shakespeare’s “apprentice” plays—the work of a young writer just beginning to find his own voice and dramatic style, but still quite dependent on classical models. Though written only a few years later (c. 1599–1601), Hamlet is nonetheless regarded as one of the greatest works of a seasoned writer. Differences proliferate: Dream, a comedy, culminates in marriage (several marriages, in fact); Hamlet, a tragedy, concludes with the death and destruction of an entire royal family. Dream is among Shakespeare’s shortest plays; Hamlet, among his longest. Hamlet focuses squarely—almost relentlessly—on its title character, whom we leave the play feeling that we know inside and out. Dream, in contrast, flits among many characters. Though we may fall in love with some of them, we probably will not feel that we truly know any of them. (Indeed, part of the play's humor comes from our having as hard a time as the characters themselves do remembering who is who and who loves whom.)

But while the plays have important and revealing differences, they have equally significant similarities, and by attending to these similarities we may come to understand and appreciate Shakespeare's particular way of looking at the world. To begin with, we may approach such similarities (within these or any plays) by concentrating on the elements, looking for patterns in character, setting, structure, tone, and theme, remembering that these elements ultimately combine to shape our experience of any one play.

In thinking about character, for example, notice that both the protagonists and the antagonists of A Midsummer Night's Dream and Hamlet are persons of high birth and position. These characters' choices and behavior deeply affect the communities that they lead. In fact, both plays repeatedly remind us of the general effects and communal significance of such characters' actions. Like all Shakespeare's plays, this comedy and tragedy both take for granted the idea that "on [a leader's] choice depends / The safety and health of th[e] whole state" (Hamlet 1.3.20–21), and both trace the effects of the particular choices made by kings, princes, and dukes.

Shakespeare and his contemporaries often compared the relationship between a king and his subjects to that between a father and his children or between a husband and his wife. For example, an early Shakespeare comedy, The Taming of the Shrew, concludes with a speech in which the tamed shrew declares, "Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper, / Thy head, thy sovereign." Building on this idea, she argues both that a woman's duty to her husband is the same "as the subject owes the prince" and that a woman who refuses to obey her husband is exactly like "a foul contending rebel / And graceless traitor." We can see similar analogies at work in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Hamlet: One begins with a duke and a father provoking a group of young Athenians to rebel against them; the other shows us a son who is also a prince struggling to choose the right response to the murder of a father who was also a king.

We pay attention to the effects of these highborn characters on their environments in part because Shakespeare's plays also include characters who occupy positions much lower on the social ladder than the main characters do. In addition to Titania, Oberon, Theseus, and Hippolyta (rulers of the divine and human realms), A Midsummer Night's Dream introduces us to the Athenian craftsmen (or "mechanicals") led by the fittingly named Bottom. And while Hamlet focuses predominantly on members of the Danish royal court, one of the most memorable scenes in the play features a lowly gravedigger and the skeletal remains of a court jester named Yorick. As a result, the two plays demonstrate Shakespeare's tendency to people his plays with a socially diverse cast of characters and to thereby create a socially inclusive dramatic world.

As inclusive as Shakespeare's dramatic world is, it is far from democratic (as the speech from The Taming of the Shrew suggests). As you read more plays by Shakespeare, you will probably become more attuned to the different ways in which they depict "high" and "low" characters. A Midsummer Night's Dream is typical, for example, in the way it associates socially low characters with low or physical comedy (as opposed to high or verbal comedy). Bottom, after all, wears an ass's head for much of the play. Yet Bottom is also typical of Shakespeare's socially humble characters because he possesses a kind of wisdom his social betters lack.

Titania and Bottom, from A Midsummer Night's Dream

Despite the tendency to distinguish high from low, then, Shakespearean drama draws our attention to fundamental human experiences that cut across social lines. A Midsummer Night's Dream reminds us that a fairy queen is no more immune to love's magic or foolishness than the lowliest of mortals; Hamlet, that a king's life lasts no longer than a court jester's. The joys of love, the pain of death—these experiences link us and remind us of our common humanity.

Shakespeare suggests such links, in part, by structuring each play so that the main plot is complemented by parallel, yet often contrasting, subplots. A Midsummer Night's Dream offers at least four plots, each featuring a pair of lovers whose happiness is, or has been, threatened by their own failures to understand each other or by others' opposition to their relationship. Ham- let revolves around three intersecting, but distinct, plots featuring Hamlet, Laertes, and Fortinbras—three very different young men who must each figure out how to respond to, and perhaps avenge, his father's murder. In these, as in other, Shakespeare plays, the secondary plots can be divided into underplots, which are romantic or parodic versions of the main plot, and overplots, which foreground its political dimensions. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, Bottom becomes the protagonist of the underplot, Theseus and Hippolyta (and, perhaps, Titania and Oberon) of the overplot(s). In Hamlet, the underplot focuses on Laertes; the overplot, on Fortinbras. However, all the subplots encourage us—and sometimes, as in Hamlet, the characters themselves—to compare the ways different people handle similar situations and thus to evaluate various choices and various responses. The parallel plots serve simultaneously as a structural device, a potent means of characterization, and a way of drawing our attention to general issues and themes.

Reading Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream side by side may also help us appreciate the tonal complexity of Shakespeare's plays—their incorporation of both comic and tragic elements. While A Midsummer Night's Dream plunges us into a nighttime world dominated by the intertwining forces of magic, love, and humor, it also continually reminds us of the dangerous aspects of the night, of the struggles that human beings endure in their pursuit of love and happiness, of the brevity and fragility of human joy and life, even of what Hamlet calls the “thousand natural shocks / That flesh is heir to” (3.1.62–63). The specter of death hovers in the background of A Midsummer Night's Dream as surely as it occupies the foreground of Hamlet. And though Hamlet, like most tragedies, focuses primarily on mortality, violence, and time's destructive force, it also shows us the comic side of the human condition. In fact, one of the things that makes Hamlet such a sympathetic character is his sense of humor.

Turning from tone to theme, we find that both Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream say something about the order of things and the rhythm of life. Although Hamlet ends with a body-strewn stage, the play encourages us to see those deaths as the necessary prelude to a restoration of order and health to a kingdom diseased and disordered as a result of a sovereign's choices. Claudius's crimes ultimately infect and poison everything and everyone, even innocent bystanders like Ophelia. Both to us and to Hamlet, Claudius's reign represents the triumph of humanity's worst impulses. By embracing his role as heaven's "scourge and minister" even at the risk of his own life (3.4.179–81), however, Hamlet reaffirms our faith in humanity's noblest qualities as he strives to set right all that is "rotten in the state of Denmark" (1.4.90). In A Midsummer Night's Dream, we again see the actions of a sovereign turn the world upside down: The young rebel against the old, women chase men, old friends turn on each other, an ass consorts with a queen. Clearly, the kinds of dissension and disorder at work in A Midsummer Night's Dream make us laugh, while those in Hamlet make us cringe or cry. Yet the rhythm of both plays turns out to be surprisingly similar, tracing the movement from disorder to order, from dissension to harmony. In the process, both plays ask us to think about the nature and causes of social, political, and moral disorder, of dissension within states and families.

As you read Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, you will discover many more parallels of theme, character, setting, and structure whose significance you will want to ponder and investigate. But you may also want to think about another, perhaps more elusive element: language. Shakespeare is justly celebrated for his use of language, and we pay homage to it, unwittingly or not, every time we use any one of the many idiomatic expressions that originated in the plays. (If, for example, you conclude that Shakespeare is "Greek to me," you have proved otherwise by quoting directly from his play Julius Caesar.) In Shakespearean drama, language is never an end in itself but instead establishes character and tone, structures the play, shapes our emotional response to it, and enunciates theme. Hamlet, for example, characterizes both Polonius and Hamlet in part through their penchant for wordplay. But as Polonius suggests, Hamlet's wordplay is "pregnant" with significance in a way that his own is not (2.2.205). Here, subtle differences prove just as key to characterization as similarities.

In both Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, the musical and visual qualities of Shakespeare's language are integral to its meaning. Though written mainly in verse, Shakespeare's plays include prose passages; and though most of the poetry is blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter), Shakespeare also uses rhyme and rhythmic variation to great effect. As you read the plays, then, you will want to pay attention to the texture and rhythm of the language—to the effect of sound on sense. You will also want to attend to the way Shakespeare uses language to appeal to your eye, as well as your ear. Visual imagery, like sound, consistently serves both structural and thematic ends, linking various moments and ideas, actions and themes. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, for example, characters frequently refer to their eyes. Such references begin in the very first scene: When Hermia wishes that her father “looked but with my eyes,” Theseus responds that “your eyes must with his judgment look” (lines 56–57). These lines prepare us for a drama in which eyes will play a major part, in which love and vision tend to go hand in hand, in which both love and vision often conflict with “judgment.” The characters’ talk of eyes thus connects directly to the plot; through both, the play asks us to think about the tremendous power of vision and the dangers of relying too heavily on it.

Reading multiple plays by a single playwright will help you better recognize stylistic as well as structural and thematic patterns: Each additional play you read will bring you closer to an understanding and appreciation of its creator’s unique way of looking at the world and of the way his or her views and technique changed over time. You will gain a sense of the author’s development as a dramatist even as, ideally, you develop your own skills as a reader of drama.

ACT I

Scene 1

Theseus's palace in Athens. Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, [and PHILOSTRATE,] with others.

- THESEUS: Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour Draws on apace. Four happy days bring in Another moon; but, oh, methinks, how slow
 This old moon wanes! She lingers^o my desires delays fulfillment of
 Like to a stepdame^o or a dowager stepmother 5
 Long withering out a young man's revenue.²
- HIPPOLYTA: Four days will quickly steep^o themselves in night; plunge
 Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
 And then the moon—like to a silver bow
 Now bent in heaven—shall behold the night 10
 Of our solemnities.
- THESEUS: Go, Philostrate,
 Stir up the Athenian youth to merriments,
 Awake the pert and nimble spirit of mirth,
 Turn melancholy forth to funerals;
 The pale companion is not for our pomp. 15
- [Exit PHILOSTRATE.]*
- Hippolyta, I wooed thee with my sword
 And won thy love doing thee injuries;³
 But I will wed thee in another key,
 With pomp, with triumph,^o and with reveling. public festivity
- Enter EGEUS and his daughter HERMIA, and LYSANDER and DEMETRIUS.*
- EGEUS: Happy be Theseus, our renowned duke! 20
- THESEUS: Thanks, good Egeus. What's the news with thee?
- EGEUS: Full of vexation come I, with complaint Against my child, my daughter Hermia.
 —Stand forth, Demetrius.—My noble lord,
 This man hath my consent to marry her. 25
 —Stand forth, Lysander.—And, my gracious duke,
 This man hath bewitched the bosom of my child.
 —Thou, thou, Lysander, thou hast given her rhymes,
 And interchanged love tokens with my child.
 Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung 30
 With feigning⁴ voice verses of feigning love,
 And stolen the impression of her fantasy⁵

2. A widow using up the inheritance that will go to her husband's (young) heir on her death.

3. Theseus captured Hippolyta in his military conquest of the Amazons.

4. Pun: deceitful; desiring ("faining"); soft (in music).

5. By craftily impressing your image on her imagination, like a seal in wax, (you have) stolen her love.

- With bracelets of thy hair, rings, gauds,⁶ conceits,⁶ trinkets / clever gifts
 Knacks,⁶ trifles, nosegays,⁶ sweetmeats—messengers Knickknacks / bouquets
 35 Of strong prevailment⁶ in unhardened youth. persuasiveness
 With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart,
 Turned her obedience, which is due to me,
 To stubborn harshness.—And, my gracious duke,
 Be it so⁶ she will not here before your grace If 40 Consent to marry with Demetrius,
 I beg the ancient privilege of Athens:
 As she is mine, I may dispose of her,
 Which shall be either to this gentleman
 Or to her death, according to our law
 45 Immediately⁶ provided in that case. Expressly THESEUS: What say you, Hermia? Be advised, fair maid:
 To you your father should be as a god,
 One that composed⁶ your beauties, yea, and one fashioned
 To whom you are but as a form in wax
 50 By him imprinted,⁶ and within his power
 To leave⁶ the figure or disfigure⁶ it. maintain / destroy
 Demetrius is a worthy gentleman.
 HERMIA: So is Lysander.
 THESEUS: In himself he is,
 But in this kind,⁶ wanting your father's voice,⁷ respect
 55 The other must be held the worthier.
 HERMIA: I would my father looked but with my eyes.
 THESEUS: Rather your eyes must with his judgment look.
 HERMIA: I do entreat your grace to pardon me.
 I know not by what power I am made bold,
 60 Nor how it may concern⁶ my modesty befit
 In such a presence here to plead my thoughts,
 But I beseech your grace that I may know
 The worst that may befall me in this case
 If I refuse to wed Demetrius.
 65 THESEUS: Either to die the death⁶ or to abjure be executed
 For ever the society of men.
 Therefore, fair Hermia, question your desires,
 Know⁶ of your youth, examine well your blood,⁶ Inquire / passions
 Whether, if you yield not to your father's choice, 70 You can endure the livery⁶ of a nun,⁸ habit
 For aye⁶ to be in shady cloister mewed,⁶ ever / caged
 To live a barren sister all your life,
 Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.⁹

6. You are merely a wax impression of his seal.

7. Lacking your father's consent or vote.

8. Christian orders of nuns were established in the Middle Ages, but Elizabethans used the term as well for women devoted to a religious life in classical antiquity.

9. Emblem of Diana, goddess of chastity.

—For you, fair Hermia, look you arm^o yourself prepare
 To fit your fancies^o to your father's will, desires
 Or else the law of Athens yields you up, 120 Which by no means we may extenuate,^o mitigate
 To death or to a vow of single life.
 —Come, my Hippolyta. What cheer, my love?
 —Demetrius and Egeus, go along.
 I must employ you in some business
 125 Against^o our nuptial and confer with you In preparation for
 Of something nearly that³ concerns yourselves.
 EGEUS: With duty and desire we follow you.

Exeunt [all but LYSANDER and HERMIA].

LYSANDER: How now, my love, why is your cheek so pale?
 How chance the roses there do fade so fast?
 130 HERMIA: Belike^o for want of rain, which I could well Probably Beteem^o them from the tempest of my eyes. Afford; grant
 LYSANDER: Ay me! For aught that I could ever read,
 Could ever hear by tale or history,
 The course of true love never did run smooth,
 135 But either it was different in blood^o— hereditary rank
 HERMIA: Oh, cross!^o Too high to be enthralled to low. vexation
 LYSANDER: Or else misgraffèd^o in respect of years— badly matched HERMIA: Oh, spite! Too old to be engaged to young.
 LYSANDER: Or else it stood^o upon the choice of friends^o— rested / kin
 140 HERMIA: Oh, hell! To choose love by another's eyes.
 LYSANDER: Or if there were a sympathy^o in choice, an agreement
 War, death, or sickness did lay siege to it,
 Making it momentany^o as a sound, momentary
 Swift as a shadow, short as any dream,
 145 Brief as the lightning in the collied^o night coal-black
 That in a spleen^o unfolds^o both heaven and earth swift impulse / reveals
 And ere a man hath power to say "Behold!"
 The jaws of darkness do devour it up.
 So quick bright things come to confusion.
 150 HERMIA: If then true lovers have been ever^o crossed, always
 It stands as an edict in destiny.
 Then let us teach our trial patience⁴
 Because it is a customary cross,
 As due to love as thoughts and dreams and sighs,
 155 Wishes and tears, poor fancy's^o followers. love's
 LYSANDER: A good persuasion.^o Therefore hear me, Hermia: argument; principle
 I have a widow aunt, a dowager
 Of great revenue, and she hath no child.

3. That closely.

4. Let us teach ourselves to be patient in this trial.

From Athens is her house remote seven leagues,
 And she respects^o me as her only son. regards 160
 There, gentle Hermia, may I marry thee,
 And to that place the sharp Athenian law
 Cannot pursue us. If thou lovest me then
 Steal forth thy father's house tomorrow night,
 And in the wood, a league without^o the town, outside 165
 Where I did meet thee once with Helena
 To do observance to a morn of May,^o To celebrate May Day
 There will I stay for thee.

HERMIA: My good Lysander,
 I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow,
 By his best arrow with the golden head,⁵ 170
 By the simplicity^o of Venus' doves,⁶ innocence
 By that which knitteth souls and prospers loves,
 And by that fire which burned the Carthage Queen
 When the false Trojan under sail was seen,⁷
 By all the vows that ever men have broke, 175
 In number more than ever women spoke,
 In that same place thou hast appointed me
 Tomorrow truly will I meet with thee.

LYSANDER: Keep promise, love. Look, here comes Helena.

Enter HELENA.

HERMIA: God speed, fair⁸ Helena! Whither away? 180

HELENA: Call you me fair? That "fair" again unsay.
 Demetrius loves your fair; oh, happy fair!^o fortunate beauty
 Your eyes are lodestars,^o and your tongue's sweet air^o guiding stars / melody
 More tunable^o than lark to shepherd's ear tuneful
 When wheat is green, when hawthorn buds appear. 185
 Sickness is catching; oh, were favor^o so, looks; charms
 Your words I catch, fair Hermia, ere I go;
 My ear should catch your voice, my eye your eye,
 My tongue should catch your tongue's sweet melody.
 Were the world mine, Demetrius being bated,^o excepted 190
 The rest I'd give to be to you translated.
 Oh, teach me how you look, and with what art
 You sway the motion of Demetrius' heart.

HERMIA: I frown upon him, yet he loves me still.

HELENA: Oh, that your frowns would teach my smiles such skill! 195

HERMIA: I give him curses, yet he gives me love.

5. Cupid's sharp golden arrow was said to create love; his blunt lead arrow caused dislike.

6. Said to draw Venus's chariot.

7. Dido, Queen of Carthage, burned herself on a funeral pyre when her lover, Aeneas, sailed away.

8. The dialogue plays on the meanings "blonde," "beautiful," "beauty." Helena is presumably fair-haired and Hermia (called a "raven" at 2.2.114) a brunette.

HELENA: Oh, that my prayers could such affection move!

HERMIA: The more I hate, the more he follows me.

HELENA: The more I love, the more he hateth me.

200 HERMIA: His folly, Helena, is no fault of mine.

HELENA: None but your beauty; would that fault were mine!

HERMIA: Take comfort: he no more shall see my face.

Lysander and myself will fly this place.

Before the time I did Lysander see

205 Seemed Athens as a paradise to me.

Oh, then, what graces in my love do dwell

That he hath turned a heaven unto a hell?

LYSANDER: Helen, to you our minds we will unfold:

Tomorrow night, when Phoebe^o doth behold

Diana (the moon)

210 Her silver visage in the watery glass,

Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass,

A time that lovers' flights doth still^o conceal, always

Through Athens' gates have we devised to steal.

HERMIA: And in the wood where often you and I

215 Upon faint^o primrose beds were wont^o to lie,

pale / accustomed

Emptying our bosoms of their counsel sweet,

There my Lysander and myself shall meet,

And thence from Athens turn away our eyes

To seek new friends and stranger companies.^o

the company of strangers

220 Farewell, sweet playfellow; pray thou for us,

And good luck grant thee thy Demetrius.

—Keep word, Lysander; we must starve our sight

From lovers' food till morrow deep midnight.

Exit.

LYSANDER: I will, my Hermia.—Helena, adieu.

225 As you on him, Demetrius dote on you.

Exit.

HELENA: How happy some o'er other some⁹ can be!

Through Athens I am thought as fair as she.

But what of that? Demetrius thinks not so.

He will not know what all but he do know.

230 And as he errs, doting on Hermia's eyes,

So I, admiring of his qualities.

And therefore is love said to be a child

Because in choice he is so oft beguiled.

So the boy Love is perjured everywhere.

9. In comparison with others.

1. Love is promoted not by the evidence of the senses, but by the fancies of the mind.

For ere Demetrius looked on Hermia's eyne,^o eyes
He hailed down oaths that he was only mine.
And when this hail some heat from Hermia felt,
So he dissolved,^o and showers of oaths did melt. broke faith; melted 245
I will go tell him of fair Hermia's flight:
Then to the wood will he tomorrow night
Pursue her; and for this intelligence^o information
If I have thanks, it is a dear² expense.
But herein mean I to enrich my pain, 250
To have his sight thither and back again. Exit.

Scene 2

*Somewhere in the city of Athens. Enter QUINCE the carpenter, and SNUG the joiner, and BOTTOM the weaver, and FLUTE the bellows-mender, and SNOOT the tinker, and STARVELING the tailor.*³

QUINCE: Is all our company here?
BOTTOM: You were best to call them generally,⁴ man by man, according to the scrip.^o script; list
QUINCE: Here is the scroll of every man's name which is thought fit through all Athens to play in our interlude^o before the Duke and the Duchess on his wedding day at night. brief play 5
BOTTOM: First, good Peter Quince, say what the play treats on; then read the names of the actors; and so grow^o to a point.^o draw / conclusion
QUINCE: Marry,^o our play is The Most Lamentable Comedy By the Virgin Mary and Most Cruel Death of Pyramus and Thisbe.⁵ By the Virgin Mary 10
BOTTOM: A very good piece of work, I assure you, and a merry. Now, good Peter Quince, call forth your actors by the scroll. Masters, spread yourselves.
QUINCE: Answer as I call you.—Nick Bottom, the weaver?
BOTTOM: Ready. Name what part I am for, and proceed. 15
QUINCE: You, Nick Bottom, are set down for Pyramus.
BOTTOM: What is Pyramus? A lover or a tyrant?
QUINCE: A lover that kills himself, most gallant, for love.
BOTTOM: That will ask some tears in the true performing of it. If I do it, let the audience look to their eyes. I will move storms. I will condole^o in some measure. To the 20 lament; arouse pity

2. Costly (because of the betrayal of secrecy and because it leads Demetrius to Hermia); or welcome (because the potential return is Demetrius's love regained).
3. The artisans' names recall their occupations. Quince's name is probably derived from "quoins," wooden wedges used by carpenters who made buildings such as houses and theaters. The name "Snug" evokes well-finished wooden furniture made by joiners. A bottom was the piece of wood on which thread was wound; Bottom's name also connotes "ass" and "lowest point." As Flute's name suggests, domestic bellows whistle through holes when needing repair. Snout's name may refer either to the spouts of the kettles he repairs or to his nose. Tailors, as Starveling's name recalls, were proverbially thin.
4. Bottom's error for "individually" (he frequently misuses words in this manner).
5. Parodying titles such as that of Thomas Preston's Cambyeses: A Lamentable Tragedy Mixed Full of Pleasant Mirth . . . (ca. 1570).

This was lofty. Now name the rest of the players. This is Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein. A lover is more condoling.

QUINCE: Francis Flute, the bellows-mender?

35 FLUTE: Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE: Flute, you must take Thisbe on you.

FLUTE: What is Thisbe, a wandering knight?^o

knight-errant

QUINCE: It is the lady that Pyramus must love.

FLUTE: Nay, faith, let not me play a woman:⁸ I have a beard may speak as small^o as you will.

QUINCE: No, no, you must play Pyramus; and Flute, you Thisbe.

BOTTOM: Well, proceed.

QUINCE: Robin Starveling, the tailor?

STARVELING: Here, Peter Quince.

50 QUINCE: Robin Starveling, you must play Thisbe's mother.
—Tom Snout, the tinker?

SNOUT: Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE: You, Pyramus' father; myself, Thisbe's father; Snug the joiner, you, the lion's part; and I hope here is a play fitted.^o

(well) cast

55 SNUG: Have you the lion's part written? Pray you, if it be, give it me, for I am slow of study.

QUINCE: You may do it extempore, for it is nothing but roaring.

BOTTOM: Let me play the lion too. I will roar that I will do any man's heart good to hear me. I will roar that I will make the 60 Duke say, "Let him roar again! Let him roar again!"

QUINCE: An you should do it too terribly, you would fright the Duchess and the ladies that they would shriek, and that were enough to hang us all.

6. Hercules (a stock ranting role in early plays).

7. The chariot of Phoebus Apollo, the sun god (the odd spelling may represent Bottom's pronunciation).

8. On the Elizabethan stage, women's parts were played by boys and young men.

9. Elizabethan ladies regularly wore masks to remain anonymous and to protect their complexions.

1. Probably intended as a pet name for Thisbe; or it may mean "in this manner" ("thissen").

ALL: That would hang us, every mother's son.

BOTTOM: I grant you, friends, if you should fright the ladies out of their wits, they would have no more discretion but to hang us. But I will aggravate^o my voice so that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove.² I will roar you an

ACT II

Scene 1

A wood near Athens. Enter a FAIRY at one door and ROBIN Goodfellow[, a puck,]⁹ at another.

ROBIN: How now, spirit, whither wander you?

FAIRY: Over hill, over dale,

2. Bottom confuses "sitting dove" and "sucking lamb."

3. Dark yellow, a recognized name for the dye. (Bottom the weaver shows his professional knowledge.)

4. Referring to the baldness caused by venereal disease (called "the French disease").

5. Literally; an Elizabethan actor was generally given only his own lines and cues.

6. Comic blunder, possibly for "out of sight" ("from the scene" or "from being seen").

7. Be letter perfect in learning your parts.

8. (From military archery): Be present at the rehearsal, or else quit the troupe (?).

9. Imp or mischievous sprite; in Elizabethan folklore, Robin Goodfellow was a puck who would do housework if well treated.

- Thorough° bush, thorough briar,
 Over park, over pale,°
 5 Thorough flood, thorough fire,
 I do wander everywhere
 Swifter than the moon's sphere;¹
 And I serve the Fairy Queen

 In those freckles live their savors.°
 I must go seek some dewdrops here
 15 And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.
 Farewell, thou lob° of spirits, I'll be gone.
 Our queen and all her elves come here anon.
 ROBIN: The King doth keep his revels here tonight.
 Take heed the Queen come not within his sight,
 20 For Oberon is passing fell and wrath³
 Because that she as her attendant hath
 A lovely boy stolen from an Indian king—
 She never had so sweet a changeling⁴—
 And jealous Oberon would have the child
 25 Knight of his train, to trace° the forests wild.
 But she perforce° withholds the lovèd boy,
 Crowns him with flowers, and makes him all her joy.
 And now they never meet in grove or green,
 By fountain° clear or spangled starlight sheen,°
 30 But they do square,° that all their elves for fear
 Creep into acorn cups and hide them there.
 FAIRY: Either I mistake your shape and making° quite,
 Or else you are that shrewd° and knavish sprite Called Robin Goodfellow. Are not you he 35 That frights the maidens of the villagery,° Skim milk, and sometimes labor in the quern,°
 And bootless° make the breathless housewife churn,
 And sometime° make the drink to bear no barm,°
 Mislead night-wanderers, laughing at their harm?
 40 Those that "hobgoblin" call you, and "sweet puck,"
 You do their work, and they shall have good luck.
 Are not you he?
 ROBIN: Thou speakest aright;
 I am that merry wanderer of the night.

OBERON: How canst thou thus, for shame, Titania, Glance at my credit ^o with Hippolyta, Knowing I know thy love to Theseus? Didst not thou lead him through the glimmering night From Perigenia, whom he ravishèd,	Question my good name 75

5. Crab apple ("lamb's wool," a winter drink, was made with roasted apples and warm ale).

6. Possibly the old woman cries this because she ends up cross-legged on the floor, as tailors sat to do their work, or because she falls on her "tail."

7. "Corin" and "Phillida" (line 68) are typical names for a shepherd and shepherdess in pastoral poetry.

8. Making or reciting love poetry. Pipes of corn: musical instruments made of oat stalks.

And make him with fair Aegles⁹ break his faith,
 80 With Ariadne, and Antiopa;¹
 TITANIA: These are the forgeries of jealousy;
 And never since the middle summer's spring^o beginning of midsummer
 Met we on hill, in dale, forest, or mead,
 By pavèd^o fountain or by rushy² brook, pebbled
 85 Or in^o the beachèd margin^o of the sea on / shore
 To dance our ringlets^o to the whistling wind, circle dances
 But with thy brawls thou hast disturbed our sport.
 Therefore the winds, piping to us in vain,
 As in revenge have sucked up from the sea
 90 Contagious fogs which, falling in the land,
 Hath every pelting^o river made so proud paltry
 That they have overborne their continents.^o banks
 The ox hath therefore stretched his yoke in vain,
 The plowman lost his sweat, and the green corn^o grain
 95 Hath rotted ere his youth attained a beard.
 The fold stands empty in the drownèd field,
 And crows are fatted with the murrain^o flock; dead of disease
 The nine-men's morris³ is filled up with mud,
 And the quaint mazes in the wanton green⁴
 100 For lack of tread are undistinguishable.
 The human mortals want^o their winter cheer;⁵ lack
 No night is now with hymn or carol blessed.
 Therefore⁶ the moon, the governess of floods,
 Pale in her anger, washes^o all the air, moistens; wets
 105 That rheumatic⁷ diseases do abound.
 And thorough this distemperature^o we see bad weather; disturbance
 The seasons alter; hoary-headed frosts
 Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose,
 And on old Hiems^o chin and icy crown winter's 110 An odorous chaplet^o of sweet summer buds wreath
 Is, as in mockery, set. The spring, the summer,
 The childing^o autumn, angry winter, change fruitful
 Their wonted liveries,⁸ and the mazèd^o world bewildered
 By their increase^o now knows not which is which. crop yield

9. In Plutarch's Lives, Theseus previously had mistresses named Perigouna and Aegles. "Perigenia" (line 78) may be Shakespeare's alteration.

1. Taken from Plutarch; some writers used "Antiopa" as an alternative name for the Amazonian queen whom Theseus married, although here it seems to refer to a different woman. Ariadne helped Theseus to kill the Minotaur and escape from his labyrinth on Crete; she fled with Theseus, but he deserted her on Naxos.

2. Fringed with reeds.

3. The playing area for this outdoor game (traditionally, a board game played with nine pebbles or pegs) was cut in turf.

4. Luxuriant grass. Quaint mazes: intricate arrangements of paths (kept visible by frequent use).

5. Winter cheer would include the hymns and carols of the Yuletide.

6. As in lines 88 and 93 above, referring to the consequences of their quarrel.

7. Characterized by rheum: colds, coughs, and the like.

8. Customary clothing.

And this same progeny of evils comes	115
From our debate, ^o from our dissension;	quarrel
We are their parents and original. ^o	origin
OBERON: Do you amend it then; it lies in you.
Why should Titania cross her Oberon?
I do but beg a little changeling boy	120
To be my henchman. ^o	page of honor
TITANIA: Set your heart at rest. ⁹
The fairyland buys not the child of me.
His mother was a votress ¹ of my order,
And in the spiced Indian air by night
Full often hath she gossiped by my side	125
And sat with me on Neptune's yellow sands,
Marking the embarkèd traders ^o on the flood, ^o	merchant ships / tide
When we have laughed to see the sails conceive
And grow big-bellied with the wanton ^o wind,	playful; amorous
Which she, with pretty and with swimming ² gait	130
Following ^o —her womb then rich with my young squire—	Copying
Would imitate, and sail upon the land
To fetch me trifles and return again,
As from a voyage, rich with merchandise.
But she, being mortal, of that boy did die,	135
And for her sake do I rear up her boy,
And for her sake I will not part with him.
OBERON: How long within this wood intend you stay?
TITANIA: Perchance till after Theseus' wedding day.
If you will patiently dance in our round	140
And see our moonlight revels, go with us.
If not, shun me, and I will spare ^o your haunts.	avoid
OBERON: Give me that boy, and I will go with thee.
TITANIA: Not for thy fairy kingdom.—Fairies, away!
We shall chide ^o downright if I longer stay.	quarrel
Exeunt [TITANIA and her train].
OBERON: Well, go thy way. Thou shalt not from ^o this grove	go from
Till I torment thee for this injury.
—My gentle puck, come hither. Thou rememberest
Since ^o once I sat upon a promontory	When
And heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back	150
Uttering such dulcet ^o and harmonious breath ^o	sweet / voice; song
That the rude ^o sea grew civil at her song	rough
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres ^o	orbits
To hear the sea-maid's music?
ROBIN: I remember.
OBERON: That very time I saw—but thou couldst not—	155

9. Proverbial expression for "Abandon that idea."

1. Woman who has taken a vow to serve (often, religious).

2. As though gliding through the waves.

Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
 Cupid, all armed. A certain aim he took
 At a fair vestal thronèd by the west,³
 And loosed his love-shaft° smartly from his bow golden arrow
 160 As° it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts. As though
 But I might° see young Cupid's fiery shaft could
 Quenched in the chaste beams of the watery moon;
 And the imperial votress passèd on
 In maiden meditation, fancy-free.° free of love thoughts
 165 Yet marked I where the bolt° of Cupid fell. arrow
 It fell upon a little western flower,
 Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,
 And maidens call it "love-in-idleness."⁴
 Fetch me that flower. The herb I showed thee once:
 170 The juice of it on sleeping eyelids laid
 Will make or° man or woman madly dote either
 Upon the next live creature that it sees.
 Fetch me this herb, and be thou here again
 Ere the leviathan⁵ can swim a league.
 175 ROBIN: I'll put a girdle° round about the earth circle
 In forty minutes.
 OBERON: Having once this juice,
 I'll watch Titania when she is asleep
 And drop the liquor° of it in her eyes. juice
 The next thing then she waking looks upon—180 Be it on lion, bear, or wolf, or bull,
 On meddling monkey or on busy ape—
 She shall pursue it with the soul of love.
 And ere I take this charm from off her sight—
 As I can take it with another herb—185 I'll make her render up her page to me.
 But who comes here? I am invisible,
 And I will overhear their conference.

Enter DEMETRIUS, HELENA following him.
 DEMETRIUS: I love thee not, therefore pursue me not.
 Where is Lysander and fair Hermia?
 190 The one I'll stay, the other stayeth me.⁶
 Thou told'st me they were stolen unto this wood,
 And here am I, and wood° within this wood insane
 Because I cannot meet my Hermia.

3. To the west of India; in England. Vestal: virgin (a compliment to Queen Elizabeth, the Virgin Queen, and possibly an allusion to a specific entertainment in her honor, such as the water pageant at Elvetham in 1591).

4. Pansy. (Classical legend describes how the mulberry turned purple with Pyramus's blood and the hyacinth with Hyacinthus's, but it does not mention the pansy.)

5. Biblical sea monster, identified with the whale.

6. The one (Lysander) I'll bring to a halt, the other (Hermia) stops me in my tracks.

Hence, get thee gone, and follow me no more.
HELENA: You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant, ⁷	195
But yet you draw not iron, for my heart
Is true as steel. ⁸ Leave you ^o your power to draw,	Relinquish
And I shall have no power to follow you.
DEMETRIUS: Do I entice you? Do I speak you fair? ⁹
Or rather do I not in plainest truth	200
Tell you I do not nor I cannot love you?
HELENA: And even for that do I love you the more.
I am your spaniel, and, Demetrius,
The more you beat me I will fawn on you.
Use me but as your spaniel: spurn me, strike me,	205
Neglect me, lose me—only give me leave,
Unworthy as I am, to follow you.
What worser place can I beg in your love—
And yet a place of high respect with me—
Than to be used as you use your dog?	210
DEMETRIUS: Tempt not too much the hatred of my spirit,
For I am sick when I do look on thee.
HELENA: And I am sick when I look not on you.
DEMETRIUS: You do impeach ^o your modesty too much	call into question
To leave the city and commit yourself	215
Into the hands of one that loves you not,
To trust the opportunity of night
And the ill counsel of a desert ^o place	deserted
With the rich worth of your virginity.
HELENA: Your virtue is my privilege. ^o For that ^o	protection / Because 220
It is not night when I do see your face.
Therefore I think I am not in the night,
Nor doth this wood lack worlds of company,
For you in my respect ^o are all the world.	as far as I am concerned
Then how can it be said I am alone	225
When all the world is here to look on me?
DEMETRIUS: I'll run from thee and hide me in the brakes, ^o	thickets
And leave thee to the mercy of wild beasts.
HELENA: The wildest hath not such a heart as you.
Run when you will. The story shall be changed:	230
Apollo flies, and Daphne holds the chase; ¹
The dove pursues the griffin; ² the mild hind ^o	doe
Makes speed to catch the tiger: bootless ^o speed	useless
When cowardice pursues and valor flies.

7. Very hard stone supposed to have magnetic properties. Draw me: that is, with the magnetic power of attraction.

8. Hermia contrasts the base metal iron with steel, which holds its temper.

9. Do I speak kindly to you?

1. Reversal of the traditional myth in which the nymph Daphne, flying from Apollo, was transformed into a laurel tree to escape him.

2. Fabulous monster with a lion's body and an eagle's head and wings.

235 DEMETRIUS: I will not stay thy questions.³ Let me go!
 Or if thou follow me, do not believe
 But I shall do thee mischief in the wood. [Exit.]⁴

HELENA: Ay, in the temple, in the town, the field,
 You do me mischief. Fie, Demetrius,
 240 Your wrongs do set a scandal on my sex.⁵
 We cannot fight for love as men may do;
 We should be wooed and were not made to woo.
 I'll follow thee and make a heaven of hell
 To die upon the hand I love so well. [Exit.]

245 OBERON: Fare thee well, nymph. Ere he do leave this grove
 Thou shalt fly him, and he shall seek thy love.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

Hast thou the flower there? Welcome, wanderer.

ROBIN: Ay, there it is.

OBERON: I pray thee give it me.
 I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
 250 Where oxlips⁶ and the nodding violet grows,
 Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,^o honeysuckle
 With sweet musk-roses,⁷ and with eglantine.^o sweetbrier (a type of rose)
 There sleeps Titania sometime of the night,
 Lulled in these flowers with dances and delight;
 255 And there the snake throws^o her enameled skin, throws off; casts away
 Weed^o wide enough to wrap a fairy in. Garment
 And with the juice of this I'll streak^o her eyes, anoint
 And make her full of hateful fantasies.
 Take thou some of it, and seek through this grove.
 260 A sweet Athenian lady is in love
 With a disdainful youth. Anoint his eyes,
 But do it when the next thing he espies
 May be the lady. Thou shalt know the man
 By the Athenian garments he hath on.
 265 Effect it with some care, that he may prove
 More fond^o on her than she upon her love. doting
 And look thou meet me ere the first cock crow.⁸

ROBIN: Fear not, my lord; your servant shall do so. Exeunt.

3. I will not wait here any longer to hear you talk.

4. Some versions of the play provide no exit for Demetrius in this scene; however, when exactly he leaves has important implications for the tone of Helena's speech.

5. Your injustices to me cause me to behave in a way that disgraces my sex (by wooing him rather than being wooed).

6. Hybrid between primrose and cowslip.

7. Large rambling white roses.

8. Some spirits were thought unable to bear daylight (compare Hamlet 1.1.138–56, p. 1400).

Scene 2

The wood. Enter TITANIA, Queen of Fairies, with her train.

- TITANIA: Come, now a roundel^o and a fairy song; circle dance
 Then, for the third part of a minute,⁹ hence,
 Some to kill cankers^o in the musk-rose buds, caterpillars
 Some war with reremice^o for their leathern wings bats
 To make my small elves coats, and some keep back 5
 The clamorous owl that nightly hoots and wonders
 At our quaint^o spirits. Sing me now asleep; dainty
 Then to your offices, and let me rest.
- [She lies down.] FAIRIES sing [and dance].
- FIRST FAIRY: You spotted snakes with double^o tongue, forked
 Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen; 10
 Newts and blindworms,¹ do no wrong,
 Come not near our Fairy Queen.
- CHORUS: Philomel,² with melody
 Sing in our sweet lullaby;
 Lulla, lulla, lullaby, lulla, lulla, lullaby. 15
 Never harm,
 Nor spell, nor charm
 Come our lovely lady nigh.
 So good night, with lullaby.
- FIRST FAIRY: Weaving spiders, come not here; 20
 Hence, you long-legged spinners, hence!
 Beetles black, approach not near;
 Worm nor snail, do no offense.
- CHORUS: Philomel, with melody, etc.
- [TITANIA sleeps.]
- SECOND FAIRY: Hence, away! Now all is well. 25
 One aloof^o stand sentinel. at a distance
- [Exeunt FAIRIES, leaving one sentinel.]
- Enter OBERON. [He squeezes the juice on TITANIA's eyes.]*
- OBERON: What thou seest when thou dost wake,
 Do it for thy true love take;
 Love and languish for his sake.
 Be it ounce^o or cat or bear, lynx 30
 Pard,^o or boar with bristled hair, Leopard
 In thy eye that shall appear
 When thou wak'st, it is thy dear.
 Wake when some vile thing is near. [Exit.]

9. The fairies are quick enough to do their tasks in twenty seconds.

1. Newts (water lizards) and blindworms were thought to be poisonous, as were spiders (line 20).

2. The nightingale (in classical mythology, a woman who, having been raped by her sister's husband, was transformed into a bird).

Enter LYSANDER and HERMIA.

35 LYSANDER: Fair love, you faint with wandering in the wood,
And to speak truth, I have forgot our way.
We'll rest us, Hermia, if you think it good,
And tarry for the comfort of the day.

HERMIA: Be it so, Lysander. Find you out a bed,

40 For I upon this bank will rest my head.

LYSANDER: One turf shall serve as pillow for us both;
One heart, one bed, two bosoms, and one troth.^o

pledged faith

HERMIA: Nay, good Lysander: for my sake, my dear, Lie further off yet; do not lie so near.

45 LYSANDER: Oh, take the sense,^o sweet, of my innocence!
Love takes the meaning in love's conference.³

true meaning

I mean that my heart unto yours is knit,
So that but one heart we can make of it.

Two bosoms interchainèd with an oath;

50 So, then, two bosoms and a single troth.

Then by your side no bed-room me deny,
For lying so, Hermia, I do not lie.⁴

HERMIA: Lysander riddles very prettily.

Now much beshrew^o my manners and my pride curse

55 If Hermia meant to say Lysander lied.

But, gentle friend, for love and courtesy

Lie further off in human^o modesty.

courteous

Such separation as may well be said

Becomes a virtuous bachelor and a maid,

60 So far be distant. And good night, sweet friend;

Thy love ne'er alter till thy sweet life end.

LYSANDER: Amen, amen, to that fair prayer say I,
And then end life when I end loyalty.

Here is my bed. Sleep give thee all his rest.

65 HERMIA: With half that wish the wisher's eyes be pressed.⁵

[They sleep separately.]

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

ROBIN: Through the forest have I gone,

But Athenian found I none

On whose eyes I might approve^o test

This flower's force in stirring love.

70 Night and silence. Who is here?

Weeds of Athens he doth wear.

This is he my master said

Despisèd the Athenian maid;

3. Love should enable lovers truly to understand each other.

4. Deceive; punning on "lie down."

5. May sleep's rest be shared between us. Pressed: closed in sleep.

And here the maiden, sleeping sound
 On the dank and dirty ground. 75
 Pretty soul, she durst not lie
 Near this lack-love, this kill-courtesy.
 Churl,^o upon thy eyes I throw Rude fellow
 All the power this charm doth owe.^o own

[He squeezes the juice on LYSANDER's eyes.]

When thou wak'st, let love forbid 80
 Sleep his seat on thy eyelid.⁶
 So awake when I am gone,
 For I must now to Oberon. Exit.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HELENA, running.

HELENA: Stay, though thou kill me, sweet Demetrius.
 DEMETRIUS: I charge thee: hence, and do not haunt me thus. 85
 HELENA: Oh, wilt thou darkling^o leave me? Do not so. in darkness
 DEMETRIUS: Stay, on thy peril;⁷ I alone will go. [Exit.]
 HELENA: Oh, I am out of breath in this fond^o chase. foolish
 The more my prayer, the lesser is my grace.^o reward
 Happy is Hermia, wheresoe'er she lies, 90
 For she hath blessèd and attractive^o eyes. magnetic
 How came her eyes so bright? Not with salt tears;
 If so, my eyes are oftener washed than hers.
 No, no; I am as ugly as a bear,
 For beasts that meet me run away for fear. 95
 Therefore no marvel though Demetrius
 Do, as^o a monster, fly my presence thus. as if I were
 What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
 Made me compare^o with Hermia's sphery eyne?^o compete / starry eyes
 But who is here? Lysander, on the ground? 100
 Dead or asleep? I see no blood, no wound.
 Lysander, if you live, good sir, awake.
 LYSANDER: [awaking] And run through fire I will for thy sweet sake.
 Transparent⁸ Helena, nature shows art^o skill; magic power
 That through thy bosom makes me see thy heart. 105
 Where is Demetrius? Oh, how fit a word
 Is that vile name to perish on my sword!
 HELENA: Do not say so, Lysander; say not so.
 What though he love your Hermia? Lord, what though?
 Yet Hermia still loves you; then be content. 110
 LYSANDER: Content with Hermia? No, I do repent
 The tedious minutes I with her have spent.

6. Prevent you from sleeping.

7. Stay here, or risk peril (if you follow me).

8. Radiant; capable of being seen through.

- Not Hermia but Helena I love.
 Who will not change a raven for a dove?
 115 The will of man is by his reason swayed,⁹
 And reason says you are the worthier maid.
 Things growing are not ripe until their season,
 So I, being young, till now ripe not to reason.
 And, touching now the point of human skill,¹ 120 Reason becomes the marshal² to my will
 And leads me to your eyes, where I o'erlook^o look over; read
 Love's stories written in love's richest book.
- HELENA: Wherefore was I to this keen^o mockery born? sharp
 When at your hands did I deserve this scorn?
 125 Is't not enough, is't not enough, young man,
 That I did never—no, nor never can—
 Deserve a sweet look from Demetrius' eye,
 But you must flout my insufficiency?³
 Good troth,^o you do me wrong—good sooth,^o you do— Truly / indeed 130 In such disdainful manner me to woo.
 But fare you well. Perforce I must confess
 I thought you lord of more true gentleness.^o courtesy; breeding
 Oh, that a lady of one man refused Should of^o another therefore be abused! Exit. by
- 135 LYSANDER: She sees not Hermia.—Hermia, sleep thou there,
 And never mayst thou come Lysander near;
 For as a surfeit of the sweetest things
 The deepest loathing to the stomach brings,
 Or as the heresies that men do leave
 140 Are hated most of those they did deceive,⁴
 So thou, my surfeit and my heresy,
 Of all be hated, but the most of me!
 And, all my powers, address^o your love and might direct; apply
 To honor Helen and to be her knight. Exit.
- 145 HERMIA: [awaking] Help me, Lysander, help me! Do thy best
 To pluck this crawling serpent from my breast!
 Ay me, for pity! What a dream was here!
 Lysander, look how I do quake with fear.
 Methought a serpent ate my heart away,
 150 And you sat smiling at his cruel prey.^o act of preying
 Lysander? What, removed? Lysander! Lord!
 What, out of hearing, gone? No sound, no word?
 Alack, where are you? Speak an if^o you hear, an if = if Speak, of^o all loves! I swoon almost with fear. for the sake of

9. Renaissance psychology considered the will (that is, the passions) to be in constant conflict with, and ideally subject to, the faculty of reason.

1. Reaching (only) now the highest point of human judgment.

2. Officer who led guests to their appointed places.

3. Mock my shortcomings by pretending they are wonderful qualities.

4. As men most hate the false opinions they once held.

No? Then I well perceive you are not nigh.
 Either death or you I'll find immediately. 155

Exit. [TITANIA remains lying asleep.]

ACT III

Scene 1

The wood. Enter the clowns^o [, BOTTOM, QUINCE, SNOUT, rustics STARVELING, FLUTE, and SNUG].

BOTTOM: Are we all met?

QUINCE: Pat,^o pat; and here's a marvelous convenient place On the dot for our rehearsal. This green plot shall be our stage, this hawthorn brake^o our tiring-house,^o and we will do it in thicket / dressing room action as we will do it before the Duke. 5

BOTTOM: Peter Quince?

QUINCE: What sayest thou, bully^o Bottom? good fellow; jolly

BOTTOM: There are things in this comedy of Pyramus and Thisbe that will never please. First, Pyramus must draw a sword to kill himself, which the ladies cannot abide. 10
 How answer you that?

SNOUT: By'r lakin,⁵ a parlous^o fear. perilous

STARVELING: I believe we must leave the killing out, when all is done.⁶

BOTTOM: Not a whit. I have a device to make all well. Write 15 me a prologue, and let the prologue seem to say we will do no harm with our swords, and that Pyramus is not killed indeed. And for the more better assurance, tell them that I, Pyramus, am not Pyramus but Bottom the weaver. This will put them out of fear. 20

QUINCE: Well, we will have such a prologue, and it shall be written in eight and six.⁷

BOTTOM: No, make it two more: let it be written in eight and eight.

SNOUT: Will not the ladies be afeard of the lion? 25

STARVELING: I fear it, I promise you.

BOTTOM: Masters, you ought to consider with yourself, to bring in—God shield us!—a lion among ladies is a most dreadful thing.⁸ For there is not a more fearful^o wildfowl frightening than your lion living. And we ought to look to't. 30

SNOUT: Therefore another prologue must tell he is not a lion.

BOTTOM: Nay, you must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck, and he himself must

5. By our ladykin (Virgin Mary): a mild oath.

6. When all is said and done.

7. Alternate lines of eight and six syllables (a common ballad measure).

8. In 1594, at a feast in honor of the christening of King James's son, a tame lion that was supposed to draw a chariot was replaced by a black African man in order to avoid frightening the audience.

- 35 speak through, saying thus or to the same defect:^o “Ladies,” (for “effect”) or “Fair Ladies, I would wish you,” or “I would request you,” or “I would entreat you not to fear, not to tremble. My life for yours.⁹ If you think I come hither as a lion, it were pity of^o my life. No, I am no such thing. I am a man as other men are”—and there indeed let him name his name, 40 and tell them plainly he is Snug the joiner.
 QUINCE: Well, it shall be so. But there is two hard things: that is, to bring the moonlight into a chamber—for you know Pyramus and Thisbe meet by moonlight.
 SNOUT:¹ Doth the moon shine that night we play our play?
 45 BOTTOM: A calendar, a calendar! Look in the almanac; find out moonshine, find out moonshine!
 QUINCE: Yes, it doth shine that night.
 BOTTOM: Why, then may you leave a casement of the great chamber window where we play open, and the moon may 50 shine in at the casement.
 QUINCE: Ay, or else one must come in with a bush of thorns and a lantern and say he comes to disfigure,² or to present,^o represent the person of Moonshine. Then there is another thing: we must have a wall in the great chamber; for Pyramus and 55 Thisbe, says the story, did talk through the chink of a wall.
 SNOUT: You can never bring in a wall. What say you, Bottom?
 BOTTOM: Some man or other must present Wall; and let him have some plaster, or some loam, or some roughcast³ about 60 him to signify “wall”; or let him hold his fingers thus, and through that cranny shall Pyramus and Thisbe whisper.
 QUINCE: If that may be, then all is well. Come, sit down, every mother’s son, and rehearse your parts. Pyramus, you begin. When you have spoken your speech, enter into that 65 brake, and so everyone according to his cue.

Enter ROBIN[, invisible].

- ROBIN [aside]: What hempen homespuns⁴ have we swaggering
 here
 So near the cradle of the Fairy Queen?
 What, a play toward?^o I’ll be an auditor—
 An actor too perhaps, if I see cause.
 70 QUINCE: Speak, Pyramus.—Thisbe, stand forth.
 BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: “Thisbe, the flowers of odious^o (for “odorous”) savors sweet—”

9. I pledge my life to defend yours.

1. Or Snug.

2. Blunder for “figure,” represent. Bush of thorns: bundle of thornbush kindling (like the lantern, a traditional accessory of the man in the moon).

3. Mixture of lime and gravel used to plaster exterior walls.

4. Peasants, or country bumpkins, dressed in coarse homespun fabric made from hemp.

QUINCE: Odors—"odorous"!

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: "—Odors savors sweet.

So hath thy breath, my dearest Thisbe dear.

But hark, a voice! Stay thou but here a while,

And by and by I will to thee appear." Exit.

75

QUINCE: A stranger Pyramus than e'er played here. [Exit.]

FLUTE: Must I speak now?

QUINCE: Ay, marry, must you. For you must understand he goes but to see a noise that he heard and is to come again.

80

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: "Most radiant Pyramus, most lily-white of hue,

Of color like the red rose on triumphant briar,

Most briskly juvenal^o and eke^o most lovely Jew,⁵ lively youth (juvenile) / also

As true as truest horse that yet would never tire,

I'll meet thee, Pyramus, at Ninny's tomb—"

85

QUINCE: "Ninus⁶ tomb," man! Why, you must not speak that yet; that you answer to Pyramus. You speak all your part at once, cues and all.—Pyramus, enter! Your cue is past; it is "never tire."

FLUTE: Oh,

90

[as Thisbe] "As true as truest horse that yet would never tire."

[Enter ROBIN, invisible, and BOTTOM with the ass head on.]

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: "If I were fair,^o Thisbe, I were^o only handsome / would be thine."

QUINCE: Oh, monstrous! Oh, strange! We are haunted! Pray, masters! Fly, masters! Help!

[Exeunt QUINCE, SNOUT, STARVELING,
FLUTE, and SNUG.]

ROBIN: I'll follow you, I'll lead you about a round,^o

in circles 95

Through bog, through bush, through brake, through briar.

Sometime a horse I'll be, sometime a hound,

A hog, a headless bear, sometime a fire,^o

will-o'-the-wisp

And neigh and bark and grunt and roar and burn,

Like horse, hound, hog, bear, fire, at every turn. Exit.

100

BOTTOM: Why do they run away? This is a knavery of them to make me afraid.

Enter SNOUT.

SNOUT: O Bottom, thou art changed! What do I see on thee?

5. Not often considered "lovely" by Elizabethan Christians; usually, a term of abuse (here, echoing the first syllable of "juvenal").

6. Mythical founder of Nineveh, whose wife, Semiramis, was believed to have founded Babylon, the setting for the story of Pyramus and Thisbe. Flute's mistake, "Ninny," means "fool."

BOTTOM: What do you see? You see an ass head of your 105 own,⁷ do you? [Exit SNOUT.]

Enter QUINCE.

QUINCE: Bless thee, Bottom, bless thee! Thou art translated.^o transformed

Exit.

BOTTOM: I see their knavery. This is to make an ass of me, to fright me, if they could. But I will not stir from this place, do what they can. I will walk up and down here, 110 and I will sing, that they shall hear I am not afraid.
 [Sings.] The ouzel cock,^o so black of hue, male blackbird
 With orange-tawny bill,
 The throstle^o with his note so true, song thrush
 The wren with little quill^o— feathers

115 TITANIA [awaking]: What angel wakes me from my flowery bed?

BOTTOM [sings]: The finch, the sparrow, and the lark,
 The plainsong⁸ cuckoo gray,
 Whose note full many a man doth mark
 And dares not answer “Nay”⁹—

120 for indeed, who would set his wit to^o so foolish a bird? Who pay heed to would give a bird the lie,¹ though he cry “cuckoo” never so?^o ever so much

TITANIA: I pray thee, gentle mortal, sing again.

Mine ear is much enamored of thy note;
 So is mine eye enthralled to thy shape,
 125 And thy fair virtue's force² perforce doth move me
 On the first view to say, to swear, I love thee.

BOTTOM: Methinks, mistress, you should have little reason for that. And yet, to say the truth, reason and love keep little company together nowadays—the more the pity 130 that some honest neighbors will not make them friends.
 Nay, I can gleek^o upon occasion. make jokes

TITANIA: Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful.

BOTTOM: Not so neither; but if I had wit enough to get out of this wood, I have enough to serve mine own turn.^o purpose

135 TITANIA: Out of this wood do not desire to go.
 Thou shalt remain here, whether thou wilt or no.
 I am a spirit of no common rate^o— rank
 The summer still^o doth tend upon my state³— always
 And I do love thee. Therefore go with me.
 140 I'll give thee fairies to attend on thee,
 And they shall fetch thee jewels from the deep

7. You see a figment of your own asinine imagination.

8. Melody sung without adornment (that is, the cuckoo's call).

9. Deny. (The cuckoo's call was associated with cuckoldry.)

1. Who would call a bird a liar?

2. The power of your good or beauteous qualities.

3. Serves me, as part of my royal retinue.

And sing while thou on pressèd flowers dost sleep.
 And I will purge thy mortal grossness^o so
 That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.
 Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Moth, and Mustardseed!

fleshy being

145

Enter four FAIRIES[: PEASEBLOSSOM, COBWEB, MOTH,⁴ and MUSTARDSEED].

PEASEBLOSSOM: Ready.

COBWEB: And I.

MOTH: And I.

MUSTARDSEED: And I.

ALL: Where shall we go?

TITANIA: Be kind and courteous to this gentleman.

Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes;
 Feed him with apricots and dewberries,
 With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;
 The honey bags steal from the humble-bees,^o
 And for night-tapers crop their waxen thighs,
 And light them at the fiery glowworms' eyes
 To have^o my love to bed and to arise;
 And pluck the wings from painted butterflies
 To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes.
 Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

150 bumblebees

lead

155

PEASEBLOSSOM: Hail, mortal!

COBWEB: Hail!

MOTH: Hail!

160

MUSTARDSEED: Hail!

BOTTOM: I cry your worships mercy,⁵ heartily.—I beseech your worship's name.

COBWEB: Cobweb.

BOTTOM: I shall desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Cobweb. If I cut my finger, I shall make bold with you.⁶—Your name, honest gentleman?

165

PEASEBLOSSOM: Peaseblossom.

BOTTOM: I pray you commend me to Mistress Squash, your mother, and to Master Peascod,⁷ your father. Good Master Peaseblossom, I shall desire you of more acquaintance too.—Your name, I beseech you, sir?

170

MUSTARDSEED: Mustardseed.

BOTTOM: Good Master Mustardseed, I know your patience⁸ well. That same cowardly, giant-like ox-beef⁹ hath devoured many a gentleman of your house. I promise you, your 175

4. Or "mote": speck.

5. I beg pardon of your honors.

6. Cobwebs were used to stop bleeding.

7. Ripe pea pod (called "your father" because it suggests "codpiece"). Squash: Unripe pea pod.

8. What you have suffered with fortitude.

9. Because beef is often eaten with mustard, or because oxen munch on mustard plants.

kindred hath made my eyes water ere now. I desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Mustardseed.

TITANIA [to the FAIRIES]: Come, wait upon him. Lead him to my bower.

180 The moon methinks looks with a watery eye,
And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,¹ Lamenting some enforced^o chastity. violated; involuntary
Tie up my lover's tongue;² bring him silently. [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

The wood. Enter [OBERON,] King of Fairies.

OBERON: I wonder if Titania be awaked;
Then what it was that next came in her eye,
Which she must dote on in extremity.

Enter ROBIN Goodfellow.

Here comes my messenger. How now, mad spirit?
5 What night-rule^o now about this haunted grove? night revels; sports

ROBIN: My mistress with a monster is in love.

Near to her close^o and consecrated bower, private
While she was in her dull^o and sleeping hour, drowsy

A crew of patches,^o rude mechanicals^o fools / rough workmen
10 That work for bread upon Athenian stalls,^o market stands

Were met together to rehearse a play
Intended for great Theseus' nuptial day.
The shallowest thick-skin of that barren sort,^o witless lot

Who Pyramus presented^o in their sport, acted 15 Forsook his scene^o and entered in a brake. stage

When I did him at this advantage take,
An ass's noll^o I fixèd on his head. head

Anon his Thisbe must be answerèd,
And forth my mimic^o comes. When they him spy— burlesque actor

20 As wild geese that the creeping fowler^o eye, hunter of birds
Or russet-pated choughs, many in sort,³

Rising and cawing at the gun's report,
Sever^o themselves and madly sweep the sky— Scatter

So at his sight away his fellows fly,
25 And at our stamp⁴ here o'er and o'er one falls.

He^o "Murder!" cries and help from Athens calls. One (workman)

Their sense thus weak, lost with their fears thus strong,
Made senseless things begin to do them wrong.
For briars and thorns at their apparel snatch,

1. Dew was thought to originate on the moon.

2. Bottom is perhaps making involuntary asinine noises.

3. Together, in a flock. Russet-pated choughs: gray-headed jackdaws.

4. Editors have wondered how a fairy's presumably tiny foot could cause the human to fall.

Some sleeves, some hats: from yielders all things catch.⁵ 30
 I led them on in this distracted fear
 And left sweet Pyramus translated there,
 When in that moment, so it came to pass,
 Titania waked and straightway loved an ass.

OBERON: This falls out better than I could devise. 35
 But hast thou yet latched^o the Athenian's eyes anointed
 With the love juice, as I did bid thee do?

ROBIN: I took him sleeping—that is finished, too—
 And the Athenian woman by his side,
 That^o when he waked, of force^o she must be eyed. So that / necessity 40

Enter DEMETRIUS and HERMIA.

OBERON: Stand close. This is the same Athenian.
 ROBIN: This is the woman, but not this the man.

[OBERON and ROBIN stand apart.]

DEMETRIUS: Oh, why rebuke you him that loves you so?
 Lay breath so bitter on your bitter foe.

HERMIA: Now I but chide, but I should use thee worse, 45
 For thou, I fear, hast given me cause to curse.
 If thou hast slain Lysander in his sleep,
 Being o'er shoes^o in blood, plunge in the deep, Having waded so far
 And kill me too.

The sun was not so true unto the day 50
 As he to me. Would he have stolen away
 From sleeping Hermia? I'll believe as soon
 This whole^o earth may be bored, and that the moon solid
 May through the center creep and so displease
 Her brother's noontide with the Antipodes.⁶ 55
 It cannot be but thou hast murdered him.

So should a murderer look: so dead,^o so grim. deathly pale

DEMETRIUS: So should the murdered look, and so should I,
 Pierced through the heart with your stern cruelty.
 Yet you, the murderer, look as bright, as clear, 60
 As yonder Venus in her glimmering sphere.^o orbit

HERMIA: What's this to my Lysander? Where is he?
 Ah, good Demetrius, wilt thou give him me?

DEMETRIUS: I had rather give his carcass to my hounds.

HERMIA: Out, dog! Out, cur! Thou driv'st me past the bounds 65
 Of maiden's patience. Hast thou slain him, then?
 Henceforth be never numbered among men.
 Oh, once tell true; tell true, even for my sake:
 Durst thou have looked upon him being awake,

5. Everything robs the timid.

6. That the moon could creep through a hole bored through the earth's center and emerge on the other side, the Antipodes, displeasing the inhabitants by displacing the noontime sun with the darkness of night. (Apollo, the sun god, was the brother of Diana, the moon goddess.)

- 70 And hast thou killed him sleeping? Oh, brave touch!^o noble stroke
 Could not a worm,^o an adder do so much? serpent
 An adder did it; for with doubler⁷ tongue
 Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung.
- DEMETRIUS: You spend your passion on a misprised mood.^o in misconceived anger
- 75 I am not guilty of Lysander's blood,
 Nor is he dead, for aught that I can tell.
- HERMIA: I pray thee, tell me then that he is well.
- DEMETRIUS: And if I could, what should I get therefore?^o for that
- HERMIA: A privilege, never to see me more;
 80 And from thy hated presence part I so.
 See me no more, whether he be dead or no. Exit.
- DEMETRIUS: There is no following her in this fierce vein.
 Here therefore for a while I will remain.
 So sorrow's heaviness⁸ doth heavier grow
- 85 For debt that bankrupt sleep doth sorrow owe,⁹
 Which now in some slight measure it will pay,
 If for his tender here I make some stay.¹
- [He] lies down [and sleeps].
- OBERON [to ROBIN]: What hast thou done? Thou hast mistaken quite
 And laid the love juice on some true love's sight.
- 90 Of thy misprision^o must perforce ensue mistake
 Some true love turned, and not a false turned true.
- ROBIN: Then fate o'errules, that, one man holding troth,^o faith
 A million fail, confounding oath on oath.²
- OBERON: About the wood go swifter than the wind,
 95 And Helena of Athens look^o thou find. be sure
 All fancy-sick^o she is and pale of cheer^o lovesick / face
 With sighs of love that costs the fresh blood dear.³
 By some illusion see thou bring her here;
 I'll charm his eyes against^o she do appear. in readiness for when
- 100 ROBIN: I go, I go; look how I go,
 Swifter than arrow from the Tartar's bow.⁴ [Exit.]
- OBERON [squeezing the juice on DEMETRIUS' eyes]: Flower of this purple dye,
 Hit with Cupid's archery,
 Sink in apple^o of his eye. pupil
- 105 When his love he doth espy,
 Let her shine as gloriously
 As the Venus of the sky.

7. More forked (of the adder); more duplicitous (of Demetrius).

8. Sadness (punning on "heavy": drowsy).

9. Because sorrow worsens without sleep.

1. I will rest here awhile, giving sleep capital ("tender") to pay off some of its debt to sorrow.

2. Among the millions of faithless men, the one true man's oath has been subverted by fate.

3. Sighs were thought to cause a loss of blood.

4. Tartars, a dark-skinned, supposedly savage people in Asia Minor, were famed for their skills in archery.

When thou wak'st, if she be by,
 Beg of her for remedy.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck.

ROBIN: Captain of our fairy band, 110
 Helena is here at hand,
 And the youth mistook by me,
 Pleading for a lover's fee.^o reward
 Shall we their fond^o pageant see? foolish
 Lord, what fools these mortals be! 115

OBERON: Stand aside. The noise they make
 Will cause Demetrius to awake.

ROBIN: Then will two at once woo one;
 That must needs be sport alone.^o in itself
 And those things do best please me 120
 That befall preposterously.^o ass backward

[They stand apart.]

Enter LYSANDER and HELENA.

LYSANDER: Why should you think that I should woo in scorn?
 Scorn and derision never come in tears.
 Look when I vow, I weep, and vows so born,
 In their nativity all truth appears.⁵ 125
 How can these things in me seem scorn to you,
 Bearing the badge of faith⁶ to prove them true?

HELENA: You do advance^o your cunning more and more. increase; display
 When truth kills truth⁷—oh, devilish-holy fray!
 These vows are Hermia's. Will you give her o'er? 130
 Weigh oath with oath, and you will nothing weigh.⁸
 Your vows to her and me put in two scales
 Will even weigh, and both as light as tales.^o lies; fiction

LYSANDER: I had no judgment when to her I swore.

HELENA: Nor none, in my mind, now you give her o'er. 135

LYSANDER: Demetrius loves her, and he loves not you.

DEMETRIUS [awaking]: O Helen, goddess, nymph, perfect, divine!

To what, my love, shall I compare thine eyne?
 Crystal is muddy. Oh, how ripe in show^o appearance
 Thy lips, those kissing cherries, tempting grow! 140
 That pure congealed white, high Taurus⁹ snow,
 Fanned with the eastern wind, turns to a crow¹
 When thou hold'st up thy hand. Oh, let me kiss

5. The fact that I am weeping authenticates my vow's sincerity.

6. Insignia, such as that worn on a servant's livery (here, his tears).

7. When one vow nullifies another.

8. You will find that neither oath has any substance; you, Lysander, will be found to have no substance.

9. Range of high mountains in Asia Minor.

1. Appears black by contrast.

- This princess of pure white, this seal^o of bliss! pledge
- 145 HELENA: Oh, spite! Oh, hell! I see you all are bent
 To set against me for your merriment.
 If you were civil and knew courtesy,
 You would not do me thus much injury.
 Can you not hate me, as I know you do,
 150 But you must join in souls to mock me too?
 If you were men, as men you are in show,
 You would not use a gentle^o lady so, well-born; mild
 To vow and swear and superpraise my parts,^o overpraise my qualities
 When I am sure you hate me with your hearts.
 155 You both are rivals and love Hermia,
 And now both rivals to mock Helena.
 A trim^o exploit, a manly enterprise, fine
 To conjure tears up in a poor maid's eyes
 With your derision. None of noble sort^o rank; nature
 160 Would so offend a virgin and extort^o torture
 A poor soul's patience, all to make you sport.
 LYSANDER: You are unkind, Demetrius; be not so.
 For you love Hermia; this you know I know.
 And here, with all good will, with all my heart,
 165 In Hermia's love I yield you up my part;
 And yours of Helena to me bequeath,
 Whom I do love and will do till my death.
 HELENA: Never did mockers waste more idle breath.
 DEMETRIUS: Lysander, keep thy Hermia. I will none.²
 170 If e'er I loved her, all that love is gone.
 My heart to her but as guest-wise^o sojourned, as a guest
 And now to Helen is it home returned,
 There to remain.
 LYSANDER: Helen, it is not so.
 DEMETRIUS: Disparage not the faith thou dost not know,
 175 Lest to thy peril thou aby it dear.^o pay for it dearly
 Look where thy love comes; yonder is thy dear.
Enter HERMIA.
 HERMIA: Dark night, that from the eye his^o function takes, its
 The ear more quick of apprehension makes.
 Wherein it doth impair the seeing sense,
 180 It pays the hearing double recompense.
 Thou art not by mine eye, Lysander, found;
 Mine ear, I thank it, brought me to thy sound.
 But why unkindly didst thou leave me so?
 LYSANDER: Why should he stay whom love doth press to go?
 185 HERMIA: What love could press Lysander from my side?

2. I will have nothing to do with her.

LYSANDER: Lysander's love, that would not let him bide:

Fair Helena, who more engilds the night

Than all yon fiery oes and eyes of light.³

[to HERMIA] Why seek'st thou me? Could not this make thee know

The hate I bare thee made me leave thee so?

190

HERMIA: You speak not as you think; it cannot be.

HELENA: Lo, she is one of this confederacy.

Now I perceive they have conjoined all three

To fashion this false sport in spite of^o me.

to spite

Injurious Hermia, most ungrateful maid,

195

Have you conspired, have you with these contrived

To bait⁴ me with this foul derision?

Is all the counsel^o that we two have shared,

intimacy

The sisters' vows, the hours that we have spent

When we have chid the hasty-footed time

200

For parting us—oh, is all forgot,

All schooldays' friendship, childhood innocence?

We, Hermia, like two artificial^o gods

artfully skilled

Have with our needles created both one flower,

Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,

205

Both warbling of one song, both in one key,

As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds

Had been incorporate.^o So we grew together

of one body

Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,

But yet an union in partition,

210

Two lovely berries molded on one stem;

So with two seeming bodies but one heart,

Two of the first,⁵ like coats in heraldry,

Due but to one and crownèd with one crest.

And will you rent our ancient love asunder,

215

To join with men in scorning your poor friend?

It is not friendly, 'tis not maidenly.

Our sex as well as I may chide you for it,

Though I alone do feel the injury.

HERMIA: I am amazèd at your words.

220

I scorn you not; it seems that you scorn me.

HELENA: Have you not set Lysander, as in scorn,

To follow me and praise my eyes and face?

And made your other love, Demetrius—

Who even but now^o did spurn me with his foot—

just now 225

To call me goddess, nymph, divine, and rare,

3. Stars (punning on the vowels and on lovers' exclamatory "oh"s and "ay"s). An "o" was a spangle.

4. To torment (as Elizabethans set dogs to bait a bear).

5. A technical phrase in heraldry, referring to the first quartering in a coat of arms, which may be repeated. The friends then have two bodies but a single, overarching identity.

- Precious, celestial? Wherefore speaks he this
 To her he hates? And wherefore doth Lysander
 Deny your love—so rich within his soul—
 230 And tender^o me, forsooth, affection, offer
 But by your setting on, by your consent?
 What though I be not so in grace^o as you, favor
 So hung upon with love, so fortunate,
 But miserable most, to love unloved?
 235 This you should pity rather than despise.
 HERMIA: I understand not what you mean by this.
 HELENA: I do. Persever, counterfeit sad^o looks, serious
 Make mouths upon^o me when I turn my back, Make faces at Wink each at other, hold the sweet jest up.^o keep up the joke
 240 This sport well carried shall be chronicled.
 If you have any pity, grace, or manners,
 You would not make me such an argument.^o a subject of merriment
 But fare ye well. 'Tis partly my own fault,
 Which death or absence soon shall remedy.
 245 LYSANDER: Stay, gentle Helena, hear my excuse,
 My love, my life, my soul, fair Helena!
 HELENA: Oh, excellent!
 HERMIA [to LYSANDER]: Sweet, do not scorn her so.
 DEMETRIUS: If she cannot entreat, I can compel.⁶
 LYSANDER: Thou canst compel no more than she entreat.
 250 Thy threats have no more strength than her weak prayers.
 —Helen, I love thee, by my life, I do!
 I swear by that which I will lose for thee
 To prove him false that says I love thee not.
 DEMETRIUS [to HELENA]: I say I love thee more than he can do.
 255 LYSANDER: If thou say so, withdraw,⁷ and prove it too.
 DEMETRIUS: Quick, come!
 HERMIA: Lysander, whereto tends all this?
 LYSANDER: Away, you Ethiope!⁸
 [He tries to break away from HERMIA.]
 DEMETRIUS [to HERMIA]: No, no, he'll Seem to break loose.⁹ [to LYSANDER] Take on as^o you Pretend would follow,
 But yet come not. You are a tame man, go!
 260 LYSANDER [to HERMIA]: Hang off,^o thou cat, thou burr! Vile Let go thing, let loose,

6. If Hermia cannot entreat you to stop, I can make you do it.

7. Come with me ("step outside").

8. Allusion to Hermia's dark hair and complexion. Elizabethans generally regarded light complexions as more beautiful than dark and often stigmatized dark-skinned peoples (such as Ethiopians or Tartars) as ugly.

9. Lysander will only pretend to break free from Hermia.

- Or I will shake thee from me like a serpent.
 HERMIA: Why are you grown so rude? What change is this,
 Sweet love?
 LYSANDER: Thy love? Out, tawny Tartar, out!
 Out, loathèd medicine!¹ O hated potion, hence!
 HERMIA: Do you not jest?
 HELENA: Yes, sooth,^o and so do you. truly 265
 LYSANDER: Demetrius, I will keep my word with thee.
 DEMETRIUS: I would I had your bond, for I perceive
 A weak bond² holds you. I'll not trust your word.
 LYSANDER: What? Should I hurt her, strike her, kill her dead?
 Although I hate her, I'll not harm her so. 270
 HERMIA: What? Can you do me greater harm than hate?
 Hate me? Wherefore? Oh, me, what news,^o my love? what has happened
 Am not I Hermia? Are not you Lysander?
 I am as fair now as I was erewhile.^o a while ago
 Since night you loved me, yet since night you left me. 275
 Why then, you left me—oh, the gods forbid—
 In earnest, shall I say?
 LYSANDER: Ay, by my life,
 And never did desire to see thee more.
 Therefore be out of hope, of question, of doubt;
 Be certain, nothing truer. 'Tis no jest 280
 That I do hate thee and love Helena.
 HERMIA [to HELENA]: Oh, me, you juggler,^o you canker-blossom,³ trickster
 You thief of love! What, have you come by night
 And stolen my love's heart from him?
 HELENA: Fine, i'faith.
 Have you no modesty, no maiden shame, 285
 No touch of bashfulness? What, will you tear
 Impatient answers from my gentle tongue?
 Fie, fie, you counterfeit, you puppet,⁴ you!
 HERMIA: "Puppet"? Why so?—Ay, that way goes the game.
 Now I perceive that she hath made compare 290
 Between our statures; she hath urged her height,
 And with her personage, her tall personage,
 Her height, forsooth, she hath prevailed with him.
 —And are you grown so high in his esteem
 Because I am so dwarfish and so low? 295
 How low am I, thou painted maypole?⁵ Speak!
 How low am I? I am not yet so low
 But that my nails can reach unto thine eyes.
 HELENA: I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,

1. Any drug (including poison).

2. Hermia's weak grasp (with a pun on "bond": signed oath, the meaning in the previous line).

3. Worm that devours blossoms (of love).

4. Fraudulent imitation; but Hermia interprets "puppet" as a reference to her height.

5. Proverbial epithet for someone tall and skinny. Painted: insulting allusion to the use of cosmetics.

- 300 Let her not hurt me. I was never curst;^o quarrelsome
 I have no gift at all in shrewishness.
 I am a right^o maid for my cowardice. proper
 Let her not strike me. You perhaps may think Because she is something^o lower than myself somewhat
 That I can match her.
- 305 HERMIA: “Lower”? Hark, again!
 HELENA: Good Hermia, do not be so bitter with me.
 I evermore did love you, Hermia,
 Did ever keep your counsels, never wronged you,
 Save that, in love unto Demetrius,
 310 I told him of your stealth^o unto this wood. stealing away
 He followed you; for love I followed him.
 But he hath chid me hence and threatened me
 To strike me, spurn me, nay, to kill me too.
 And now, so^o you will let me quiet go, if only
 315 To Athens will I bear my folly back
 And follow you no further. Let me go.
 You see how simple and how fond^o I am. foolish
- HERMIA: Why, get you gone. Who is’t that hinders you?
 HELENA: A foolish heart that I leave here behind.
 HERMIA: What, with Lysander?
- 320 HELENA: With Demetrius.
 LYSANDER: Be not afraid; she shall not harm thee, Helena.
 DEMETRIUS: No, sir, she shall not, though you take her part.
 HELENA: Oh, when she is angry she is keen^o and shrewd.^o sharp / shrewish
 She was a vixen when she went to school,
 325 And though she be but little, she is fierce.
 HERMIA: “Little” again? Nothing but “low” and “little”?
 Why will you suffer her to flout me thus?
 Let me come to her.
- LYSANDER: Get you gone, you dwarf,
 You minimus of hind’ring knot-grass⁶ made,
 You bead, you acorn.
- 330 DEMETRIUS: You are too officious
 In her behalf that scorns your services.
 Let her alone: speak not of Helena;
 Take not her part. For if thou dost intend Never so little^o show of love to her, Even the smallest Thou shalt aby^o it. pay for
- 335 LYSANDER: Now she holds me not;
 Now follow, if thou dar’st, to try whose right,
 Of thine or mine, is most in Helena.
 DEMETRIUS: Follow? Nay, I’ll go with thee, cheek by jowl.⁷

6. Creeping binding weed (its sap was thought to stunt human growth). Minimus: diminutive thing (Latin).

7. Proverbial saying for “side by side.”

[Exeunt LYSANDER and DEMETRIUS.]

- HERMIA: You, mistress, all this coil^o is long^o of you. turmoil / because Nay, go not back.
- HELENA: I will not trust you, I, 340
 Nor longer stay in your curst company.
 Your hands than mine are quicker for a fray;^o fight
 My legs are longer, though, to run away. [Exit.]
- HERMIA: I am amazed and know not what to say. [Exit.]
 [OBERON and ROBIN come forward.]
- OBERON: This is thy negligence. Still^o thou mistak'st Always 345
 Or else committ'st thy knaveries willfully.
- ROBIN: Believe me, king of shadows,^o I mistook. fairy spirits
 Did not you tell me I should know the man
 By the Athenian garments he had on?
 And so far^o blameless proves my enterprise to this extent 350
 That I have 'nointed an Athenian's eyes;
 And so far am I glad it so did sort,^o turn out
 As^o this their jangling^o I esteem a sport. Since / bickering
- OBERON: Thou seest these lovers seek a place to fight.
 Hie^o therefore, Robin, overcast the night; Hurry 355
 The starry welkin^o cover thou anon sky
 With drooping fog as black as Acheron,⁸
 And lead these testy rivals so astray
 As^o one come not within another's way. So that
 Like to Lysander sometime frame thy tongue, 360
 Then stir Demetrius up with bitter wrong;^o insults
 And sometime rail thou like Demetrius,
 And from each other look thou lead them thus
 Till o'er their brows death-counterfeiting sleep
 With leaden legs and batty^o wings doth creep. batlike 365
 Then crush this herb into Lysander's eye,
 Whose liquor hath this virtuous^o property: potent
 To take from thence all error with his might
 And make his eyeballs roll with wonted^o sight. normal
 When they next wake, all this derision 370
 Shall seem a dream and fruitless^o vision, inconsequential
 And back to Athens shall the lovers wend^o go
 With league^o whose date^o till death shall never end. covenant / duration
 Whiles I in this affair do thee employ,
 I'll to my queen and beg her Indian boy; 375
 And then I will her charmèd^o eye release enchanted
 From monster's view, and all things shall be peace.
- ROBIN: My fairy lord, this must be done with haste,
 For night's swift dragons⁹ cut the clouds full fast,

8. River of hell or Hades, in Greek mythology.

9. Imagined as drawing the chariots of the goddess of night.

380 And yonder shines Aurora's harbinger,¹
 At whose approach ghosts wandering here and there
 Troop home to churchyards; damnèd spirits all,
 That in crossways and floods² have burial,
 Already to their wormy beds are gone,
 385 For fear lest day should look their shames upon:
 They willfully themselves exile from light
 And must for aye^o consort with black-browed night. ever

OBERON: But we are spirits of another sort.

I with the morning's love³ have oft made sport,
 390 And like a forester⁴ the groves may tread
 Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
 Opening on Neptune^o with fair blessèd beams (the sea)
 Turns into yellow gold his salt^o green streams. salty
 But notwithstanding, haste, make no delay;
 395 We may effect this business yet ere day. [Exit.]

ROBIN: Up and down, up and down,
 I will lead them up and down.
 I am feared in field and town.
 Goblin,^o lead them up and down. (Robin himself)

400 Here comes one.

Enter LYSANDER.

LYSANDER: Where art thou, proud Demetrius? Speak thou now.

ROBIN:⁵ Here, villain, drawn^o and ready. Where art thou? with sword drawn

LYSANDER: I will be with thee straight.^o immediately

ROBIN: Follow me then
 To plainer^o ground. [Exit LYSANDER.[]]⁶ clearer

Enter DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS: Lysander, speak again.

405 Thou runaway, thou coward, art thou fled?
 Speak! In some bush? Where dost thou hide thy head?

ROBIN: Thou coward, art thou bragging to the stars,
 Telling the bushes that thou look'st for wars,
 And wilt not come? Come, recreant;^o come, thou child. coward; wretch

1. Herald of the goddess of dawn; the morning star.

2. In which the drowned were "buried," without Christian sacrament. Crossways: crossroads (where suicides were buried, also without Christian sacrament). Robin is differentiating here between two types of spirits: those who wandered from their churchyard graves and those who have no proper resting place. These two types, both ghosts of former humans, are differentiated in turn from the fairy spirits by Oberon in the ensuing lines.

3. The love of Aurora, goddess of dawn (or Cephalus, a brave hunter, Aurora's lover).

4. Keeper of a royal forest or private park.

5. In what follows, Robin presumably mimics the voices of Demetrius and Lysander.

6. He might instead wander about the stage.

I'll whip thee with a rod. He is defiled
That draws a sword on thee.⁷ 410

DEMETRIUS: Yea, art thou there?

ROBIN: Follow my voice; we'll try^o no manhood here. test

Exeunt.

[Enter LYSANDER.]

LYSANDER: He goes before me and still dares me on.

When I come where he calls, then he is gone.

The villain is much lighter-heeled than I. 415

I followed fast, but faster he did fly,

That^o fallen am I in dark uneven way, With the result that

And here will rest me.

[He lies down.]

Come, thou gentle day.

For if but once thou show me thy gray light,

I'll find Demetrius and revenge this spite. 420

[He sleeps.]

[Enter] ROBIN and DEMETRIUS.

ROBIN: Ho, ho, ho! Coward, why com'st thou not?

DEMETRIUS: Abide^o me, if thou dar'st; for well I wot^o Wait for / know

Thou runn'st before me, shifting every place,

And dar'st not stand nor look me in the face.

Where art thou now?

ROBIN: Come hither; I am here. 425

DEMETRIUS: Nay, then, thou mock'st me. Thou shalt buy^o pay for this dear^o dearly

If ever I thy face by daylight see.

Now, go thy way. Faintness constraineth me

To measure out my length on this cold bed.

[He lies down.]

By day's approach look to be visited. 430

[He sleeps.]

Enter HELENA.

HELENA: O weary night, O long and tedious night,

Abate^o thy hours; shine comforts from the east, Shorten

That I may back to Athens by daylight

From these that my poor company detest;

And sleep, that sometimes shuts up sorrow's eye, 435

Steal me a while from mine own company.

7. That is, it would be a disgrace to treat you as an honorable opponent.

[She lies down and] sleep[s].

ROBIN: Yet but three? Come one more;
Two of both kinds makes up four.

[Enter HERMIA.]

Here she comes, curst^o and sad. angry
440 Cupid is a knavish lad
Thus to make poor females mad.

HERMIA: Never so weary, never so in woe,
Bedabbled with the dew and torn with briars,
I can no further crawl, no further go;
445 My legs can keep no pace with my desires.
Here will I rest me till the break of day.

[She lies down.]

Heavens shield Lysander, if they mean a fray.

[She sleeps.]

ROBIN: On the ground,
Sleep sound.
450 I'll apply
To your eye,
Gentle lover, remedy.

[He squeezes the juice on Lysander's eyes.]

When thou wak'st,
Thou tak'st
455 True delight
In the sight
Of thy former lady's eye;
And the country proverb known,
That every man should take his own,
460 In your waking shall be shown.
Jack shall have Jill,
Naught shall go ill,
The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

[Exit. The lovers remain onstage, asleep.]

ACT IV

Scene 1

The wood. Enter [TITANIA,] Queen of Fairies, and [BOTTOM, the] clown [with the ass head], and FAIRIES[PEASE-BLOSSOM, COBWEB, MOTH, and MUSTARDSEED], and [OBERON,] the King, behind them.

TITANIA [to BOTTOM]: Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed

While I thy amiable^o cheeks do coy,^o lovable / caress
And stick musk-roses in thy sleek smooth head,
And kiss thy fair large ears, my gentle joy.

BOTTOM: Where's Peaseblossom? 5

PEASEBLOSSOM: Ready.

BOTTOM: Scratch my head, Peaseblossom.—Where's Monsieur Cobweb?

COBWEB: Ready.

BOTTOM: Monsieur Cobweb, good monsieur, get you your weapons in your hand and kill me a red-hipped humble-bee on the top of a thistle; and, good monsieur, bring me the honey-bag. Do not fret yourself too much in the action, monsieur; and, good monsieur, have a care the honey-bag break not. I would be loath to have you overflown 10 with^o a honey-bag, signor. 15 [Exit COBWEB.] submerged by

—Where's Monsieur Mustardseed?

MUSTARDSEED: Ready.

BOTTOM: Give me your neaf,^o Monsieur Mustardseed. Pray fist you leave your courtesy,⁸ good monsieur. 20

MUSTARDSEED: What's your will?

BOTTOM: Nothing, good monsieur, but to help Cavalieri⁹ Cobweb to scratch. I must to the barber's, monsieur, for methinks I am marvelous hairy about the face. And I am such a tender ass, if my hair do but tickle me, I must scratch. 25

TITANIA: What, wilt thou hear some music, my sweet love?

BOTTOM: I have a reasonable good ear in music. Let's have the tongs and the bones.¹

TITANIA: Or say, sweet love, what thou desir'st to eat.

BOTTOM: Truly, a peck of provender.^o I could munch your fodder 30 good dry oats. Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle^o of hay. Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.^o bundle / equal

TITANIA: I have a venturous fairy that shall seek
The squirrel's hoard and fetch thee off new nuts.

BOTTOM: I had rather have a handful or two of dried peas. 35

But, I pray you, let none of your people stir me; I have an exposition of^o sleep come upon me. (for "disposition to")

TITANIA: Sleep thou, and I will wind thee in my arms.

—Fairies, be gone, and be always^o away. in every direction

[Exeunt FAIRIES.]

So^o doth the woodbine² the sweet honeysuckle Thus 40
Gently entwist; the female ivy so

8. Stop bowing, or do not stand bareheaded.

9. Blunder for "Cavalier," perhaps influenced by the Italian term cavaliere.

1. Triangle and clappers (rustic musical instruments).

2. Here, "woodbine" cannot mean "honeysuckle," as it did at 2.1.251, and thus must refer to a different plant.

Enrings the barky fingers of the elm.
—Oh, how I love thee, how I dote on thee!

[They sleep.]

Enter ROBIN Goodfellow.

OBERON [coming forward]: Welcome, good Robin. Seest thou this sweet sight?

- 45 Her dotage now I do begin to pity.
For, meeting her of late behind the wood
Seeking sweet favors^o for this hateful fool, love tokens
I did upbraid her and fall out with her.
For she his hairy temples then had rounded
50 With coronet of fresh and fragrant flowers,
And that same dew which sometime^o on the buds formerly
Was wont^o to swell like round and orient³ pearls accustomed
Stood now within the pretty flowerets' eyes
Like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.
55 When I had at my pleasure taunted her,
And she in mild terms begged my patience,
I then did ask of her her changeling child,
Which straight she gave me, and her fairy sent
To bear him to my bower in fairyland.
60 And now I have the boy, I will undo
This hateful imperfection of her eyes.
And, gentle puck, take this transformèd scalp
From off the head of this Athenian swain,
That he, awaking when the other^o do, others
65 May all to Athens back again repair
And think no more of this night's accidents
But as the fierce vexation of a dream.
But first I will release the Fairy Queen.

[He squeezes the juice on TITANIA's eyes.]

- Be as thou wast wont to be;
70 See as thou wast wont to see.
Dian's bud o'er Cupid's flower⁴
Hath such force and blessèd power.
Now, my Titania, wake you, my sweet queen.
TITANIA [awaking]: My Oberon, what visions have I seen!
75 Methought I was enamored of an ass.
OBERON: There lies your love.
TITANIA: How came these things to pass?
Oh, how mine eyes do loathe his visage now!

3. Lustrous (the best pearls were from the Far East).

4. "Dian's bud," the herb of 2.1.184 and 3.2.366, is perhaps Agnus castus, or chaste tree: said to preserve chastity and hence the antidote to "Cupid's flower," or the "love-in-idleness" of 2.1.168.

OBERON: Silence a while.—Robin, take off this head.

—Titania, music call, and strike more dead
Than common sleep of all these five⁵ the sense.

80

TITANIA: Music, ho—music such as charmeth sleep!

[Music plays.]

ROBIN [to BOTTOM, removing the ass head]: Now when thou wak'st with thine own fool's eyes peep.

OBERON: Sound, music! Come, my queen, take hands with me,
And rock the ground whereon these sleepers be.

[They dance.]

Now thou and I are new in amity
And will tomorrow midnight solemnly
Dance in Duke Theseus' house triumphantly
And bless it to all fair prosperity.
There shall the pairs of faithful lovers be Wedded, with Theseus, all in jollity.

85

ROBIN: Fairy King, attend and mark:

I do hear the morning lark.

OBERON: Then, my queen, in silence sad

Trip we after night's shade.

We the globe can compass^o soon,

Swifter than the wandering moon.

orbit 95

TITANIA: Come, my lord, and in our flight

Tell me how it came this night

That I sleeping here was found

With these mortals on the ground.

100

Exeunt [OBERON, TITANIA, and ROBIN].

Wind horn. Enter THESEUS [with HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS], and all his train.

THESEUS: Go, one of you, find out the forester,

For now our observation⁶ is performed.

And since we have the vanguard^o of the day,

earliest part

My love shall hear the music of my hounds.

Uncouple⁷ in the western valley; let them go.

105

Dispatch, I say, and find the forester.

[Exit an Attendant.]

—We will, fair Queen, up to the mountain's top

And mark the musical confusion

Of hounds and echo in conjunction.

5. The lovers and Bottom.

6. "Observance to a morn of May," as at 1.1.167.

7. Release (the dogs, leashed in pairs).

- 110 HIPPOLYTA: I was with Hercules and Cadmus⁸ once
 When in a wood of Crete they bayed^o the bear hunted
 With hounds of Sparta.⁹ Never did I hear
 Such gallant chiding;^o for besides the groves, barking
 The skies, the fountains, every region near 115 Seemed all one mutual cry. I never heard
 So musical a discord, such sweet thunder.
- THESEUS: My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,
 So flewed,¹ so sanded;^o and their heads are hung sandy-colored
 With ears that sweep away the morning dew;
 120 Crook-kneed, and dowlapped² like Thessalian bulls;
 Slow in pursuit, but matched in mouth like bells,
 Each under each.³ A cry more tunable⁴
 Was never holla'd to nor cheered with horn
 In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessaly.
 125 Judge when you hear. But soft,^o what nymphs are these? stop; look
- EGEUS: My lord, this is my daughter here asleep,
 And this Lysander, this Demetrius is,
 This Helena, old Nedar's Helena.
 I wonder of their being here together.
- 130 THESEUS: No doubt they rose up early to observe
 The rite of May and, hearing our intent,
 Came here in grace of our solemnity.^o ceremony
 But speak, Egeus: is not this the day
 That Hermia should give answer of her choice?
- 135 EGEUS: It is, my lord.
 THESEUS: Go bid the huntsmen wake them with their horns.
[Exit an Attendant.]
Shout within; wind horns; [the lovers] all start up.
 Good morrow, friends. Saint Valentine is past.
 Begin these woodbirds but to couple now?⁵
 LYSANDER: Pardon, my lord.
[The lovers kneel.]
 THESEUS: I pray you all, stand up.
[The lovers stand.]
 140 [to DEMETRIUS and LYSANDER] I know you two are rival enemies.
 How comes this gentle concord in the world,

8. Mythical founder of Thebes. (No source for the anecdote is known.)

9. Famous in antiquity as hunting dogs.

1. Flews were large hanging, fleshy chaps.

2. With hanging folds of skin under the neck (compare 2.1.50).

3. Harmoniously matched in the pitch of their barking, like a set of bells.

4. A pack of hounds more well tuned.

5. Birds were said to choose their mates on Valentine's Day.

That hatred is so far from jealousy^o suspicion
 To sleep by hate and fear no enmity?
 LYSANDER: My lord, I shall reply amazedly,^o confusedly
 Half sleep, half waking. But as yet, I swear, 145
 I cannot truly say how I came here.
 But as I think—for truly would I speak,
 And now I do bethink me, so it is—
 I came with Hermia hither. Our intent
 Was to be gone from Athens where we might 150
 Without^o the peril of the Athenian law— Outside EGEUS [to THESEUS]: Enough, enough, my lord; you have enough.
 I beg the law, the law upon his head!
 —They would have stolen away, they would, Demetrius,
 Thereby to have defeated^o you and me, defrauded 155
 You of your wife and me of my consent,
 Of my consent that she should be your wife.
 DEMETRIUS [to THESEUS]: My lord, fair Helen told me of their stealth,
 Of this their purpose hither to this wood,
 And I in fury hither followed them, 160
 Fair Helena in fancy^o following me. love
 But, my good lord, I wot not by what power—
 But by some power it is—my love to Hermia,
 Melted as the snow, seems to me now
 As the remembrance of an idle gaud^o a worthless trinket 165
 Which in my childhood I did dote upon;
 And all the faith, the virtue of my heart,
 The object and the pleasure of mine eye,
 Is only Helena. To her, my lord,
 Was I betrothed ere I saw Hermia, 170
 But like a sickness⁶ did I loathe this food;
 But, as in health come to my natural taste,
 Now I do wish it, love it, long for it,
 And will for evermore be true to it.
 THESEUS: Fair lovers, you are fortunately met. 175
 Of this discourse we more will hear anon.
 —Egeus, I will overbear your will;
 For in the temple, by and by, with us
 These couples shall eternally be knit.
 And, for^o the morning now is something^o worn, since / somewhat 180
 Our purposed hunting shall be set aside.
 Away with us to Athens. Three and three,
 We'll hold a feast in great solemnity.
 —Come, Hippolyta.

6. Only as a person does when ill or nauseated.

[*Exit THESEUS with HIPPOLYTA,
EGEUS, and his train.*]

185 DEMETRIUS: These things seem small and undistinguishable,
Like far-off mountains turned into clouds.

HERMIA: Methinks I see these things with parted eye,^o (double vision)
When everything seems double.

HELENA: So methinks;
And I have found Demetrius like a jewel,
Mine own and not mine own.

190 DEMETRIUS: Are you sure
That we are awake? It seems to me
That yet we sleep, we dream. Do not you think
The Duke was here and bid us follow him?

HERMIA: Yea, and my father.

HELENA: And Hippolyta.

195 LYSANDER: And he did bid us follow to the temple.

DEMETRIUS: Why, then, we are awake. Let's follow him,
And by the way let's recount our dreams.

[Exeunt lovers.]

BOTTOM [awaking]: When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer. My next is "Most fair Pyramus." Heigh-ho,^o (a call; perhaps a yawn) 200 Peter Quince? Flute the bellows-mender? Snout the tinker?
Starveling? God's my life!^o Stolen hence and left me asleep! I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream past the wit of man to say what dream it was. Man is but an ass if he go about^o to expound this dream. Methought 205 I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was—and methought I had—but man is but patched a fool⁷ if he will offer^o to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, 210 nor his heart to report⁸ what my dream was. I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream. It shall be called "Bottom's Dream," because it hath no bottom;⁹
and I will sing it in the latter end of a play, before the Duke. Peradventure,^o to make it the more gracious, I 215 shall sing it at her^o death. [Exit.] (try

7. Patchwork or motley costumes were worn by jesters.

8. Burlesque of scripture: "The eye hath not seen, and the ear hath not heard, neither have entered into the heart of man" those things that God has prepared (1 Cor. 2.9–10, Bishops' Bible).

9. Because it is unfathomable, or has no substance (foundation).

Scene 2

Athens. Enter QUINCE, FLUTE[, SNOUT, and STARVELING].

QUINCE: Have you sent to Bottom's house? Is he come home yet?

STARVELING: He cannot be heard of. Out of doubt^o he is transported.¹ Doubtless

FLUTE: If he come not, then the play is marred. It goes not forward, doth it? 5

QUINCE: It is not possible. You have not a man in all Athens able to discharge^o Pyramus but he. perform

FLUTE: No, he hath simply the best wit^o of any handicraft man in Athens. intellect 10

QUINCE: Yea, and the best person^o too; and he is a very paramour for a sweet voice. looks

FLUTE: You must say "paragon." A paramour is—God bless us—a thing of naught.^o something wicked

Enter SNUG the joiner.

SNUG: Masters, the Duke is coming from the temple, and there is two or three lords and ladies more married. If our sport^o had gone forward, we had all been made men.² entertainment 15

FLUTE: Oh, sweet bully Bottom! Thus hath he lost sixpence a day³ during his life; he could not have 'scaped sixpence a day. An^o the Duke had not given him sixpence a day for playing Pyramus, I'll be hanged. He would have deserved it. Sixpence a day in Pyramus, or nothing. If 20

Enter BOTTOM.

BOTTOM: Where are these lads? Where are these hearts?^o mates

QUINCE: Bottom! Oh, most courageous⁴ day! Oh, most happy hour! 25

BOTTOM: Masters, I am to discourse wonders; but ask me not what; for if I tell you, I am not true Athenian. I will tell you everything right as it fell out.

QUINCE: Let us hear, sweet Bottom.

BOTTOM: Not a word of^o me. All that I will tell you is that the Duke hath dined. Get your apparel together, good strings^o to your beards, new ribbons to your pumps. Meet presently^o at the palace; every man look o'er his part. For the short and the long is, our play is preferred.^o In any case, let Thisbe have clean linen; and let not him that plays the lion pare his nails, for they shall hang out for the lion's claws. And, most dear actors, eat no onions nor out of 30

ACT V

Scene 1

Athens. Theseus's palace. Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, PHILOSTRATE[, Lords, and Attendants].

HIPPOLYTA: 'Tis strange, my Theseus, that^o these lovers that which speak of.

THESEUS: More strange than true. I never may believe
These antique⁵ fables, nor these fairy toys.^o trifles

Lovers and madmen have such seething brains,
5 Such shaping fantasies,^o that apprehend^o more imaginations / conceive
Than cool reason ever comprehends.

The lunatic, the lover, and the poet
Are of imagination all compact.^o composed

10 One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
That is the madman. The lover, all as frantic,
Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.⁶
The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven.

And as imagination bodies forth
15 The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.

Such tricks hath strong imagination
That if it would but apprehend some joy,
20 It comprehends some bringer^o of that joy;
Or in the night, imagining some fear,^o source
How easy is a bush supposed a bear! object to be feared

HIPPOLYTA: But all the story of the night told over,
And all their minds transfigured so together,
25 More witnesseth than fancy's images⁷
And grows to something of great constancy;^o consistency
But, howsoever,^o strange and admirable.^o in any case / wondrous

Enter [the] lovers, LYSANDER, DEMETRIUS, HERMIA, and HELENA.

THESEUS: Here come the lovers, full of joy and mirth.
Joy, gentle friends, joy and fresh days of love
Accompany your hearts.

5. Ancient; strange, grotesque (as in "antic").

6. In a gypsy's face. Helen: Helen of Troy.

7. Testifies to something more than mere figments of the imagination.

LYSANDER:	More than to us	30
	Wait in your royal walks, your board, your bed. ⁸ THESEUS: Come now, what masques, what dances shall we have
	To wear away this long age of three hours
	Between our after-supper and bedtime?
	Where is our usual manager of mirth?	35
	What revels are in hand? Is there no play
	To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?
	Call Philostrate.
PHILOSTRATE:	Here, mighty Theseus.
THESEUS: Say, what abridgement ⁹ have you for this evening,
	What masque, what music? How shall we beguile	40
	The lazy time if not with some delight?
PHILOSTRATE [giving THESEUS a paper]:	There is a brief ^o	short list
	how many sports are ripe.
	Make choice of which your highness will see first.
THESEUS [reads]:	"The battle with the Centaurs, ¹ to be sung
	By an Athenian eunuch to the harp."	45
	We'll none of that. That have I told my love
	In glory of my kinsman Hercules. ²
	[Reads.] "The riot of the tipsy Bacchanals Tearing the Thracian singer in their rage." ³

	When I from Thebes came last a conqueror.
	[Reads.] "The thrice-three muses mourning for the

	[Reads.] "A tedious brief scene of young Pyramus
	And his love Thisbe; very tragical mirth."
	Merry and tragical? Tedious and brief?
	That is hot ice and wondrous strange snow!
	How shall we find the concord of this discord?	60
PHILOSTRATE: A play there is, my lord, some ten words long,
	Which is as brief as I have known a play,
	But by ten words, my lord, it is too long,
	Which makes it tedious. For in all the play

8. May even more joy and love attend your daily lives.

9. Pastime, something to make the evening seem shorter.

1. Probably the battle that occurred when the Centaurs tried to carry off the bride of Theseus's friend Pirithous.

2. According to Plutarch, Hercules and Theseus were cousins.

3. The murder of the poet Orpheus by drunken women, devotees of Dionysus.

4. Possibly a topical reference: Robert Greene, Christopher Marlowe, and Thomas Kyd, university wits who began writing for the stage in the 1580s, all died in desperate circumstances in 1592–94.

But satiric laments on the poverty of scholars and poets were commonplace.

- 65 There is not one word apt, one player fitted.^o appropriately cast
 And tragical, my noble lord, it is,
 For Pyramus therein doth kill himself,
 Which, when I saw rehearsed, I must confess,
 Made mine eyes water; but more merry tears
- 70 The passion of loud laughter never shed.
 THESEUS: What are they that do play it?
 PHILOSTRATE: Hard-handed men that work in Athens here,
 Which never labored in their minds till now,
 And now have toiled^o their unbreathed^o memories taxed / unexercised
 75 With this same play against^o your nuptial. in preparation for THESEUS: And we will hear it.
 PHILOSTRATE: No, my noble lord,
 It is not for you. I have heard it over,
 And it is nothing, nothing in the world;
 Unless you can find sport in their intents,
- 80 Extremely stretched^o and conned^o with cruel pain, strained / memorized
 To do you service.
 THESEUS: I will hear that play.
 For never anything can be amiss
 When simpleness and duty tender it.
 Go, bring them in; and take your places, ladies.
- [Exit PHILOSTRATE.]
- 85 HIPPOLYTA: I love not to see wretchedness o'ercharged,⁵
 And duty in his service^o perishing. its attempt to serve
 THESEUS: Why, gentle sweet, you shall see no such thing.
 HIPPOLYTA: He says they can do nothing in this kind.^o kind of thing
 THESEUS: The kinder we, to give them thanks for nothing.
- 90 Our sport shall be to take what they mistake.
 And what poor duty cannot do, noble respect^o consideration
 Takes it in might, not merit.⁶
 Where I have come, great clerks^o have purposed^d scholars
 To greet me with premeditated welcomes,
 95 Where I have seen them shiver and look pale,
 Make periods in the midst of sentences,
 Throttle their practiced accent⁷ in their fears,
 And in conclusion dumbly have broke off,
 Not paying me a welcome. Trust me, sweet,
- 100 Out of this silence yet I picked a welcome;
 And in the modesty of fearful^o duty frightened
 I read as much as from the rattling tongue
 Of saucy and audacious eloquence.

5. Overburdened. Wretchedness: incompetence or weakness; poor people.

6. With respect to the giver's capacity, not the merit of the performance.

7. Rehearsed eloquence; usual manner of speaking.

Love, therefore, and tongue-tied simplicity
In least speak most, to my capacity.^o

in my judgment 105

[Enter PHILOSTRATE.]

PHILOSTRATE: So please your grace, the Prologue is addressed.⁸

THESEUS: Let him approach.

Enter [QUINCE as] the Prologue.

QUINCE: [as Prologue] If we offend, it is with our good will.

That you should think, we come not to offend

But with good will. To show our simple skill,

110

That is the true beginning of our end.

Consider, then, we come but in despite.

We do not come as minding^o to content you,

intending

Our true intent is. All for your delight

We are not here. That you should here repent you 115

The actors are at hand; and by their show

You shall know all that you are like to know.⁹

THESEUS: This fellow doth not stand upon points.¹

LYSANDER: He hath rid his prologue like a rough^o colt: he an unbroken

knows not the stop.² A good moral, my lord: it is not enough to speak, but to speak true.

120

HIPPOLYTA: Indeed he hath played on this prologue like a child on a recorder: a sound, but not in government.^o

control

THESEUS: His speech was like a tangled chain: nothing^o

not at all

impaired, but all disordered. Who is next?

125

*Enter [BOTTOM as] Pyramus, and [FLUTE as] Thisbe, and [SNOUT as] Wall, and [STARVELING as] Moonshine,
and [SNUG as] Lion.*

QUINCE [as Prologue]: Gentles, perchance you wonder at this show,

But wonder on till truth make all things plain.

This man is Pyramus, if you would know;

This beauteous lady Thisbe is, certain.

This man with lime and roughcast doth present

130

Wall, that vile wall which did these lovers sunder;

And through Wall's chink, poor souls, they are content

To whisper—at the which let no man wonder.

This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorn

Presenteth Moonshine. For, if you will know,

135

By moonshine did these lovers think no scorn^o

(it) no disgrace

To meet at Ninus' tomb, there, there to woo.

8. The speaker of the Prologue is ready.

9. The humor of Quince's speech rests in its mispunctuation; repunctuated, it becomes a typical courteous address.

1. Bother about niceties; heed punctuation marks.

2. How to rein the colt to a stop; punctuation mark.

This grisly beast, which "Lion" high^o by name, is called
 The trusty Thisbe, coming first by night,
 140 Did scare away, or rather did affright;
 And as she fled, her mantle she did fall,^o drop
 Which Lion vile with bloody mouth did stain.
 Anon comes Pyramus, sweet youth and tall,^o handsome
 And finds his trusty Thisbe's mantle slain;
 145 Whereat with blade, with bloody, blameful blade,
 He bravely broached^o his boiling bloody breast; stabbed
 And Thisbe, tarrying in mulberry shade,
 His dagger drew and died. For all the rest
 Let Lion, Moonshine, Wall, and lovers twain
 150 At large^o discourse, while here they do remain. length

Exeunt [QUINCE as Prologue, SNUG as] Lion, [FLUTE as] Thisbe, and [STARVELING as] Moonshine.

THESEUS: I wonder if the lion be to speak.

DEMETRIUS: No wonder, my lord; one lion may when many asses do.

SNOUT [as Wall]: In this same interlude^o it doth befall play
 155 That I, one Snout by name, present a wall;
 And such a wall as I would have you think
 That had in it a crannied hole or chink
 Through which the lovers, Pyramus and Thisbe,
 Did whisper often very secretly.
 160 This loam, this roughcast, and this stone doth show
 That I am that same wall; the truth is so.
 And this the cranny is, right and sinister,³
 Through which the fearful lovers are to whisper.

THESEUS: Would you desire lime and hair to speak better?

165 DEMETRIUS: It is the wittiest partition⁴ that ever I heard discourse, my lord.

THESEUS: Pyramus draws near the wall: silence!

BOTTOM [as Pyramus] O grim-looking^o night, O night with grim-looking hue so black,
 O night, which ever art when day is not,
 170 O night, O night, alack, alack, alack,
 I fear my Thisbe's promise is forgot.
 And thou, O wall, O sweet, O lovely wall,
 That stand'st between her father's ground and mine,
 Thou wall, O wall, O sweet and lovely wall,
 175 Show me thy chink, to blink through with mine eyne.
 [SNOUT, as Wall, shows his chink.]

3. Left; running horizontally. Or on the one side (Pyramus's) and the other (Thisbe's).

4. Wall; formal term for part of an oration.

Thanks, courteous wall; Jove shield thee well for this.
 But what see I? No Thisbe do I see.
 O wicked wall, through whom I see no bliss,
 Cursed be thy stones⁵ for thus deceiving me!

THESEUS: The wall, methinks, being sensible,^o should curse again.^o capable of feeling 180 back

BOTTOM [to THESEUS]: No, in truth, sir, he should not.
 "Deceiving me" is Thisbe's cue. She is to enter now, and I am to spy her through the wall. You shall see it will fall pat^o as I told you. Yonder she comes. precisely 185

Enter [FLUTE as] Thisbe.

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: O wall, full often hast thou heard my moans

For parting my fair Pyramus and me.
 My cherry lips have often kissed thy stones,
 Thy stones with lime and hair knit up in thee.

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: I see a voice; now will I to the chink
 To spy an^o I can hear my Thisbe's face. 190 if Thisbe?

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: My love! Thou art my love, I think.

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Think what thou wilt, I am thy lover's grace,^o gracious lover

And like Limander⁶ am I trusty still.

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: And I like Helen,⁷ till the fates me kill. 195

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Not Shafalus to Procrus⁸ was so true.

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Oh, kiss me through the hole of this vile wall.

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: I kiss the wall's hole, not your lips at all.

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Wilt thou at Ninny's tomb meet me straightway? 200

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: Tide^o life, tide death, I come without delay. Betide; come

[Exeunt BOTTOM and FLUTE.]

SNOUT [as Wall]: Thus have I, Wall, my part discharged so;

And, being done, thus Wall away doth go. [Exit.]

THESEUS: Now is the mural^o down between the two neighbors. wall

DEMETRIUS: No remedy, my lord, when walls are so willful to^o hear without warning.⁹ 205 as to

HIPPOLYTA: This is the silliest stuff that ever I heard.

5. Punning, unintentionally, on "testicles."

6. Blunder for "Leander," who drowned while swimming across the Hellespont to meet his lover, Hero.

7. Helen of Troy was notoriously untrustworthy; a blunder for "Hero."

8. Blunder for "Cephalus" and "Procris." Procris was in fact seduced by her husband in disguise as another man; he later accidentally killed her.

9. Informing the parents. Hear: proverbially, "walls have ears."

THESEUS: The best in this kind are but shadows,¹ and the worst are no worse if imagination amend them.

210 HIPPOLYTA: It must be your imagination, then, and not theirs.

THESEUS: If we imagine no worse of them than they of themselves, they may pass for excellent men. Here come two noble beasts in, a man and a lion.

Enter [SNUG as] Lion and [STARVELING as] Moonshine [with a lantern, thornbush, and dog].

SNUG [as Lion]: You ladies, you whose gentle hearts do fear

215 The smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor,
May now, perchance, both quake and tremble here
When lion rough in wildest rage doth roar.

Then know that I as Snug the joiner am
A lion fell,² nor else no lion's dam.

220 For if I should as lion come in strife
Into this place, 'twere pity on my life.

THESEUS: A very gentle beast, and of a good conscience.

DEMETRIUS: The very best at a beast, my lord, that e'er I saw.

LYSANDER: This lion is a very fox³ for his valor.

225 THESEUS: True; and a goose⁴ for his discretion.

DEMETRIUS: Not so, my lord. For his valor cannot carry his discretion, and the fox carries the goose.

THESEUS: His discretion, I am sure, cannot carry his valor; for the goose carries not the fox. It is well. Leave it to his 230 discretion, and let us listen to the moon.

STARVELING [as Moonshine]: This lantern doth the hornèd^o moon present.

crescent

DEMETRIUS: He should have worn the horns on his head.⁵

THESEUS: He is no crescent,⁶ and his horns are invisible within the circumference.

235 STARVELING [as Moonshine]: This lantern doth the hornèd moon present;

Myself the man i'th' moon do seem to be.

THESEUS: This is the greatest error of all the rest: the man should be put into the lantern; how is it else the man i'th' moon?

240 DEMETRIUS: He dares not come there for^o the candle. For you see it is already in snuff.⁷

for fear of

HIPPOLYTA: I am weary of this moon; would he would change!

THESEUS: It appears by his small light of discretion that he is in the wane; but yet in courtesy, in all reason, we must 245 stay the time.

1. Mere likenesses without substance. Kind: profession (that is, actors).

2. Fierce; or skin (punning on the costume to which Snug reassuringly calls attention).

3. Symbolic of low cunning, rather than courage.

4. Symbolic of foolishness.

5. The symbol of a cuckold.

6. Waxing moon. Perhaps a joke about Starveling's thinness.

7. In need of snuffing; angry.

LYSANDER: Proceed, Moon.

STARVELING: All that I have to say is to tell you that the lantern is the moon, I the man i'th' moon, this thornbush my thornbush, and this dog my dog.

DEMETRIUS: Why, all these should be in the lantern, for all these are in the moon. But silence; here comes Thisbe. 250

Enter [FLUTE as] Thisbe.

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: This is old Ninny's tomb. Where is my love?

SNUG [as Lion]: Oh!

[Lion roars.]

[Thisbe runs off, dropping her mantle.]

DEMETRIUS: Well roared, Lion!

THESEUS: Well run, Thisbe! 255

HIPPOLYTA: Well shone, Moon! Truly, the moon shines with a good grace.

[Lion worries° Thisbe's mantle.] gnaws on

THESEUS: Well moused,⁸ Lion!

Enter [BOTTOM as] Pyramus.

DEMETRIUS: And then came Pyramus. [Exit SNUG as Lion.]

LYSANDER: And so the lion vanished. 260

BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Sweet moon, I thank thee for thy sunny beams;

I thank thee, moon, for shining now so bright.

For by thy gracious, golden, glittering gleams

I trust to take of truest Thisbe sight.

But stay, oh, spite! 265

But mark, poor knight,

What dreadful dole° is here? grief

Eyes, do you see?

How can it be?

O dainty duck! O dear! 270

Thy mantle good,

What, stained with blood?

Approach, ye Furies fell!

O Fates,⁹ come, come,

Cut thread and thrum,¹ 275

Quail,° crush, conclude, and quell!° Overpower / kill

THESEUS: This passion, and² the death of a dear friend, would go near to make a man look sad.

HIPPOLYTA: Beshrew my heart, but I pity the man.

8. The mantle is like a mouse in the mouth of a cat.

9. The three Fates in Greek mythology spun and cut the thread of a person's life.

1. Technical term from Bottom's occupation: the tufted end of a weaver's warp, or set of yarns placed lengthwise in a loom when the woven fabric is cut.

2. Only if combined with. Passion: suffering; extravagant speech.

280 BOTTOM [as Pyramus]: Oh, wherefore, Nature, didst thou lions frame,

Since lion vile hath here deflowered³ my dear?
Which is—no, no, which was—the fairest dame
That lived, that loved, that liked, that looked with cheer.
Come, tears, confound!

285 Out, sword, and wound
The pap^o of Pyramus,
Ay, that left pap,
Where heart doth hop.

breast

[He stabs himself.]

Thus die I, thus, thus, thus.

290 Now am I dead;
Now am I fled.
My soul is in the sky.
Tongue, lose thy light;
Moon, take thy flight. [Exit STARVELING as Moonshine.]
295 Now die, die, die, die, die.

[Pyramus dies.]

DEMETRIUS: No die, but an ace for him; for he is but one.⁴

LYSANDER: Less than an ace, man; for he is dead, he is nothing.

THESEUS: With the help of a surgeon he might yet recover, and yet prove an ass.

300 HIPPOLYTA: How chance Moonshine is gone before Thisbe comes back and finds her lover?

THESEUS: She will find him by starlight.

[Enter FLUTE as Thisbe.]

Here she comes, and her passion^o ends the play.

passionate speech

HIPPOLYTA: Methinks she should not use a long one for such a 305 Pyramus; I hope she will be brief.

DEMETRIUS: A mote^o will turn the balance which Pyramus, which⁵ Thisbe, is the better: he for a man, God warrant us; she for a woman, God bless us.

speck

LYSANDER: She hath spied him already with those sweet eyes.

310 DEMETRIUS: And thus she means, videlicet:⁶

FLUTE [as Thisbe]: Asleep, my love?

What, dead, my dove?

O Pyramus, arise!

Speak, speak! Quite dumb?

315 Dead, dead? A tomb

Must cover thy sweet eyes.

3. Ruined (but commonly suggesting “deprived of her virginity”); his error for “devoured.”

4. Pun on “die” as one of a pair of dice. One: the ace, or lowest throw.

5. Whether . . . or.

6. As follows (Latin). Means: moans; lodges a formal legal complaint.

These lily lips,
 This cherry nose,
 These yellow cowslip cheeks
 Are gone, are gone. 320

Lovers, make moan.
 His eyes were green as leeks.
 O sisters three,^o (the Fates)
 Come, come to me
 With hands as pale as milk; 325

Lay them in gore,
 Since you have shore^o shorn
 With shears his thread of silk.
 Tongue, not a word!
 Come, trusty sword, 330
 Come, blade, my breast imbrue.^o stain with blood

[She stabs herself.]

And farewell, friends,
 Thus Thisbe ends.
 Adieu, adieu, adieu.

[Thisbe dies.]

THESEUS: Moonshine and Lion are left to bury the dead. 335

DEMETRIUS: Ay, and Wall too.

BOTTOM [starting up]: No, I assure you, the wall is down that parted their fathers. [FLUTE rises.] Will it please you to see the epilogue or to hear a Bergomask dance⁷ between two of our company? 340

THESEUS: No epilogue, I pray you; for your play needs no excuse.
 Never excuse; for when the players are all dead, there need none to be blamed. Marry, if he that writ it had played Pyramus and hanged himself in Thisbe's garter, it would have been a fine tragedy; and so it is, truly, and very notably 345 discharged. But come, your Bergomask; let your epilogue alone. [BOTTOM and FLUTE⁸ dance; then exeunt.]

The iron tongue of midnight hath told^o twelve. counted; tolled
 Lovers, to bed; 'tis almost fairy time.

I fear we shall outsleep the coming morn 350

As much as we this night have overwatched.^o stayed awake too late

This palpable-gross^o play hath well beguiled palpably crude

The heavy^o gait of night. Sweet friends, to bed. drowsy; slow

A fortnight hold we this solemnity

In nightly revels and new jollity. Exeunt. 355

7. Dance named after Bergamo, in Italy (commonly ridiculed for its rusticity).

8. The only "two of our company" onstage at the end of the interlude. The role of Bottom may have been first performed by the actor Will Kemp, who was famous for his dancing.

Enter [ROBIN Goodfellow, the] puck[, with a broom].

ROBIN: Now the hungry lion roars,
And the wolf behowls the moon,
Whilst the heavy^o plowman snores,
All with weary task fordone.^o weary

"done in"; exhausted
burned-out logs

360 Now the wasted brands^o do glow,
Whilst the screech-owl, screeching loud,
Puts the wretch that lies in woe
In remembrance of a shroud.

Now it is the time of night
365 That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite⁹
In the churchway paths to glide;

And we fairies that do run
By the triple Hecate's¹ team

Following darkness like a dream,
Now are frolic.^o Not a mouse
Shall disturb this hallowed house.

I am sent with broom² before 375 To sweep the dust behind^o the door.

from behind

Enter [OBERON and TITANIA,] King and Queen of Fairies, with all their train.

OBERON: Through the house give glimmering light
By the dead and drowsy fire;
Every elf and fairy sprite
Hop as light as bird from briar;
380 And this ditty after me
Sing, and dance it trippingly.

TITANIA: First rehearse your song by rote,
To each word a warbling note.
Hand in hand with fairy grace
385 Will we sing and bless this place.

[The FAIRIES dance to a song.]

OBERON: Now until the break of day
Through this house each fairy stray.
To the best bride-bed will we,³
Which by us shall blessed be;
390 And the issue there create^o
Ever shall be fortunate.
So shall all the couples three created; conceived

9. Each grave lets forth its ghost.

1. Hecate was goddess of the moon and night, and she had three realms: heaven (as Cynthia), earth (as Diana), and hell (as Proserpine).

2. One of his traditional emblems; he helped good housekeepers and punished lazy ones.

3. Oberon and Titania will bless the bed of Theseus and Hippolyta.

Ever true in loving be.
 And the blots of nature's hand
 Shall not in their issue stand; 395
 Never mole, harelip, nor scar,
 Nor mark prodigious,^o such as are ominous birthmark
 Despisèd in nativity,
 Shall upon their children be.
 With this field-dew consecrate⁴ 400
 Every fairy take his gait,^o way
 And each several^o chamber bless separate
 Through this palace with sweet peace;
 And the owner of it blessed
 Ever shall in safety rest. 405
 Trip away, make no stay;
 Meet me all by break of day. Exeunt [all but ROBIN].
 ROBIN [to the audience]: If we shadows have offended,
 Think but this, and all is mended,
 That you have but slumbered here 410
 While these visions did appear.
 And this weak and idle theme,
 No more yielding but^o a dream, than
 Gentles, do not reprehend;
 If you pardon, we will mend. 415
 And as I am an honest puck,
 If we have unearnèd luck
 Now to 'scape the serpent's tongue,⁵
 We will make amends ere long;
 Else the puck a liar call. 420
 So, good night unto you all.
 Give me your hands,^o if we be friends,
 And Robin shall restore amends. [Exit.] applause

4. Consecrated, blessed. Playfully alludes to the traditional Catholic custom of blessing the marriage bed with holy water.

5. Hissing from the audience.

ACT I

Scene 1

A guard station atop the castle. Enter BERNARDO and FRANCISCO, two sentinels.

BERNARDO: Who's there?
FRANCISCO: Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold^o yourself. identify BERNARDO: Long live the king!
FRANCISCO: Bernardo?
5 BERNARDO: He.
FRANCISCO: You come most carefully^o upon your hour. dutifully; cautiously
BERNARDO: 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.
FRANCISCO: For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold,
And I am sick at heart.
BERNARDO: Have you had quiet guard?
10 FRANCISCO: Not a mouse stirring.
BERNARDO: Well, good night.
If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,
The rivals^o of my watch, bid them make haste. partners
[Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]
FRANCISCO: I think I hear them. Stand, ho! Who is there?
HORATIO: Friends to this ground.^o country
15 MARCELLUS: And liegemen^o to the Dane.² sworn servants

1. Glosses and notes are loosely based on those in The Norton Shakespeare, 3rd ed., edited by Stephen Greenblatt.
2. The king of Denmark, who is also called "Denmark" (as in line 48). In line 61 a similar reference is used for the king of Norway.

FRANCISCO: Give^o you good night. God give or grant
 MARCELLUS: O, farewell, honest soldier!
 Who hath relieved you?
 FRANCISCO: Bernardo hath my place.
 Give you good night. [Exit FRANCISCO.]
 MARCELLUS: Holla, Bernardo!
 BERNARDO: Say—
 What, is Horatio there?
 HORATIO: A piece of him.
 BERNARDO: Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus. 20
 HORATIO: What, has this thing appeared again tonight?
 BERNARDO: I have seen nothing.
 MARCELLUS: Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,
 And will not let belief take hold of him
 Touching^o this dreaded sight twice seen of us. Concerning 25
 Therefore I have entreated him along
 With us to watch the minutes of this night,
 That if again this apparition come,
 He may approve^o our eyes and speak to it. confirm the testimony of HORATIO: Tush, tush, 'twill not appear.
 BERNARDO: Sit down awhile, 30
 And let us once again assail your ears,
 That are so fortified against our story,
 What we have two nights seen.
 HORATIO: Well, sit we down.
 And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.
 BERNARDO: Last night of all,^o Just last night 35
 When yond same star that's westward from the pole^o
 Had made his^o course t' illumine that part of heaven polestar
 Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself, its
 The bell then beating one—
 [Enter GHOST.]
 MARCELLUS: Peace, break thee off. Look where it comes again. 40
 BERNARDO: In the same figure like the king that's dead.
 MARCELLUS: Thou art a scholar; speak to it, Horatio.
 BERNARDO: Looks 'a^o not like the king? Mark it, Horatio. he HORATIO: Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.
 BERNARDO: It would^o be spoke to. wishes to
 MARCELLUS: Speak to it, Horatio. 45
 HORATIO: What art thou that usurp'st³ this time of night
 Together with that fair and warlike form
 In which the majesty of buried Denmark
 Did sometimes march? By heaven I charge thee, speak.
 MARCELLUS: It is offended.
 BERNARDO: See, it stalks away. 50
 HORATIO: Stay. Speak, speak. I charge thee, speak. [Exit GHOST.]

3. Wrongfully seizes (both the night and the king's shape).

MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone and will not answer.

BERNARDO: How now, Horatio! You tremble and look pale.

Is not this something more than fantasy?

55 What think you on't?

HORATIO: Before my God, I might not this believe

Without the sensible^o and true avouch^o sensory / testimony

Of mine own eyes.

MARCELLUS: It is not like the king?

HORATIO: As thou art to thyself.

60 Such was the very armor he had on

When he the ambitious Norway combated.

So frowned he once when, in an angry parle,^o

parley; encounter

He smote the sledded Polacks⁴ on the ice.

'Tis strange.

65 MARCELLUS: Thus twice before, and jump^o at this dead hour, precisely

With martial stalk^o hath he gone by our watch.

walk; gait

HORATIO: In what particular thought to work^o I know not,

theory to follow

But in the gross and scope of mine opinion,⁵

This bodes some strange eruption^o to our state.

calamity

70 MARCELLUS: Good now,⁶ sit down, and tell me he that knows,

Why this same strict and most observant watch

So nightly toils the subject of the land,⁷

And why such daily cast of brazen cannon

And foreign mart^o for implements of war;

trade

75 Why such impress^o of shipwrights, whose sore task

impressment; drafting

Does not divide the Sunday from the week.

What might be toward^o that this sweaty haste impending

Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?

Who is't that can inform me?

HORATIO: That can I.

80 At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king,

Whose image even but now appeared to us,

Was as you know by Fortinbras of Norway,

Thereto pricked^o on by a most emulate^o pride,

spurred / rivalrous

Dared to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet

85 (For so this side of our known world esteemed him)

Did slay this Fortinbras; who by a sealed compact⁸

Well ratified by law^o and heraldry,^o

civil law / the law of arms

Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands

Which he stood seized^o of, to the conqueror;

possessed

90 Against the which a moiety^o competent^o portion / equal

Was gagèd^o by our king; which had^o returned staked / would have

To the inheritance^o of Fortinbras, ownership

Had he been vanquisher; as, by the same covenant

And carriage of the article designed,⁹

4. Poles traveling by sled. 5. But in my general opinion. 6. Good sir, now: an entreaty.

7. Requires the country's subjects to toil every night. 8. Contract to which each set his seal.

9. And execution of the contract's provisions.

His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras,	95
Of unimprovèd ^o mettle hot and full,	untested; untrained
Hath in the skirts ^o of Norway here and there	outskirts
Sharked up a list ¹ of lawless resolute
For food and diet to some enterprise ²
That hath a stomach ³ in't; which is no other,	100
As it doth well ^o appear unto our state,	obviously
But to recover of us by strong hand ⁴
And terms compulsory, those foresaid lands
So by his father lost; and this, I take it,
Is the main motive of our preparations,	105
The source of this our watch, and the chief head ^o	source
Of this post-haste ^o and romage ^o in the land.	feverish activity / commotion
BERNARDO: I think it be no other but e'en so.
Well may it sort ^o that this portentous figure	chance
Comes armèd through our watch so like the king	110
That was and is the question ^o of these wars.	cause
HORATIO: A mote ^o it is to trouble the mind's eye.	speck of dust
In the most high and palmy ^o state of Rome,	flourishing
A little ere the mightiest Julius ⁵ fell,
The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted ^o dead	shrouded 115
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets;
As stars with trains of fire, and dews of blood,
Disasters in the sun; and the moist star, ⁶
Upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands,
Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse. ⁷	120
And even the like precurse ^o of feared events,	precursor; forerunner
As harbingers preceding still ^o the fates	always
And prologue to the omen ^o coming on,	disastrous event
Have heaven and earth together demonstrated
Unto our climatures ^o and countrymen.	regions 125
[Enter GHOST.]
But soft, ^o behold, lo where it comes again!	hush
I'll cross it ⁸ though it blast me.—Stay, illusion.
[It spreads (its) arms.]
If thou hast any sound or use of voice,
Speak to me.
If there be any good thing to be done,	130
That may to thee do ease, and grace to me,
Speak to me.

1. Indiscriminately gathered together a band ("list"), as a shark takes prey. 2. The men will "feed" his enterprise and be fed in return for their service. 3. Courageous action; challenge to the pride (of both the prince and his men). 4. Main force (punning on the name "Fortinbras," literally "strong arm"). 5. Julius Caesar, Roman consul assassinated in 44 BCE. 6. The moon, which controls the tides of the sea ("Neptune's empire," line 119). Disasters: malevolent influences (astrological term). 7. Solar and lunar eclipses would accompany Christ's return to earth on Judgment Day (see Rev. 6.12). 8. Move across the ghost's path, confront; also, make the sign of the cross (to counter its evil influence).

- If thou art privy to thy country's fate,
 Which happily[°] foreknowing may avoid, perhaps; fortunately 135 O, speak!
 Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
 Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,
 For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,
 [The cock crows.]
 Speak of it. Stay, and speak. Stop it, Marcellus.
 140 MARCELLUS: Shall I strike at it with my partisan?[°] halberd
 HORATIO: Do, if it will not stand.
 BERNARDO: 'Tis here.
 HORATIO: 'Tis here.
 MARCELLUS: 'Tis gone. [Exit GHOST.]
 We do it wrong, being so majesticall,
 To offer it the show of violence;
 145 For it is as the air, invulnerable,
 And our vain blows malicious mockery.
 BERNARDO: It was about to speak when the cock crew.
 HORATIO: And then it started like a guilty thing
 Upon a fearful summons. I have heard
 150 The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn,
 Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat
 Awake the god of day,⁹ and at his warning,
 Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
 Th' extravagant and erring[°] spirit hies[°] wandering / hurries
 155 To his confine[°]; and of the truth herein enclosure; proper place
 This present object[°] made probation.[°] example / proof
 MARCELLUS: It faded on the crowing of the cock.
 Some say that ever 'gainst[°] that season comes always when
 Wherein our Savior's birth is celebrated,
 160 This bird of dawning singeth all night long,
 And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad,
 The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,¹
 No fairy takes,[°] nor witch hath power to charm, bewitches
 So hallowed and so gracious[°] is that time. full of God's grace
 165 HORATIO: So have I heard and do in part believe it.
 But look, the morn in russet mantle clad
 Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastward hill.
 Break we our watch up, and by my advice
 Let us impart what we have seen tonight
 170 Unto young Hamlet, for upon my life
 This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.
 Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,

9. Phoebus Apollo, the sun god in classical mythology. 1. Heavenly bodies were thought to exercise a negative influence on earthly events when in certain unfavorable astrological positions.

As needful in our loves,² fitting our duty?

MARCELLUS: Let's do't, I pray, and I this morning know

Where we shall find him most conveniently. [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A chamber of state. Enter KING CLAUDIUS, QUEEN GERTRUDE, HAMLET, POLONIUS, LAERTES, VOLTEMAND, CORNELIUS and other members of the court.

KING: Though yet of Hamlet our³ dear brother's death
 The memory be green, and that it us befitted
 To bear our hearts in grief, and our whole kingdom
 To be contracted in one brow of woe,
 Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature⁴
 That we with wisest sorrow think on him,
 Together with remembrance of ourselves.⁴
 Therefore our sometime⁵ sister, now our queen,
 Th' imperial jointress⁵ to this warlike state,
 Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy,
 With an auspicious and a dropping eye,⁶
 With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
 In equal scale weighing delight and dole,⁶
 Taken to wife; nor have we herein barred⁶
 Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone
 With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
 Now follows that you know⁶ young Fortinbras,
 Holding a weak supposal⁶ of our worth,
 Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
 Our state to be disjoint⁶ and out of frame,⁶
 Colleague⁶ with this dream of his advantage,
 He hath not failed to pester us with message
 Importing⁶ the surrender of those lands
 Lost by his father, with all bonds of law,
 To our most valiant brother. So much for him.
 Now for ourself, and for this time of meeting,
 Thus much the business is: we have here writ
 To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
 Who, impotent and bedrid, scarcely hears
 Of this his nephew's purpose—to suppress
 His further gait⁶ herein, in that the levies,
 The lists, and full proportions are all made

2. As necessary because of the love we have for him.

3. My. The king uses the traditional royal "we," though he may also speak here of all Danes.

4. Recalls the proverbial expression "He is not wise that is not wise for himself." 5. Widow who holds a jointure or life interest in the estate of her deceased husband; also, joint possessor (with her new husband, Claudius). 6. One eye ("auspicious") looking hopefully, the other downcast, or "drooping" tears.

- Out of his subject;^o and we here dispatch
 You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltemand,
 35 For bearers of this greeting to old Norway,
 Giving to you no further personal power
 To business^o with the king, more than the scope
 Of these dilated^o articles allow.
 Farewell, and let your haste commend^o your duty.^o
- 40 CORNELIUS: } In that, and all things will we show our duty.
 VOLTEMAND: }
- KING: We doubt it nothing,^o heartily farewell.
 [Exeunt VOLTEMAND and CORNELIUS.]
- And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?
 You told us of some suit.^o What is't, Laertes?
 You cannot speak of reason to the Dane
 45 And lose your voice. What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,
 That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?⁷
 The head is not more native^o to the heart,
 The hand more instrumental^o to the mouth,
 Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.
 What wouldst thou have, Laertes?
- 50 LAERTES: My dread^o lord,
 Your leave^o and favor^o to return to France,
 From whence, though willingly, I came to Denmark
 To show my duty in your coronation,
 Yet now I must confess, that duty done,
 55 My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France,
 And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.
- KING: Have you your father's leave? What says Polonius?
 POLONIUS: He hath, my lord, wrung from me my slow leave
 By laborsome petition, and at last
 60 Upon his will^o I sealed my hard^o consent.
 I do beseech you give him leave to go.
- KING: Take thy fair hour,⁸ Laertes. Time be thine,
 And thy best graces spend it at thy will.⁹
 But now, my cousin¹ Hamlet, and my son—
- 65 HAMLET: [Aside.] A little more than kin, and less than kind.²
 KING: How is it that the clouds still hang on you?
 HAMLET: Not so, my lord. I am too much in the sun.³
 QUEEN: Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color⁴ off,
 And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.^o
 70 Do not for ever with thy vailèd lids^o
 Seek for thy noble father in the dust.

7. That I would not offer before you asked. 8. Opportune moment (while you are young). 9. And you should use time ("it") as your best qualities dictate. 1. "Cousin" is used here as a general term of kinship. 2. Play on the proverbial expression "The nearer in kin the less in kindness." 3. Sunshine of the king's favor; also, punning on "son." 4. Black mourning clothes and melancholic demeanor.

	Thou know'st 'tis common—all that lives must die, Passing through nature to eternity.
HAMLET:	Ay, madam, it is common. ^o	commonplace; crude
QUEEN:	If it be, Why seems it so particular ^o with thee?	personal 75
HAMLET:	Seems, madam? Nay, it is. I know not "seems." 'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother, Nor customary suits of solemn black, Nor windy suspiration ^o of forced breath, No, nor the fruitful river in the eye, Nor the dejected havior ^o of the visage, Together with all forms, moods, shapes of grief, That can denote me truly. These indeed seem, For they are actions that a man might play, But I have that within which passes show— These but the trappings and the suits of woe.	sigh 80 expression 85
KING:	'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet, To give these mourning duties to your father, But you must know your father lost a father, That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound In filial obligation for some term To do obsequious ⁵ sorrow. But to persevere In obstinate condolement ^o is a course Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief. It shows a will most incorrect to ^o heaven, A heart unfortified, a mind impatient, An understanding simple ^o and unschooled. For what we know must be, and is as common As any the most vulgar thing to sense, ⁶ Why should we in our peevish opposition Take it to heart? Fie, 'tis a fault to heaven, A fault against the dead, a fault to nature, To reason most absurd, whose common theme Is death of fathers, and who still ^o hath cried, From the first corse ^o till he that died today, "This must be so." We pray you throw to earth This unprevailing ^o woe, and think of us As of a father, for let the world take note You are the most immediate ^o to our throne, And with no less nobility ^o of love Than that which dearest father bears his son Do I impart toward you. For your intent In going back to school in Wittenberg, ⁷ It is most retrograde ^o to our desire,	lamenting 90 unsubmissive toward 95 childish 100 always corpse 105 unavailing next in succession purity; generosity 110 contrary

5. Suitable for funeral obsequies or ceremonies. 6. As the most obvious and ordinary thing perceived by our senses. 7. University of both Martin Luther (1483–1546), the father of Protestantism, and the legendary Faustus or Doctor Faust; many Danes attended there.

- 115 And we beseech you, bend you^o to remain agree
 Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
 Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.
 QUEEN: Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet.
 I pray thee stay with us, go not to Wittenberg.
- 120 HAMLET: I shall in all my best obey you, madam.
 KING: Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply.
 Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come.
 This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet
 Sits smiling to^o my heart, in grace^o whereof, Pleases / honor
 125 No jocund health^o that Denmark drinks today toast
 But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,^o sound
 And the king's rouse^o the heaven shall bruit^o again, bout of drinking / echo
 Respeaking earthly thunder. Come away.
[Flourish. Exeunt all but HAMLET.]
- HAMLET: O, that this too too solid flesh would melt, 130 Thaw, and resolve^o itself into a dew, dissolve
 Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
 His canon^o 'gainst self-slaughter. O God, God, law
 How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
 Seem to me all the uses^o of this world! customs; business
- 135 Fie on't, ah, fie, 'tis an unweeded garden
 That grows to seed. Things rank and gross in nature Possess it merely.^o That it should come to this, entirely
 But two months dead, nay, not so much, not two.
 So excellent a king, that was to this 140 Hyperion to a satyr,⁸ so loving to my mother,
 That he might not beteem^o the winds of heaven permit
 Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth,
 Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
 As if increase of appetite had grown
- 145 By what it fed on, and yet, within a month—
 Let me not think on't. Frailty, thy name is woman—
 A little month, or ere those shoes were old
 With which she followed my poor father's body
 Like Niobe,⁹ all tears, why she, even she—
- 150 O God, a beast that wants discourse^o of reason lacks the faculty
 Would have mourned longer—married with my uncle,
 My father's brother, but no more like my father
 Than I to Hercules.¹ Within a month,
 Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
- 155 Had left the flushing in her gallèd^o eyes, irritated
 She married. O, most wicked speed, to post^o hurry

8. Hyperion, a Greek sun god, stands here for beauty and greatness in contrast to the monstrous satyr, a lecherous creature, half man and half goat.

9. In Greek mythology, Niobe was turned to stone after a tremendous fit of weeping over the death of her fourteen children, a punishment for her boasting about them.

1. Demigod of classical myth, renowned for his strength, as demonstrated in a series of spectacular labors.

With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
But break my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

[Enter HORATIO, MARCELLUS, and BERNARDO.]

HORATIO: Hail to your lordship!

HAMLET: I am glad to see you well. 160
Horatio—or I do forget myself.

HORATIO: The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.

HAMLET: Sir, my good friend, I'll change^o that name with you. exchange
And what make you from² Wittenberg, Horatio?
Marcellus? 165

MARCELLUS: My good lord!

HAMLET: I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.] Good even, sir.—

But what, in faith, make you from Wittenberg?

HORATIO: A truant disposition, good my lord.

HAMLET: I would not hear your enemy say so, 170
Nor shall you do my ear that violence
To make it truster^o of your own report believer
Against yourself. I know you are no truant.
But what is your affair in Elsinore?

We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart. 175

HORATIO: My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.

HAMLET: I prithee^o do not mock me, fellow-student, pray thee
I think it was to see my mother's wedding.

HORATIO: Indeed, my lord, it followed hard upon.^o quickly thereafter

HAMLET: Thrift, thrift, Horatio. The funeral-baked meats 180
Did coldly^o furnish forth the marriage tables. when cold
Would I had met my dearest^o foe in heaven bitterest
Or ever^o I had seen that day, Horatio! Before
My father—methinks I see my father.

HORATIO: Where, my lord?

HAMLET: In my mind's eye, Horatio. 185

HORATIO: I saw him once, 'a^o was a goodly king. he

HAMLET: 'A was a man, take him for all in all,

I shall not look upon his like again.

HORATIO: My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.

HAMLET: Saw who? 190

HORATIO: My lord, the king your father.

HAMLET: The king my father?

HORATIO: Season^o your admiration^o for a while Moderate / amazement
With an attent^o ear till I may deliver^o attentive / relate
Upon the witness of these gentlemen

This marvel to you.

HAMLET: For God's love, let me hear! 195

- HORATIO: Two nights together had these gentlemen,
 Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch
 In the dead waste and middle of the night
 Been thus encountered. A figure like your father, 200 Armèd at point^o exactly, cap-a-pe,^o in readiness / head to toe
 Appears before them, and with solemn march
 Goes slow and stately by them. Thrice he walked
 By their oppressed and fear-surprisèd eyes
 Within his truncheon's^o length, whilst they, distilled officer's baton's
 205 Almost to jelly with the act^o of fear, effect
 Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me
 In dreadful secrecy impart they did,
 And I with them the third night kept the watch,
 Where, as they had delivered,^o both in time, reported
 210 Form of the thing, each word made true and good,
 The apparition comes. I knew your father.
 These hands are not more like.^o alike
- HAMLET: But where was this?
- MARCELLUS: My lord, upon the platform where we watch.
- HAMLET: Did you not speak to it?
- HORATIO: My lord, I did,
 215 But answer made it none. Yet once methought
 It lifted up it^o head and did address its Itself to motion,^o like as it would^o speak; start to move / as if it wanted to
 But even^o then the morning cock crew loud, just
 And at the sound it shrunk in haste away
 And vanished from our sight.
- 220 HAMLET: 'Tis very strange.
- HORATIO: As I do live, my honored lord, 'tis true,
 And we did think it writ down^o in our duty prescribed
 To let you know of it.
- HAMLET: Indeed, sirs, but
 This troubles me. Hold you the watch tonight?
- ALL: We do, my lord.
- HAMLET: Armed, say you?
- 225 ALL: Armed, my lord.
- HAMLET: From top to toe?
- ALL: My lord, from head to foot.
- HAMLET: Then saw you not his face.
- HORATIO: O yes, my lord, he wore his beaver^o up. helmet face guard
- HAMLET: What, looked he frowningly?
- 230 HORATIO: A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.
- HAMLET: Pale or red?
- HORATIO: Nay, very pale.
- HAMLET: And fixed his eyes upon you?
- HORATIO: Most constantly.
- HAMLET: I would I had been there.
- HORATIO: It would have much amazed you.

HAMLET: Very like.
 Stayed it long? 235

HORATIO: While one with moderate haste might tell^o a count hundred.

BOTH: Longer, longer.

HORATIO: Not when I saw't.

HAMLET: His beard was grizzled,^o no? gray

HORATIO: It was as I have seen it in his life,
 A sable silvered.

HAMLET: I will watch tonight. 240
 Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORATIO: I warr'nt^o it will. warrant; guarantee

HAMLET: If it assume my noble father's person,
 I'll speak to it though hell itself should gape
 And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,
 If you have hitherto concealed this sight, 245
 Let it be tenable^o in your silence still, held
 And whatsoever else shall hap^o tonight, happen; occur
 Give it an understanding but no tongue.
 I will requite your loves. So fare you well.
 Upon the platform 'twixt eleven and twelve 250
 I'll visit you.

ALL: Our duty to your honor.

HAMLET: Your loves, as mine to you. Farewell.
 [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]
 My father's spirit in arms? All is not well.
 I doubt^o some foul play. Would the night were come! suspect
 Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise, 255
 Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.
 [Exit.]

Scene 3

The dwelling of POLONIUS. Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA.

LAERTES: My necessities are embarked.^o Farewell. aboard ship
 And, sister, as the winds give benefit
 And convoy^o is assistant,^o do not sleep, transportation / available
 But let me hear from you.

OPHELIA: Do you doubt that?

LAERTES: For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor, 5
 Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,
 A violet in the youth of primy nature,³
 Forward,^o not permanent, sweet, not lasting, Early blooming
 The perfume and suppliance^o of a minute, diversion
 No more.

3. A flower of his natural impulses in their prime.

	OPHELIA:	No more but so?
10	LAERTES:	Think it no more.
		For nature crescent° does not grow alone	growing
		In thews° and bulk, but as this temple° waxes	muscles / body
		The inward service° of the mind and soul	responsibility
		Grows wide withal.° Perhaps he loves you now,	along with it
15		And now no soil° nor cautel° doth besmirch	stain / deception
		The virtue of his will,° but you must fear,	intentions
		His greatness weighted,° his will is not his own,	rank considered
		For he himself is subject to his birth.
		He may not, as unvalued° persons do,	common
20		Carve for himself, for on his choice depends
		The safety and health of this whole state,
		And therefore must his choice be circumscribed
		Unto the voice° and yielding° of that body°	assent / consent / state
		Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
25		It fits° your wisdom so far to believe it	befits
		As he in his particular act° and place°	power of action / social position
		May give his saying deed, ⁴ which is no further
		Than the main° voice of Denmark goes withal.	collective
		Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain
30		If with too credent° ear you list° his songs,	trusting / listen to
		Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
		To his unmastered° importunity.	uncontrolled
		Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
		And keep you in the rear of your affection, ⁵
35		Out of the shot and danger of desire.
		The chariest° maid is prodigal° enough	most circumspect / risk-taking
		If she unmask her beauty to the moon.
		Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes.
		The canker galls the infants° of the spring
40		Too oft before their buttons° be disclosed,°	buds / opened
		And in the morn and liquid dew of youth
		Contagious blastments° are most imminent.	blights
		Be wary then; best safety lies in fear.
		Youth to itself rebels, though none else near. ⁷
45	OPHELIA:	I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
		As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
		Do not as some ungracious pastors do,
		Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
		Whiles like a puffed° and reckless libertine	proud
50		Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads
		And recks° not his own rede.°	heeds / advice
	LAERTES:	O, fear me not.°	fear not for me

4. May act on his promise. 5. And be restrained, despite the forward march of your feelings.

6. The cankerworm injures the shoots. 7. Young people are naturally rebellious, even without provocation.

[Enter POLONIUS.]

I stay too long. But here my father comes.

A double blessing is a double grace;

Occasion smiles upon a second leave.⁸

POLONIUS: Yet here, Laertes? Aboard, aboard, for shame!

This above all, to thine own self be true,

And it must follow as the night the day

Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Farewell. My blessing season^o this in thee!

LAERTES: Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well

What I have said to you.

OPELHIA: 'Tis in my memory locked,

85

And you yourself shall keep the key of it.

LAERTES: Farewell.

[Exit.]

POLONIUS: What is't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?

OPELHIA: So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.

POLONIUS: Marry,³ well bethought.

90

'Tis told me he hath very oft of late

Given private time to you, and you yourself

Have of your audience^o been most free and bounteous.

8. Favorable circumstances allow us a second farewell. 9. Those friends of yours who have proven true and reliable. 1. Conduct it so that the opponent. 2. Are of all people the most adept at displaying rank in fine appearance. 3. By the Virgin Mary, a mild oath.

- If it be so—as so 'tis put on^o me, suggested to 95 And that in way of caution—I must tell you,
 You do not understand yourself so clearly
 As it behooves my daughter and your honor.
 What is between you? Give me up the truth.
- OPHELIA: He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders^o offers, as of money
 100 Of his affection to me.
- POLONIUS: Affection? Pooh! You speak like a green girl, Unsifted^o in such perilous circumstance. Inexperienced
 Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?
- OPHELIA: I do not know, my lord, what I should think.
- 105 POLONIUS: Marry, I will teach you. Think yourself a baby
 That you have ta'en these tenders for true pay Which are not sterling. Tender^o yourself more dearly, Value; protect
 Or (not to crack the wind of the poor phrase, Running it thus)⁴ you'll tender me a fool.⁵
- 110 OPHELIA: My lord, he hath importuned me with love
 In honorable fashion.
- POLONIUS: Ay, fashion^o you may call it. Go to,⁶ go to. conventional flattery
 OPHELIA: And hath given countenance^o to his speech, my lord, authority
 With almost all the holy vows of heaven.
- 115 POLONIUS: Ay, springes^o to catch woodcocks.⁷ I do know, traps
 When the blood burns, how prodigal^o the soul lavishly
 Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,
 Giving more light than heat, extinct^o in both extinguished
 Even in their promise, as it is a-making,

 Be something scanter of your maiden presence.
 Set your entreatments⁸ at a higher rate
 Than a command^o to parle.^o For Lord Hamlet, request / speak (with you)
 Believe so much in^o him that he is young, concerning
- 125 And with a larger tether may he walk
 Than may be given you. In few,^o Ophelia, brief
 Do not believe his vows, for they are brokers,
 Not of that dye which their investments^o show, clerical vestments
 But mere implorators^o of unholy suits, solicitors

 The better to beguile. This is for all: Speaking
 I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth
 Have you so slander^o any moment leisure disgrace
 As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.
- 135 Look to't, I charge you. Come your ways.^o Come along
 OPHELIA: I shall obey, my lord. [Exeunt.]

4. The metaphor compares an overworked phrase to an overworked (broken-winded) horse. The phrase comes at the end of line 109. 5. A multiple pun: render or make me look like a fool; give me a fool, by being one yourself; give me a (grand)baby (idiomatically, a "fool"). 6. That's enough; come, come. 7. Proverbially gullible birds. 8. Negotiations before a surrender.

The guard station. Enter HAMLET, HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

HAMLET: The air bites shrewdly;° it is very cold.

HAMLET: What hour now?

HORATIO: I think it lacks of twelve.

MARCELLUS: No, it is struck.

HORATIO: Indeed? I heard it not.

It then draws near the season°

[A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces go off.]

What does this mean, my lord?

HAMLET: The king doth wake tonight and takes his rouse,

Keeps wassail, and the swagg'ring up-spring reels,⁹

And as he drains his draughts of Rhenish° down,

Rhine wine 10

The kettledrum and trumpet thus Bray out

The body was believed to contain various humors such as blood and choler, with good health and temperament depending on their balance, as opposed to the "o'ergrowth" of any one. 3. Being a congenital defect ("nature's livery" or clothing) or a blemish caused by fortune (the influence of chance astrological events).

[Enter GHOST.]

HORATIO: Look, my lord, it comes.

HAMLET: Angels and ministers of grace defend us!
 40 Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damned,
 Bring with thee airs^o from heaven or blasts from hell, gentle breezes
 Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
 Thou com'st in such a questionable shape
 That I will speak to thee. I'll call thee Hamlet, 45 King, father, royal Dane. O, answer me!
 Let me not burst in ignorance, but tell
 Why thy canonized^o bones, hearsèd^o in death, consecrated / coffined
 Have burst their cerements;^o why the sepulchre graveclothes
 Wherein we saw thee quietly inurned
 50 Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws
 To cast thee up again. What may this mean
 That thou, dead corse, again in complete steel^o armor
 Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,
 Making night hideous, and we fools of nature^o mere mortals
 55 So horribly to shake our disposition^o mental foundations
 With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?
 Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we do?

[GHOST beckons.]

HORATIO: It beckons you to go away with it,
 As if it some impartment^o did desire communication
 To you alone.

60 MARCELLUS: Look with what courteous action
 It waves^o you to a more removèd ground. beckons
 But do not go with it.

HORATIO: No, by no means.

HAMLET: It will not speak; then I will follow it.

HORATIO: Do not, my lord.

HAMLET: Why, what should be the fear?
 65 I do not set my life at a pin's fee,^o value
 And for my soul, what can it do to that,
 Being a thing immortal as itself?
 It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.

HORATIO: What if it tempt you toward the flood,^o my lord, sea
 70 Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
 That beetles^o o'er his base into the sea, juts out
 And there assume some other horrible form,
 Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason

And draw you into madness? Think of it.
 The very place puts toys of desperation,^o desperate fancies 75
 Without more motive,^o into every brain cause
 That looks so many fathoms to the sea
 And hears it roar beneath.

HAMLET: It wafts me still.

Go on. I'll follow thee.

MARCELLUS: You shall not go, my lord.

HAMLET: Hold off your hands. 80

HORATIO: Be ruled. You shall not go.

HAMLET: My fate cries out
 And makes each petty artere^o in this body artery
 As hardy as the Nemean lion's⁴ nerve.
 Still am I called. Unhand me, gentlemen.
 By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets^o me. hinders 85
 I say, away! Go on. I'll follow thee.

[Exeunt GHOST and HAMLET.]

HORATIO: He waxes desperate with imagination.

MARCELLUS: Let's follow. 'Tis not fit thus to obey him.

HORATIO: Have after.^o To what issue^o will this come? Go on / end; result

MARCELLUS: Something is rotten in the state of Denmark. 90

HORATIO: Heaven will direct it.

MARCELLUS: Nay, let's follow him.

[Exeunt.]

Scene 5

Near the guard station. Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAMLET: Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I'll go no further.

GHOST: Mark me.

HAMLET: I will.

GHOST: My hour is almost come,
 When I to sulph'rous and tormenting flames
 Must render up myself.

HAMLET: Alas, poor ghost!

GHOST: Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
 To what I shall unfold. 5

HAMLET: Speak. I am bound to hear.

GHOST: So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.

HAMLET: What?

GHOST: I am thy father's spirit,
 Doomed for a certain term to walk the night,
 And for the day confined to fast^o in fires, do penance
 Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature^o my natural life 10

4. Mythological monster slain by Hercules as one of his twelve labors.

- Are burnt and purged away. But that I am forbid
 To tell the secrets of my prison house,
 15 I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
 Would harrow up^o thy soul, freeze thy young blood, torment
 Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,
 Thy knotted and combinèd^o locks to part, tangled
 And each particular hair to stand an end,
 20 Like quills upon the fretful porpentine.^o porcupine
 But this eternal blazon⁵ must not be
 To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!
 If thou didst ever thy dear father love—
 HAMLET: O God!
- 25 GHOST: Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder.
 HAMLET: Murder!
 GHOST: Murder most foul, as in the best it is,
 But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.
 HAMLET: Haste me to know't, that I, with wings as swift 30 As meditation or the thoughts of love,
 May sweep to my revenge.
 GHOST: I find thee apt.
 And duller shouldst thou be than the fat^o weed gross
 That rots itself in ease on Lethe⁶ wharf,— Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear.
 35 'Tis given out^o that, sleeping in my orchard, said
 A serpent stung me. So the whole ear of Denmark
 Is by a forged process^o of my death fabricated account
 Rankly abused.^o But know, thou noble youth, deceived
 The serpent that did sting thy father's life
 Now wears his crown.
- 40 HAMLET: O my prophetic soul!
 My uncle!
- GHOST: Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate^o beast, adulterous
 With witchcraft of his wits, with traitorous gifts^o— abilities; presents
 O wicked wit and gifts that have the power
 45 So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust
 The will of my most seeming virtuous queen.
 O Hamlet, what a falling off was there,
 From me, whose love was of that dignity
 That it went hand in hand even with the vow
 50 I made to her in marriage, and to decline^o sink down
 Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
 To^o those of mine! Compared to

5. Description of eternity or the afterlife.

6. River of the classical underworld; its waters induced forgetfulness. Rots: "roots," in some versions of the play.

So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,	55
Will sate itself in a celestial bed
And prey on garbage.
But soft, methinks I scent the morning air.
Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
My custom always of the afternoon,	60
Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
With juice of cursed hebona ⁷ in a vial,
And in the porches of my ears did pour
The leperous distilment, [°] whose effect	distillation
Holds such an enmity with blood of man	65
That swift as quicksilver [°] it courses through	liquid mercury
The natural gates and alleys of the body,
And with a sudden vigor it doth posset [°]	coagulate
And curd, [°] like eager [°] droppings into milk,	curdle / acid
The thin and wholesome blood. So did it mine,	70
And a most instant tetter barked about ⁸
Most lazar-like [°] with vile and loathsome crust	leper-like
All my smooth body.
Thus was I sleeping by a brother's hand
Of life, of crown, of queen at once dispatched, [°]	deprived 75
Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhouseled, disappointed, unaneled, ⁹
No reck'ning made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.
O, horrible! O, horrible, most horrible!	80
If thou hast nature in thee, bear it not.
Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch of luxury [°] and damnèd incest.	lechery
But howsomever thou pursues this act,
Taint not thy mind, nor let thy soul contrive	85
Against thy mother aught. [°] Leave her to heaven,	anything
And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge
To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once.
The glowworm shows the matin [°] to be near,	morning
And gins [°] to pale his uneffectual fire.	begins 90
Adieu, adieu, adieu. Remember me. [Exit.]
HAMLET: O all you host of heaven! O earth! What else?
And shall I couple [°] hell? O, fie! Hold, hold, my heart,	add
And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee?	95
Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe. ¹ Remember thee?

7. A poison, possibly henbane.

8. Covered like bark. Tetter: a skin disease.

9. Without the customary rites of the Church; that is, without receiving the Sacrament, without confession and absolution, and without ritual anointing.

1. Skull or head, but also world and, perhaps, an allusion to the Globe Theatre.

Yea, from the table^o of my memory tablet; book
 I'll wipe away all trivial fond^o records, foolish
 100 All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past²
 That youth and observation copied there,
 And thy commandment all alone shall live
 Within the book and volume of my brain,
 Unmixed with baser matter. Yes, by heaven!
 105 O most pernicious woman!
 O villain, villain, smiling, damnèd villain!
 My tables—meet it is I set it down
 That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.
 At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark.
 110 So, uncle, there you are. Now to my word:^o for my motto or watchword
 It is “Adieu, adieu. Remember me.”
 I have sworn’t.

[Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.]

HORATIO: My lord, my lord!
 MARCELLUS: Lord Hamlet!
 HORATIO: Heavens secure him!
 HAMLET: So be it!
 115 MARCELLUS: Illo, ho, ho,³ my lord!
 HAMLET: Hillo, ho, ho, boy! Come, bird, come.
 MARCELLUS: How is’t, my noble lord?
 HORATIO: What news, my lord?
 HAMLET: O, wonderful!
 HORATIO: Good my lord, tell it.
 HAMLET: No, you will reveal it.
 HORATIO: Not I, my lord, by heaven.
 120 MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord.
 HAMLET: How say you then, would heart of man once think it?
 But you’ll be secret?
 BOTH: Ay, by heaven, my lord.
 HAMLET: There’s never a villain dwelling in all Denmark
 But he’s an arrant knave.
 125 HORATIO: There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave
 To tell us this.
 HAMLET: Why, right, you are in the right,
 And so without more circumstance^o at all elaborate speech
 I hold it fit that we shake hands and part,
 You, as your business and desire shall point you,
 130 For every man hath business and desire
 Such as it is, and for my own poor part,
 Look you, I’ll go pray.

2. All adages or old “saws” from books, all images or customs, all previous impressions.

3. Falconer’s cry; hence the reference to a “bird” in the next line.

HORATIO: These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.

HAMLET: I am sorry they offend you, heartily;

Yes, faith, heartily.

HORATIO: There's no offence, my lord.

135

HAMLET: Yes, by Saint Patrick, but there is, Horatio,
And much offence too. Touching^o this vision here,
It is an honest ghost, that let me tell you.

Concerning

For your desire to know what is between us,
O'ermaster't as you may. And now, good friends,
As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers,
Give^o me one poor request.

140

Grant

HORATIO: What is't, my lord? We will.

HAMLET: Never make known what you have seen tonight.

BOTH: My lord, we will not.

HAMLET: Nay, but swear't.

HORATIO: In faith,

145

My lord, not I.

MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord, in faith.

HAMLET: Upon my sword.

MARCELLUS: We have sworn, my lord, already.

HAMLET: Indeed, upon my sword, indeed.

[GHOST cries under the stage.]

GHOST: Swear.

HAMLET: Ha, ha, boy, say'st thou so? Art thou there, truepenny?^o trusty fellow

Come on. You hear this fellow in the cellarage.^o cellars 150

Consent to swear.

HORATIO: Propose the oath, my lord.

HAMLET: Never to speak of this that you have seen,

Swear by my sword.

GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear.

HAMLET: Hic et ubique?⁴ Then we'll shift our ground.

155

Come hither, gentlemen,

And lay your hands again upon my sword.

Swear by my sword

Never to speak of this that you have heard.

GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear by his sword.

160

HAMLET: Well said, old mole! Canst work i' th' earth so fast?

A worthy pioneer!⁵ Once more remove,^o good friends.

move

HORATIO: O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

HAMLET: And therefore as a stranger^o give it welcome.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your⁶ philosophy.

4. Here and everywhere? (Latin).

5. Soldier who digs trenches.

6. Some versions of the play have "our," not "your."

But come.
 Here as before, never, so help you mercy,
 How strange or odd some'er^o I bear myself so ever 170 (As I perchance hereafter shall think meet
 To put an antic^o disposition on), a mad; crazy
 That you, at such times, seeing me, never shall,
 With arms encumbered^o thus, or this head-shake, folded
 Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase, 175 As "Well, we know," or "We could, an if^o we would" an if = if
 Or "If we list^o to speak," or "There be, and if they might" liked
 Or such ambiguous giving out, to note
 That you know aught of me—this do swear,
 So grace and mercy at your most need help you.
 180 GHOST: [Beneath.] Swear. [They swear.]
 HAMLET: Rest, rest, perturbèd spirit! So, gentlemen,
 With all my love I do commend me to you,
 And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
 May do t'express his love and friending^o to you, friendship
 185 God willing, shall not lack.^o Let us go in together, be lacking or undone
 And still your fingers on your lips, I pray.
 The time is out of joint. O cursèd spite
 That ever I was born to set it right!
 Nay, come,⁷ let's go together. [Exeunt.]

ACT II

Scene 1

The dwelling of POLONIUS. Enter POLONIUS and REYNALDO.

POLONIUS: Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.
 REYNALDO: I will, my lord.
 POLONIUS: You shall do marvellous wisely, good Reynaldo,
 Before you visit him, to make inquire
 Of his behavior.
 5 REYNALDO: My lord, I did intend it.
 POLONIUS: Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir.
 Enquire me^o first what Danskers^o are in Paris, for me / Danes
 And how, and who, what means,^o and where they keep,^o income / lodge
 What company, at what expense; and finding 10 By this encompassment^o and drift of question indirect means
 That they do know my son, come you more nearer Than your particular demands^o will touch it. direct questions
 Take you^o as 'twere some distant knowledge of him,
 As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
 15 And in part him." Do you mark this, Reynaldo?
 REYNALDO: Ay, very well, my lord.

7. The others politely wait for Hamlet to lead the way, but he insists otherwise.

- POLONIUS: "And in part him, but," you may say, "not well,
 But if't be he I mean, he's very wild,
 Addicted so and so." And there put on him
 What forgeries^o you please; marry, none so rank^o lies / foul 20
 As may dishonor him. Take heed of that.
 But, sir, such wanton, wild, and usual slips
 As are companions noted and most known
 To youth and liberty.
- REYNALDO: As gaming, my lord.
- POLONIUS: Ay, or drinking, fencing, swearing, 25
 Quarrelling, drabbing^o—you may go so far. whoring
- REYNALDO: My lord, that would dishonor him.
- POLONIUS: Faith, no, as you may season it in the charge.^o soften the accusation
 You must not put another scandal on him,
 That he is open^o to incontinency.^o inclined / sexual excess 30
 That's not my meaning. But breathe his faults so quaintly^o delicately
 That they may seem the taints of liberty,^o faults of freedom
 The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
 A savageness in unreclaimèd^o blood, untamed
 Of general assault.^o Touching everyone
- REYNALDO: But, my good lord— 35
- POLONIUS: Wherefore should you do this?
- REYNALDO: Ay, my lord,
 I would know that.
- POLONIUS: Marry, sir, here's my drift,
 And I believe it is a fetch of warrant.^o permissible trick
 You laying these slight sullies on my son,
 As 'twere a thing a little soiled wi' th' working,⁸ 40
 Mark you,
 Your party^o in converse, him you would sound, partner
 Having^o ever seen in the prenominate^o crimes If he has / already named
 The youth you breathe of guilty, be assured
 He closes with you in this consequence,^o to this effect 45
 "Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"
 According to the phrase^o or the addition^o expression / title of address
 Of man and country.
- REYNALDO: Very good, my lord.
- POLONIUS: And then, sir, does 'a^o this—a does—What he was I about to say?
 By the mass, I was about to say something. 50
 Where did I leave?
- REYNALDO: At "closes in the consequence."
- POLONIUS: At "closes in the consequence"—ay, marry,
 He closes thus: "I know the gentleman.
 I saw him yesterday, or th' other day, 55
 Or then, or then, with such, or such, and as you say,

8. Stained by education in the ways of the world, "shop-soiled."

- There was 'a gaming, there o'ertook in's rouse,
 There falling out at tennis," or perchance
 "I saw him enter such a house of sale,"
 60 Videlicet,^o a brothel, or so forth. That is to say (Latin)
 See you, now—
 Your bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth,
 And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,^o ability
 With windlasses^o and with assays of bias,^o roundabout paths / indirect tests
 65 By indirections find directions^o out; tendencies
 So by my former lecture and advice
 Shall you my son.⁹ You have me, have you not?
 REYNALDO: My lord, I have.
 POLONIUS: God b'wi' ye; fare ye well.
 REYNALDO: Good my lord.
 70 POLONIUS: Observe his inclination in^o yourself. for
 REYNALDO: I shall, my lord.
 POLONIUS: And let him ply^o his music. practice
 REYNALDO: Well, my lord.
 POLONIUS: Farewell. [Exit REYNALDO.]

[Enter OPHELIA.]

- How now, Ophelia, what's the matter?
 OPHELIA: O my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!
 75 POLONIUS: With what, i' th' name of God?
 OPHELIA: My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,^o private chamber
 Lord Hamlet with his doublet^o all unbraced,^o jacket / unfastened
 No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
 Ungartered and down-gyvèd¹ to his ankle,
 80 Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,
 And with a look so piteous in purport
 As if he had been loosèd out of hell
 To speak of horrors—he comes before me.
 POLONIUS: Mad for thy love?
 OPHELIA: My lord, I do not know,
 But truly I do fear it.
 85 POLONIUS: What said he?
 OPHELIA: He took me by the wrist, and held me hard,
 Then goes he to the length of all his arm,
 And with his other hand thus o'er his brow,
 He falls to such perusal of my face 90 As 'a^o would draw it. Long stayed he so. As if he
 At last, a little shaking of mine arm,
 And thrice his head thus waving up and down,
 He raised a sigh so piteous and profound
 As it did seem to shatter all his bulk,^o body

9. Shall you make discoveries about my son.

1. Fallen down like fetters ("gyves").

And end his being. That done, he lets me go,	95
And with his head over his shoulder turned
He seemed to find his way without his eyes,
For out adoors he went without their helps,
And to the last bended° their light on me.	directed
POLONIUS: Come, go with me. I will go seek the king.	100
This is the very ecstasy° of love,	insanity
Whose violent property° fordoes° itself,	character / destroys
And leads the will to desperate undertakings
As oft as any passion under heaven
That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.	105
What, have you given him any hard words of late?
OPHELIA: No, my good lord, but as you did command
I did repel his letters, and denied
His access to me.
POLONIUS: That hath made him mad.
I am sorry that with better heed and judgment	110
I had not quoted° him. I feared he did but trifle,	observed
And meant to wrack ² thee; but beshrew° my jealousy.°	curse / suspicion

Scene 2

A public room. Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.
Moreover that ⁴ we much did long to see you,
The need we have to use you did provoke
Our hasty sending.° Something have you heard	summons
Of Hamlet's transformation—so call it,	5
Sith nor° th' exterior nor the inward man	Since neither
Resembles that it was. What it should be,
More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
So much from th' understanding of himself,
I cannot deem of. I entreat you both	10
That, being of so young days° brought up with him,	from childhood
And sith so neighbored° to his youth and havior,	familiar

2. Harm; ruin (through seduction).

3. Polonius suggests that although it will cause trouble ("grief") to reveal the secret of Hamlet's "love" (for Ophelia), "to hide" it would incur greater suffering. 4. In addition to the fact that.

- That you vouchsafe your rest^o here in our court
Some little time, so by your companies
15 To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather
So much as from occasion^o you may glean,
Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus,
That opened^o lies within our remedy.
QUEEN: Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,
20 And sure I am two men there are not living
To whom he more adheres.^o If it will please you
To show us so much gentry^o and good will
As to expend your time with us awhile
For the supply and profit of our hope,
25 Your visitation shall receive such thanks
As fits a king's remembrance.
- ROSENCRANTZ: Both your majesties
Might, by the sovereign power you have of^o us,
Put your dread^o pleasures more into command
Than to entreaty.
- GUILDENSTERN: But we both obey,
30 And here give up ourselves in the full bent^o
To lay our service freely at your feet,
To be commanded.
- KING: Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.
QUEEN: Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.
35 And I beseech you instantly to visit
My too much changed son. Go, some of you,
And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.
- GUILDENSTERN: Heavens make our presence and our practices
Pleasant and helpful to him!
- QUEEN: Ay, amen!
[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
[Enter POLONIUS.]
- 40 POLONIUS: Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord,
Are joyfully returned.
- KING: Thou still^o hast been the father of good news.
- POLONIUS: Have I, my lord? I assure you, my good liege,
I hold my duty as I hold my soul,
45 Both to my God and to my gracious king;
And I do think—or else this brain of mine
Hunts not the trail of policy^o so sure
As it hath used to do—that I have found
The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.
- 50 KING: O, speak of that, that do I long to hear.
- POLONIUS: Give first admittance to th' ambassadors.
My news shall be the fruit^o to that great feast.
- KING: Thyself do grace to them, and bring them in.

[Enter Ambassadors (VOLTEMAND and CORNELIUS) with POLONIUS.]

Welcome, my good friends,
 Say, Voltemand, what from our brother^o Norway? fellow monarch
 VOLTEMAND: Most fair return of greetings and desires.^o good wishes 60
 Upon our first,⁵ he sent out to suppress
 His nephew's levies,^o which to him appeared raising of troops
 To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,^o king of Poland
 But better looked into, he truly found
 It was against your highness, whereat grieved, 65
 That so his sickness, age, and impotence
 Was falsely borne in hand, sends out arrests⁶

 Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine,^o short; the end

 Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
 Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee,^o income
 And his commission to employ those soldiers,
 So levied as before, against the Polack, 75
 With an entreaty, herein further shown,

[Gives CLAUDIUS a paper.]

That it might please you to give quiet pass^o safe conduct
 Through your dominions for this enterprise,
 On such regards of safety and allowance
 As therein are set down.

KING: It likes^o us well, pleases 80
 And at our more considered time⁷ we'll read,
 Answer, and think upon this business.
 Meantime we thank you for your well-took^o labor. successful
 Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.
 Most welcome home! [Exeunt AMBASSADORS.]

POLONIUS: This business is well ended. 85
 My liege and madam, to expostulate^o discuss
 What majesty should be, what duty is,
 Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
 Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.
 Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit, 90
 And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,^o adornments
 I will be brief. Your noble son is mad.
 Mad call I it, for to define true madness,

5. That is, first appearance. 6. Orders to stop. Falsely borne in hand: disloyally taken advantage of.

7. That is, when we have more time for consideration.

What is't but to be nothing else but mad?
But let that go.

95 QUEEN: More matter with less art.

POLONIUS: Madam, I swear I use no art at all.

That he is mad, 'tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity,

And pity 'tis 'tis true. A foolish figure,^o

But farewell it, for I will use no art.

100 Mad let us grant him, then, and now remains

That we find out the cause of this effect,

Or rather say the cause of this defect,

For this effect defective comes by cause.

Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.

9. If I had recorded the perception (in my memory) but kept it hidden.

1. Or made my heart effectively silent.

HAMLET: Well, God-a-mercy.²

POLONIUS: Do you know me, my lord?

HAMLET: Excellent well, you are a fishmonger.

POLONIUS: Not I, my lord.

175 HAMLET: Then I would you were so honest a man.

POLONIUS: Honest, my lord?

HAMLET: Ay, sir, to be honest as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLONIUS: That's very true, my lord.

180 HAMLET: For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a god kissing carrion³—Have you a daughter?

POLONIUS: I have, my lord.

HAMLET: Let her not walk i' th' sun.^o Conception⁴ is a blessing, but as your daughter may conceive—friend, look to't.^o

185 POLONIUS: How say you by that? [Aside.] Still harping on my daughter. Yet he knew me not at first. 'A^o said I was a fishmonger. 'A is far gone. And truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love. Very near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

He

190 HAMLET: Words, words, words.

POLONIUS: What is the matter,⁵ my lord?

HAMLET: Between who?

POLONIUS: I mean the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET: Slanders, sir; for the satirical rogue says here that 195 old men have grey beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging^o thick amber^o and plumtree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit,^o together with most weak hams^o—all which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty^o to have it

HAMLET: Into my grave?

205 POLONIUS: [Aside.] Indeed, that's out of the air.^o How pregnant sometime his replies are! a happiness^o that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously^o be delivered of. I will leave him, and suddenly^o contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord. I will most humbly take my leave of you.

[Enter GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.]

POLONIUS: Fare you well, my lord. 215

HAMLET: These tedious old fools!

POLONIUS: You go to seek the Lord Hamlet. There he is.

ROSENCRANTZ: [To POLONIUS.] God save you, sir!

[Exit POLONIUS.]

GUILDENSTERN: My honored lord!

ROSENCRANTZ: My most dear lord! 220

HAMLET: My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern?

Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?

ROSENCRANTZ: As the indifferent^o children of the earth. ordinary

GUILDENSTERN: Happy^o in that we are not over-happy; Fortunate 225

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.^o highest point

HAMLET: Nor the soles of her shoe?

ROSENCRANTZ: Neither, my lord.

HAMLET: Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors? 230

GUILDENSTERN: Faith, her privates⁶ we.

HAMLET: In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true, she is a strumpet.^o What news? whore

ROSENCRANTZ: None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest. 235

HAMLET: Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true.

Let me question more in particular. What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune, that she sends you to prison hither?

GUILDENSTERN: Prison, my lord? 240

HAMLET: Denmark's a prison.

ROSENCRANTZ: Then is the world one.

HAMLET: A goodly^o one, in which there are many confines,^o spacious / enclosures wards^o and dungeons. Denmark being one o' th' worst. cells

ROSENCRANTZ: We think not so, my lord. 245

HAMLET: Why then 'tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison.

ROSENCRANTZ: Why then your ambition makes it one. 'Tis too narrow for your mind. 250

HAMLET: O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams.

GUILDENSTERN: Which dreams indeed are ambition; for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream. 255

HAMLET: A dream itself is but a shadow.

6. A triple pun: private persons (who hold no public office); intimate friends; private parts, genitalia.

- ROSENCRANTZ: Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow.
- 260 HAMLET: Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to th' court? for, by my fay,^o I cannot reason. faith
- BOTH: We'll wait upon^o you. accompany
- HAMLET: No such matter.^o I will not sort^o you with the rest Certainly not / class

- ROSENCRANTZ: To visit you, my lord; no other occasion.
- HAMLET: Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks, but I
- 270 thank you; and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.⁸ Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free^o visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me. Come, come, nay speak. voluntary
- GUILDENSTERN: What should we say, my lord?
- 275 HAMLET: Anything but to th' purpose. You were sent for, and there is a kind of confession in your looks, which your modesties^o have not craft enough to color.^o I know the good king and queen have sent for you. senses of decency / disguise
- ROSENCRANTZ: To what end, my lord?
- 280 HAMLET: That you must teach me. But let me conjure^o you by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy^o of our youth, by the obligation of our ever preserved love, and by what more dear a better proposer can charge you withal, be even^o and direct with me whether you were sent for or no. solemnly request harmonious friendship
- 285 ROSENCRANTZ: [Aside to GUILDENSTERN.] What say you? level
- HAMLET: [Aside.] Nay, then, I have an eye of^o you.—If you love me, hold not off. on
- GUILDENSTERN: My lord, we were sent for.

- ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts. 305
- HAMLET: Why did ye laugh, then, when I said “Man delights not me”?

3. Eccentric, governed by excess of one of the bodily humors. (See 1.4.27 and note.) 4. Latest fashion, perhaps the rage for companies of boy actors, the “little eyases” or hawks alluded to in line 331. Such a company flourished at the Blackfriars Theatre from 1600–08. 5. With a loud, high delivery. 6. Pens of satirical writers. 7. Until their voices break (at puberty).

ROSENCRANTZ: Happily^o he is the second time come to

HAMLET: I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players.
 Mark it.—You say right, sir, a Monday morning, 'twas then 380 indeed.

POLONIUS: My lord, I have news to tell you.

HAMLET: My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius was an actor in Rome¹—

8. Paid for a play plot. 9. During one of his labors Hercules assumed for a time the burden of the Titan Atlas, who supported the world on his shoulders. Hercules bearing the world was the sign of the Globe Theatre.

1. Roscius was the most famous actor of ancient Rome; hence this would be old news.

POLONIUS: The actors are come hither, my lord.

HAMLET: Buzz, buzz.

385

POLONIUS: Upon my honor—

HAMLET: Then came each actor on his ass—

POLONIUS: The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical historical-pastoral, scene individable,² or poem unlimited. Seneca cannot be too heavy nor Plautus³ too light. For the law of writ and the liberty, these are the only men.

390

HAMLET: O Jephtha, judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!⁴

395

POLONIUS: What a treasure had he, my lord?

HAMLET: Why—

“One fair daughter, and no more,
The which he loved passing° well.”

surpassing

POLONIUS: [Aside.] Still on my daughter.

400

HAMLET: Am I not i' th' right, old Jephtha?

POLONIUS: If you call me Jephtha, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing well.

HAMLET: Nay, that follows not.⁵

POLONIUS: What follows then, my lord?

HAMLET: Why—

2. Play without breaks or divisions, or play observing the three classical unities—hence, following “the law of writ,” unlike plays “unlimited” by such rules or laws or taking “liberty” with them (lines 391–93). Essentially, Hamlet thus refers here to every contemporary kind or category of drama.

3. Seneca and Plautus were ancient Roman writers of tragedy and comedy, respectively.

4. To ensure victory, Jephtha promises to sacrifice the first creature to meet him on his return. Unfortunately, his only daughter is the victim of his vow (Judg. 11). Jephtha, Judge of Israel was the title of a popular ballad, the “pious chanson” (line 410) from which Hamlet subsequently sings.

5. Polonius’s having a daughter is not a logical consequence of Hamlet calling him Jephtha.

6. That which cuts short by interrupting. 7. Boy who played female roles.

Pray God your voice, like a piece of uncurrent gold, be not cracked within the ring.⁸—Masters, you are all wel-

FIRST PLAYER: What speech, my good lord?

HAMLET: I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was 425 never acted, or if it was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviary^o to the general.^o But it was—as I received it, and others whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of^o mine—an excellent play, well digested^o in the scenes, set down with 430 as much modesty as cunning. I remember one said there were no sallets⁹ in the lines to make the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict the author of affectation, but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome^o than fine.^o
 435 One speech in't I chiefly loved. 'Twas Æneas' tale to Dido,

455 POLONIUS: Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good

8. A coin was no longer legal tender if the circle or ring enclosing the monarch's head was broken.

9. Salads; seasoned dishes. I.e., deliberate attempts to embellish the style in order to make the lines more pleasing (“savory”).

1. Aeneas, fleeing with his band from fallen Troy (“Ilium,” line 463), arrives in Carthage, where he tells Dido, the queen of Carthage, of Troy's fall and the death of Priam, the aged king of Troy, at the hands of Pyrrhus, the son of the slain Achilles. 2. That is, the Trojan horse.

3. As though coated with sizing, thick liquid used to prepare a canvas for painting.

FIRST PLAYER:

“Anon he finds him⁴

Striking too short at Greeks. His antique sword,

Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,

Repugnant^o to command. Unequal matched,Resistant 460

But with the whiff and wind of his fell^o sword*fierce*Th’ unnervèd^o father falls. Then senseless Ilium,strengthless

Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top

Stoops to his^o base, and with a hideous crash*its* 465

Takes prisoner Pyrrhus’ ear. For, lo! his sword,

Which was declining^o on the milky^o head*descending / white*

Of reverend Priam, seemed i’ th’ air to stick.

So as a painted tyrant⁵ Pyrrhus stood,And like a neutral to his will and matter,⁶

470

Did nothing.

But as we often see, against^o some storm,*before*A silence in the heavens, the rack^o stand still,*clouds*The bold winds speechless, and the orb^o below*earth*

As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder

A rousèd vengeance sets him new awork

And never did the Cyclops’ hammers fall

On Mars’s armor, forged for proof eterne,⁷

With less remorse than Pyrrhus’ bleeding sword

480

Now falls on Priam.

Out, out, thou strumpet, Fortune! All you gods,

In general synod take away her power,

Break all the spokes and fellies⁸ from her wheel,And bowl the round nave^o down the hill of heaven^o*wheel hub / Mount Olympus* 485

As low as to the fiends.”

POLONIUS: This is too long.

HAMLET: It shall to the barber’s with your beard.—Prithee say on. He’s for a jig,⁹ or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Sayon; come to Hecuba.¹

490

FIRST PLAYER: “But who, ah woe! had seen the moblèd^o*veiled; muffled (in a hood)*

queen—”

HAMLET: “The moblèd queen”?

POLONIUS: That’s good. “Moblèd queen” is good.

4. Soon, that is, Pyrrhus finds Priam. 5. That is, like a tyrant in a painting, hence unmoving.

6. As one indifferent to his intention and the action at hand.

7. Mars, as befits a Roman war god, had armor made by the blacksmith god Vulcan and his assistants, the Cyclopes. It was suitably impenetrable (of “proof eterne”). 8. The power of Fortune’s ever-turning wheel, raising and lowering men in succession, was proverbial. Fellies: curved parts of the wheel’s rim. 9. Ridiculous verse, or the dance that followed many plays.

1. Wife of Priam and queen of Troy. Her “loins” are described below as “o’erteemèd” because of her unusual fertility. The number of her children varies in different accounts, but twenty is a safe minimum.

FIRST PLAYER: "Run barefoot up and down, threat'ning the flames

- 495 With bisson rheum,^o a clout^o upon that head blinding tears / cloth
 Where late the diadem stood, and for a robe,
 About her lank and all o'er-teemèd loins,
 A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up—
 Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steeped, 500 'Gainst Fortune's state^o would treason have pronounced. rule
 But if the gods themselves did see her then,
 When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
 In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
 The instant burst of clamor that she made,
 505 Unless things mortal move them not at all,
 Would have made milch^o the burning eyes of heaven, milky; moist
 And passion^o in the gods." suffering; pity

POLONIUS: Look whe'r^o he has not turned his color, and has tears in's eyes. Prithee no more. whether

- 510 HAMLET: 'Tis well. I'll have thee speak out the rest of this soon.—Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?^o Do you hear, let them be well used,^o for they lodged / treated are the abstract^o and brief chronicles of the time; after summary your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their 515 ill report while you live.

POLONIUS: My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

- HAMLET: God's bodkin,^o man, much better. Use every man By God's dear body after^o his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them according to after your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, 520 the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in.

POLONIUS: Come, sirs.

HAMLET: Follow him, friends. We'll hear a play tomorrow. [Aside to FIRST PLAYER.]

Dost thou hear me, old friend, can you play "The Murder of Gonzago"?

- 525 FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: We'll ha't^o tomorrow night. You could for a have it need^o study a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines if necessary which I would set down and insert in't, could you not?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

- 530 HAMLET: Very well. Follow that lord, and look you mock him not.

[Exeunt POLONIUS and PLAYERS.]

My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

- 535 HAMLET: Ay, so God b'wi'ye. Now I am alone.
 O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
 Is it not monstrous that this player here,

But° in a fiction, in a dream of passion,	Merely
Could force his soul so to his own conceit°	imagined situation
That from her° working all his visage wanned;°	(his soul's) / grew pale	540
Tears in his eyes, distraction in his aspect
A broken voice, and his whole function suiting
With forms to his conceit? And all for nothing,
For Hecuba!
What's Hecuba to him or he to Hecuba,		545
That he should weep for her? What would he do
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears,
And cleave the general ear° with horrid speech,	the ears of people generally
Make mad the guilty, and appal the free,°	innocent
Confound the ignorant, and amaze° indeed	bewilder	550
The very faculties of eyes and ears.
Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled° rascal peak°	dull-spirited / mope
Like John-a-dreams,° unpregnant of ² my cause,	a man dreaming
And can say nothing; no, not for a king		555
Upon whose property° and most dear life	rightful sovereignty
A damned defeat ³ was made. Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain, breaks my pate° across,	head
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face,
Tweaks me by the nose, gives° me the lie i' th' throat	attributes to	560
As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?
Ha, 'swounds,° I should take it; for it cannot be	by God's wounds
But I am pigeon-livered and lack gall ⁴
To make oppression bitter, or ere this
I should 'a fatted all the region kites ⁵		565
With this slave's offal. Bloody, bawdy villain!
Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless° villain!	unnatural
O, vengeance!
Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave,°	fine
That I, the son of a dear father murdered,		570
Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
Must like a whore unpack my heart with words,
And fall a-cursing like a very drab,°	whore
A scullion!° Fie upon't! foh!	menial kitchen servant
About,° my brains. Hum—I have heard	Into action	575
That guilty creatures sitting at a play,
Have by the very cunning° of the scene	artfulness
Been struck so to the soul that presently
They have proclaimed° their malefactions;	admitted
For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak		580

2. Not quickened to action by. 3. An overthrow worthy of damnation

4. Bitter fluid (humor) produced by the liver and the supposed source of anger. Pigeons were thought not to secrete gall. 5. Birds of prey in the sky ("region").

With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players
 Play something like the murder of my father
 Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks.
 I'll tent^o him to the quick. If 'a do blench,^o probe / blanch; grow pale 585 I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
 May be a devil, and the devil hath power
 T' assume a pleasing shape, yea, and perhaps
 Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
 As he is very potent with^o such spirits,⁶ powerful over 590 Abuses me to damn me. I'll have grounds
 More relative^o than this. The play's the thing relevant; conclusive
 Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king. [Exit.]

Scene 1

A room in the castle. Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: And can you by no drift of conference⁷
 Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
 Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
 With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?
 5 ROSENCRANTZ: He does confess he feels himself distracted,^o confused; agitated
 But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.
 GUILDENSTERN: Nor do we find him forward^o to be sounded,^o eager / questioned
 But with a crafty madness keeps aloof
 When we would bring him on to some confession
 Of his true state.
 10 QUEEN: Did he receive you well?
 ROSENCRANTZ: Most like a gentleman.
 GUILDENSTERN: But with much forcing of his disposition.^o mood
 ROSENCRANTZ: Niggard of question, but of our demands⁸
 Most free in his reply.
 QUEEN: Did you assay^o him tempt
 15 To any pastime?
 ROSENCRANTZ: Madam, it so fell out that certain players
 We o'er-raught^o on the way. Of these we told him,
 And there did seem in him a kind of joy
 To hear of it. They are here about the court,
 20 And as I think, they have already order
 This night to play before him.
 POLONIUS: 'Tis most true,
 And he beseeched me to entreat your majesties

6. Those afflicted with too much bile, a humor or "spirit" (distillation), were believed to suffer melancholy and to be prone to hallucinations, thus being easily tricked ("Abuse[d]," line 590) by the devil. 7. Carefully directed conversation. 8. Reluctant to offer conversation, but to our questions.

	To hear and see the matter. ^o	performance
KING:	With all my heart, and it doth much content me
	To hear him so inclined.		25
	Good gentlemen, give him a further edge, ^o	stimulus; appetite
	And drive his purpose into these delights.
ROSENCRANTZ:	We shall, my lord.
	[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
KING:	Sweet Gertrude, leave us too,
	For we have closely ^o sent for Hamlet hither,	privately
	That he, as 'twere by accident, may here		30
	Affront ^o Ophelia.	Confront
	Her father and myself (lawful espials ^o)	spies
	Will so bestow ourselves that, seeing unseen,
	We may of their encounter frankly judge,
	And gather by him, as he is behaved,		35
	If't be th' affliction of his love or no
	That thus he suffers for.
QUEEN:	I shall obey you.—
	And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish
	That your good beauties be the happy cause
	Of Hamlet's wildness. So shall I hope your virtues		40
	Will bring him to his wonted ^o way again,	accustomed
	To both your honors.
OPHELIA:	Madam, I wish it may.
	[Exit QUEEN.]
POLONIUS:	Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious, ^o so please you,	Your grace
	We will bestow ourselves.—[To OPHELIA.] Read on this book, ⁹
	That show of such an exercise ^o may color ^o	(of devotion) / explain	45
	Your loneliness.—We are oft to blame in this,
	'Tis too much proved, that with devotion's visage
	And pious action we do sugar o'er
	The devil himself.
KING:	[Aside.] O, 'tis too true.
	How smart ^o a lash that speech doth give my conscience!	sharp	50
	The harlot's cheek, beautied with plast' ^o ring ^o art,	cosmetic
	Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
	Than is my deed to my most painted word.
	O heavy burden!
POLONIUS:	I hear him coming. Let's withdraw, my lord.		55
	[Exeunt KING and POLONIUS.]
	[Enter HAMLET.]

9. A prayer book or devotional text, as the lines below make clear.

- HAMLET: To be, or not to be, that is the question:
 Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
 The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
 Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
 60 And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep—
 No more; and by a sleep to say we end
 The heartache, and the thousand natural shocks
 That flesh is heir to. 'Tis a consummation
 Devoutly to be wished—to die, to sleep—
 65 To sleep, perchance to dream, ay there's the rub;^o obstacle; impediment
 For in that sleep of death what dreams may come
 When we have shuffled^o off this mortal coil^o cast / turmoil; flesh
 Must give us pause—there's the respect^o consideration
 That makes calamity of so long life.¹
 70 For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
 Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,^o insulting behavior
 The pangs of despised^o love, the law's delay, scorned
 The insolence of office,^o and the spurns^o bureaucrats / spurnings; rejections
 That patient merit of^o th' unworthy takes, from 75 When he himself might his quietus² make
 With a bare bodkin?^o Who would fardels^o bear, mere dagger / burdens
 To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
 But that the dread of something after death,
 The undiscovered country, from whose bourn^o border
 80 No traveller returns, puzzles the will,
 And makes us rather bear those ills we have
 Than fly to others that we know not of?
 Thus conscience³ does make cowards of us all;
 And thus the native hue^o of resolution natural complexion
 85 Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast^o of thought, tint
 And enterprises of great pitch^o and moment^o height / importance
 With this regard^o their currents turn awry
 And lose the name of action.—Soft you now^o consideration
 The fair Ophelia.—Nymph, in thy orisons^o Wait a moment
 Be all my sins remembered. prayers
- 90 OPHELIA: Good my lord,
 How does your honor for this many a day?
 HAMLET: I humbly thank you, well, well, well.
 OPHELIA: My lord, I have remembrances of yours
 That I have longèd long to re-deliver.
 I pray you now receive them.
- 95 HAMLET: No, not I,
 I never gave you aught.

1. That makes adversity so long-lived (as opposed to quickly ended in suicide). 2. Settlement; a paid-off account was marked "Quietus est" (Latin: It is laid to rest). 3. Both moral conscience and consciousness.

- OPHELIA: My honored lord, you know right well you did,
 And with them words of so sweet breath composed
 As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost,
 Take these again, for to the noble mind 100
 Rich gifts wax^o poor when givers prove unkind.
 There, my lord. grow
- HAMLET: Ha, ha! are you honest?^o chaste; truthful
- OPHELIA: My lord?
- HAMLET: Are you fair? 105
- OPHELIA: What means your lordship?
- HAMLET: That if you be honest and fair, your honesty should admit no discourse to^o your beauty. familiar conversation with
- OPHELIA: Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce^o than with honesty? dealings 110
- HAMLET: Ay, truly, for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness.
 This was sometimes a paradox,^o but now formerly an uncredited opinion the time gives it proof. I did love you once. 115
- OPHELIA: Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.
- HAMLET: You should not have believed me, for virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock^o but we shall relish^o of it. I sinful nature / taste loved you not.
- OPHELIA: I was the more deceived. 120
- HAMLET: Get thee to a nunnery.⁴ Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent^o honest, but moderately yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, with more offences at my beck^o than I command 125 have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant^o knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father? complete 130
- OPHELIA: At home, my lord.
- HAMLET: Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in's own house. Farewell.
- OPHELIA: O, help him, you sweet heavens!
- HAMLET: If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt 135 not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, farewell. Or if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool, for wise men know well enough what monsters⁵ you^o make of them. To a nunnery, go, and quickly too. Farewell. (women) 140

4. Here used in both its literal senses and as a slang term for brothel.

5. Alluding to the belief that cuckolds grew horns, but Hamlet may mean a more spiritual or psychological transformation as well.

OPHELIA: Heavenly powers, restore him!

HAMLET: I have heard of your paintings,^o too, well enough.

cosmetics

God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig, you amble, and you lisp;⁶ you nickname

of it

150 OPHELIA: O, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!

The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword,

Th' expectancy^o and rose^o of the fair state,

hope / ornament

The glass^o of fashion and the mould of form,⁸

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason

Like sweet bells jangled, out of time and harsh;

That unmatched form and feature of blown^o youth

full-blown

160 Blasted with ecstasy.^o O, woe is me

madness

T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

[Enter KING and POLONIUS.]

KING: Love! His affections^o do not that way tend, feelings

Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,

Was not like madness. There's something in his soul

165 O'er which his melancholy sits on brood,⁹

And I do doubt^o the hatch and the disclose^o

Will be some danger; which to prevent,

I have in quick determination

Thus set it down:^o he shall with speed to England

somewhat rooted

Whereon his brains still^o beating puts him thus constantly

175 From fashion of himself.¹ What think you on't?

POLONIUS: It shall do well. But yet do I believe

The origin and commencement of his grief

Sprung from neglected^o love.—How now, Ophelia?

unrequited

You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said,

180 We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please,

But if you hold it fit, after the play

6. Dance (or sing), walk, and talk affectedly.

7. You call things by fashionable (not God-given) names, and you blame your affectation on ignorance, or "play dumb." 8. Pattern or model of decorum. 9. That is, like a hen whose egg will soon "hatch" (line 166). 1. That is, "puts him" in a state unlike his normal self.

Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him
 To show his grief. Let her be round^o with him, blunt
 And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear^o earshot
 Of all their conference. If she find him not,² 185
 To England send him; or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.

KING: It shall be so.
 Madness in great ones must not unwatched go.
 [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A public room in the castle. Enter HAMLET and three of the PLAYERS.

HAMLET: Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue; but if you mouth^o it as speak many of our players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand thus, but use all gently, for in the very torrent, tempest, 5 and as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious^o bombastic periwig-pated^o fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,³ who for the most part bewigged 10 are capable of nothing but inexplicable dumb shows^o and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant. It out-herods Herod.⁴ Pray you avoid it. pantomimes

FIRST PLAYER: I warrant^o your honor. assure; guarantee

HAMLET: Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion 15 be your tutor. Suit the action to the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty^o of nature; for anything so o'erdone is from^o moderation / contrary to the purpose of playing, whose end both at the first, and 20 now, was and is, to hold as 'twere the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form^o and pressure.^o shape / image
 Now this overdone, or come tardy^o off, though it makes the faultily unskilful^o laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve, the undiscriminating 25 censure of the which one must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theatre of others. O, there be players that I have seen play—and heard others praise, and that highly—not to speak it profanely,⁵ that neither having th' accent of Christians, nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of 30

2. Does not discover his problem. 3. Spectators who paid least and had to stand. 4. Termagant, a "Saracen" deity, and the biblical Herod were stock characters in popular drama noted for their excesses of sound and fury. 5. To speak blasphemy (in what he is about to say).

nature's journeymen⁶ had made men, and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.

FIRST PLAYER: I hope we have reformed that indifferently° with us, sir.

somewhat

35 HAMLET: O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them, for there be of° them that will themselves laugh, to set° on some quantity of barren° spectators to laugh too, though in the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go, make you ready. [Exeunt PLAYERS.]

*some of / urge

[Enter POLONIUS, GUILDENSTERN, and ROSENCRANTZ.]

How now, my lord? Will the king hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS: And the queen too, and that presently.

45 HAMLET: Bid the players make haste. [Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord. [Exeunt they two.]

HAMLET: What, ho, Horatio!

[Enter HORATIO.]

HORATIO: Here, sweet lord, at your service.

50 HAMLET: Horatio, thou art e'en as just° a man

As e'er my conversation coped° withal.

*honest; balanced

HORATIO: O my dear lord!

HAMLET: Nay, do not think I flatter,

For what advancement may I hope from thee,

That no revenue hast but thy good spirits

55 To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flattered?

No, let the candied° tongue lick absurd pomp,

And crook the pregnant° hinges of the knee

Where thrift° may follow fawning. Dost thou hear?

Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice

60 And could of° men distinguish her election, S'hath sealed thee for herself,⁷ for thou hast been

As one in suff'ring all that suffers nothing,

A man that Fortune's buffets and rewards

Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and blest are those

65 Whose blood° and judgment are so well commingled

That they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger

To sound what stop° she please. Give me that man

That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him

In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,

HAMLET: They are coming to the play. I must be idle.^o

Get you a place.

KING: How fares our cousin^o Hamlet?

HAMLET: Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon's dish. I eat the air, promise-crammed.¹ You cannot feed capons^o so.

KING: I have nothing with this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.

for slaughter 90

HAMLET: No, nor mine now. [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' th' university, you say?

POLONIUS: That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

95

HAMLET: What did you enact?

POLONIUS: I did enact Julius Cæsar. I was killed i' th' Capitol; Brutus killed me.

HAMLET: It was a brute part of him to kill so capital a calf^o
 there. Be the players ready?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord, they stay^o upon your patience.^o

QUEEN: Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

HAMLET: No, good mother, here's metal more attractive.

POLONIUS: [To the KING.] O, ho! do you mark that?

HAMLET: Lady, shall I lie in your lap?

105

[Lying down at OPHELIA's feet.]

OPHELIA: No, my lord.

8. In classical mythology, the god Vulcan is a blacksmith. 9. And escape (my) detection, I will repay the theft (you can hold me accountable). 1. Chameleons were believed to survive on air alone. Hamlet also puns on "heir," referring to Claudius's insubstantial promises regarding succession.

HAMLET: I mean, my head upon your lap?

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: Do you think I meant country matters?²

110 OPHELIA: I think nothing, my lord.

HAMLET: That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs.

OPHELIA: What is, my lord?

HAMLET: Nothing.

OPHELIA: You are merry, my lord.

115 HAMLET: Who, I?

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: O God, your only° jig-maker! What should a man do but be merry? For look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within's° two hours.

120 OPHELIA: Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

HAMLET: So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.³ O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year, but by'r lady 'a must build 125 churches then, or else shall 'a suffer not thinking on,° with the hobby-horse, whose epitaph is "For O, for O, the hobby-horse is forgot!"⁴

The trumpets sound. Dumb Show follows. Enter a KING and a QUEEN very lovingly; the QUEEN embracing him and he her. She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him. He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck. He lies him down upon a bank of flowers; she, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon come in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper's ears, and leaves him. The QUEEN returns, finds the KING dead, makes passionate action. The POISONER with some three or four come in again, seem to condole with her. The dead body is carried away. The POISONER woos the QUEEN with gifts; she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love. [Exeunt.]

OPHELIA: What means this, my lord?

HAMLET: Marry, this is miching mallecho;⁵ it means mischief.

130 OPHELIA: Belike this show imports° the argument° of the play.

[Enter PROLOGUE.]

HAMLET: We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel°; they'll tell all.

a secret

2. Presumably, rustic misbehavior, but here and elsewhere in this exchange Hamlet treats Ophelia to some ribald puns. "Nothing" (line 110), for example, suggests female genitalia, "thing" male.

3. Expensive furs, but also meaning "black." Hamlet simultaneously forswears his ascetic mourning and vows to keep it. 4. In traditional games and dances, the hobbyhorse was a man with a mock horse's body strapped around his waist. "The hobbyhorse is forgot" seems to have been a ballad refrain.

5. Sneaking crime (from the Spanish malhecho, "evil deed").

OPHELIA: Will 'a tell us what this show meant?

HAMLET: Ay, or any show that you will show him. Be not you ashamed to show, he'll not shame to tell you what it means.

135

OPHELIA: You are naught,^o you are naught. I'll mark^o the play.

PROLOGUE: For us, and for our tragedy,

Here stooping to your clemency,

We beg your hearing patiently.

[Exit.]

HAMLET: Is this a prologue, or the posy⁶ of a ring?

140

OPHELIA: 'Tis brief, my lord.

HAMLET: As woman's love.

[Enter the PLAYER KING and QUEEN.]

PLAYER KING: Full thirty times hath Phæbus' cart⁷ gone round

6. Motto engraved inside. 7. The speech contains several references to Greek mythology. Phoebus was the sun god, and his chariot or "cart" is the sun. The "salt wash" of Neptune is the ocean; Tellus was an earth goddess, and her "orbèd ground" is the earth or globe. Hymen was the god of marriage.

- PLAYER KING: I do believe you think what now you speak, 175 But what we do determine oft we break.
Purpose° is but the slave to memory, Intention
Of violent birth, but poor validity;° enduring strength
Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,
But fall unshaken when they mellow be.
 180 Most necessary 'tis that we forget
To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt.⁸
What to ourselves in passion we propose,
The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.
The violence of either grief or joy
 185 Their own enactures with themselves destroy.⁹
Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.[°] small, unforeseen event
This world is not for aye,[°] nor 'tis not strange always; eternity
That even our loves should with our fortunes change; 190 For 'tis a question left us yet to prove,
Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love.

The poor advanced° makes friends of enemies; promoted (man)
And hitherto° doth love on fortune tend,[°] to this extent / attend

And who in want a hollow friend doth try,[°] test Directly seasons him° his enemy. ripens him into
But orderly to end where I begun,
Our wills and fates do so contrary run 200 That our devices still° are overthrown; plans always
Our thoughts are ours, their ends° none of our own. results
So think thou wilt no second husband wed,
But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.
 PLAYER QUEEN: Nor earth to me give food, nor heaven light,
 205 Sport and repose lock from me day and night,
To desperation turn my trust and hope,
An anchor's cheer° in prison be my scope, anchorite's (hermit's) food

Meet what I would have well, and it destroy, 210 Both here and hence pursue me lasting strife,
If once a widow, ever I be wife!
 HAMLET: If she should break it now!
 PLAYER KING: 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile.
My spirits grow dull, and fain° I would beguile gladly
The tedious day with sleep. [Sleeps.]
 215 PLAYER QUEEN: Sleep rock thy brain,
And never come mischance between us twain! [Exit.]
 HAMLET: Madam, how like you this play?
 QUEEN: The lady doth protest too much, methinks.

8. That is, to fulfill those promises made to ourselves. 9. Destroy themselves and the motive for action they provided.

HAMLET: O, but she'll keep her word.

KING: Have you heard the argument?^o Is there no offence
in't? plot 220

HAMLET: No, no, they do but jest, poison in jest; no offence
i' th' world.

KING: What do you call the play?

HAMLET: "The Mouse-trap." Marry, how? Tropically.¹ This 225 play is the image of a murder done in Vienna. Gonzago is the duke's name; his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon.
'Tis a knavish piece of work, but what of that? Your majesty, and we that have free^o souls, it touches^o us not. Let guiltless / wounds; concerns the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung.² 230

[Enter LUCIANUS.]

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the king.

OPHELIA: You are as good as a chorus,³ my lord.

HAMLET: I could interpret between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying.⁴

OPHELIA: You are keen,^o my lord, you are keen. sharply satirical 235

HAMLET: It would cost you a groaning to take off mine edge.⁵

OPHELIA: Still better,^o and worse.^o wittier / more obscene

HAMLET: So you mistake your husbands.⁶—Begin, mur-derer. Leave thy damnable^o faces and begin. Come, the grimacing croaking raven doth bellow for revenge. 240

LUCIANUS: Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time

With Hecate's ban⁷ thrice blasted, thrice infected,

On wholesome life usurp immediately. [Pours the poison in his ears.]

HAMLET: 'A poisons him i' th' garden for his estate.^o His position; state name's Gonzago. The story is extant, and written in very choice Italian. You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife. 250

OPHELIA: The king rises.

HAMLET: What, frightened with false fire?^o fireworks; blanks

QUEEN: How fares my lord?

POLONIUS: Give o'er the play.

KING: Give me some light. Away! 255

1. Figuratively; involving a rhetorical trope, with a possible pun on "trap." 2. A "galled jade" is a horse with a sore back. The "withers" are the ridge between a horse's shoulders; "unwrung withers" are not chafed by the harness. 3. Character(s) who explain, "interpret" (line 233), or comment on the action, as in ancient Greek drama and Elizabethan puppet shows.

4. Flirting. Hamlet (also) uses "interpret" here in the sense of acting as a go-between for two lovers.

5. It would cost you a groaning (as in sexual intercourse or childbirth) to take the "edge" off my ("keen" or sharp) wit or sexual appetite. 6. With these false promises ("for better and for worse"), you take your husbands in marriage and cheat on them. 7. Curse of Hecate, the goddess of witchcraft in classical myth.

POLONIUS: Lights, lights, lights! [Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.]

HAMLET:

Why, let the stricken deer go weep,⁸

HORATIO: Half a share.

265

HAMLET: A whole one, I.

For thou dost know, O Damon dear,³

This realm dismantled was

Of Jove himself, and now reigns here

A very, very—peacock.

270

HORATIO: You might have rhymed.⁴

HAMLET: O good Horatio, I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

HORATIO: Very well, my lord.

HAMLET: Upon the talk of the poisoning.

275

HORATIO: I did very well note° him.

HAMLET: Ah, ha! Come, some music. Come, the recorders.

For if the king like not the comedy.

Why then, belike he likes it not, perdy.⁵

Come, some music.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

280

GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

HAMLET: Sir, a whole history.

GUILDENSTERN: The king, sir—

HAMLET: Ay, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN: Is in his retirement° marvellous

HAMLET: With drink, sir?

GUILDENSTERN: No, my lord, with choler.⁶

HAMLET: Your wisdom should show itself more richer° to signify this to the doctor, for for me to put him to his purgation⁷ would perhaps plunge him into more choler.

resourceful

290

8. Deer were thought to weep when mortally wounded. 9. That's the way of the world. 1. Decorated with slashes. Provincial roses: large rosettes concealing shoelaces. 2. Pack or troupe of actors. Fellowship: profit-sharing partnership (such as Shakespeare had in the Lord Chamberlain's Men). 3. Damon and Pythias were legendary ideals of friendship. 4. The expected rhyme word (for "was," line 267) would be "ass." 5. Par Dieu (French for "by God"). 6. Bile, the bodily humor or fluid believed, in too great a quantity, to produce both anger and indigestion. "Choler" can thus also mean both "anger" and "indigestion." 7. A multiple pun: bloodletting (a medical treatment); spiritual purging (confession and absolution); legal purging (clearing oneself of a crime).

- GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame,^o and start^o not so wildly from my affair. order / jump away
- HAMLET: I am tame, sir. Pronounce.
- GUILDENSTERN: The queen your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you. 295
- HAMLET: You are welcome.
- GUILDENSTERN: Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed. If it shall please you to make me a wholesome^o answer, I will do your mother's commandment. If not, your pardon^o and my return shall be the end of my business. reasonable; sane
- HAMLET: Sir, I cannot. permission to go 300
- ROSENCRANTZ: What, my lord?
- HAMLET: Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command, or rather, as you say, my mother. Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother, you say— 305
- ROSENCRANTZ: Then thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.^o bewilderment
- HAMLET: O wonderful son, that can so stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of his mother's admiration? Impart.^o 310 Do tell
- ROSENCRANTZ: She desires to speak with you in her closet ere you go to bed.
- HAMLET: We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us? 315
- ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you once did love me.
- HAMLET: And do still, by these pickers and stealers.⁸
- ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely^o bar the door upon your own liberty, if you deny your griefs to your friend. securely 320
- HAMLET: Sir, I lack advancement.
- ROSENCRANTZ: How can that be, when you have the voice of the king himself for your succession in Denmark?
- HAMLET: Ay, sir, but "while the grass grows"—the proverb⁹ is something^o musty. somewhat 325
- [Enter the PLAYERS with recorders.]
- O, the recorders! Let me see one. To withdraw^o with you step aside; speak privately
—why do you go about to recover the wind of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?¹
- GUILDENSTERN: O my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.² 330

8. Hands. (The Anglican catechism includes a promise to "keep my hands from picking and stealing, and my tongue from evil speaking, lying, and slandering.") 9. The proverb ends "the horse starves." 1. The simile refers to hunting. Hamlet asks why Guildenstern is attempting to get windward of him, as if he would drive him into a net ("toil"). 2. If I have been discourteous in doing my duty, my love (for you) is to blame.

HAMLET: I do not well understand that. Will you play upon this pipe?

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, I cannot.

HAMLET: I pray you.

335 GUILDENSTERN: Believe me, I cannot.

HAMLET: I do beseech you.

GUILDENSTERN: I know no touch of it, my lord.

HAMLET: It is as easy as lying. Govern these ventages^o with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, 340 and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.^o finger holes
finger holes; notes

GUILDENSTERN: But these cannot I command to any utt'rance of harmony. I have not the skill.

HAMLET: Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you 345 make of me! You would play upon me, you would seem to know my stops, you would pluck out the heart of my mystery, you would sound^o me from my lowest note to the top of my compass;^o and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ, yet cannot you make it speak.
350 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret³ me, you cannot play upon me.

[Enter POLONIUS.]

God bless you, sir!

POLONIUS: My lord, the queen would speak with you, and 355 presently.^o immediately

HAMLET: Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?

POLONIUS: By th' mass, and 'tis like a camel indeed.

HAMLET: Methinks it is like a weasel.

360 POLONIUS: It is backed like a weasel.

HAMLET: Or like a whale.

POLONIUS: Very like a whale.

HAMLET: Then I will come to my mother by and by. [Aside.]
They fool me to the top of my bent.⁴—I will come by and 365 by.

POLONIUS: I will say so. [Exit.]

HAMLET: "By and by" is easily said. Leave me, friends.
[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time of night,
When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out
370 Contagion to this world. Now could I drink hot blood,
And do such bitter business as the day
Would quake to look on. Soft, now to my mother.

3. A pun: annoy and play a guitar or similar instrument using the "frets" or small bars on the neck. 4. They treat me as an utter fool or they go along with my foolishness to its limit or to the limit of my endurance.

O heart, lose not thy nature;° let not ever natural affection
 The soul of Nero⁵ enter this firm° bosom. resolute
 Let me be cruel, not unnatural;
 I will speak daggers to her, but use none. 375
 My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites—
 How in my words somever⁶ she be shent,° rebuked
 To give them seals° never, my soul, consent! [Exit.] fulfillment in action

Scene 3

A room in the castle. Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: I like him not,° nor stands it safe with us distrust him
 To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you.
 I your commission will forthwith dispatch,
 And he to England shall along with you.
 The terms° of our estate° may not endure responsibilities / position 5
 Hazard so near's as doth hourly grow
 Out of his brows.⁷

GUILDENSTERN: We will ourselves provide,° equip (for the journey)
 Most holy and religious fear° it is care
 To keep those many many bodies safe
 That live and feed upon your majesty. 10

ROSENCRANTZ: The single and peculiar° life is bound individual; private
 With all the strength and armor of the mind
 To keep itself from noyance,° but much more harm
 That spirit upon whose weal° depends and rests well-being
 The lives of many. The cess° of majesty cessation; decease 15
 Dies not alone, but like a gulf° doth draw whirlpool
 What's near it with it. It is a massy° wheel massive Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
 To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
 Are mortised° and adjoined, which° when it falls, affixed / so that 20
 Each small annexment, petty consequence,
 Attends° the boist'rous ruin. Never alone Accompanies
 Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.

KING: Arm° you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage, Prepare
 For we will fetters put about this fear, 25
 Which now goes too free-footed.

ROSENCRANTZ: We will haste us.
[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
[Enter POLONIUS.]

POLONIUS: My lord, he's going to his mother's closet.
 Behind the arras I'll convey° myself station; put

5. The Roman emperor Nero, known for his excesses, was believed to have murdered his mother.

6. However much by my words. 7. An ambiguous term suggesting "brain," "expressions," or "effrontery."

To hear the process.^o I'll warrant she'll tax^o him home,^o proceedings / rebuke /
 30 And as you said, and wisely was it said, sharply
 'Tis meet that some more audience than a mother,
 Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear
 The speech, of vantage.⁸ Fare you well, my liege.
 I'll call upon you ere you go to bed,
 And tell you what I know.
 35 KING: Thanks, dear my lord.
 [Exit POLONIUS.]
 O, my offence is rank, it smells to heaven;
 It hath the primal eldest curse⁹ upon't,
 A brother's murder. Pray can I not,
 Though inclination be as sharp as will.
 40 My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent,
 And like a man to double business¹ bound,
 I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
 And both neglect. What if this cursèd hand
 Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,
 45 Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens
 To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
 But to confront the visage of offence?²
 And what's in prayer but this twofold force,
 To be forestallèd^o ere we come to fall, prevented
 50 Or pardoned being down? Then I'll look up.
 My fault is past, But, O, what form of prayer
 Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"?
 That cannot be, since I am still possessed
 Of those effects^o for which I did the murder— gains
 55 My crown, mine own ambition, and my queen.
 May one be pardoned and retain th' offence?³
 In the corrupted currents of this world
 Offence's gilded⁴ hand may shove by justice,
 And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize⁵ itself
 60 Buys out the law. But 'tis not so above.
 There is no shuffling;^o there the action lies evasion
 In his true nature,⁶ and we ourselves compelled,
 Even to the teeth and forehead of^o our faults, face-to-face with
 To give in evidence.^o What then? What rests?^o testify / remains to be done 65 Try what repentance can. What can it not?
 Yet what can it when one cannot repent?
 O wretched state! O bosom black as death!
 O limèd⁷ soul, that struggling to be free

8. In addition, or from an advantageous position. 9. That of Cain, who murdered his brother, Abel (Gen. 4.10–12). 1. Two mutually opposed goals. 2. What purpose has mercy if not to confront or oppose sin face-to-face. 3. That is, benefits of the offense or crime. 4. Bearing gold as a bribe. 5. Prize gained by wickedness. 6. There the deed (the original crime or sin) appears in its true form, and the trial, or legal proceedings, are properly conducted. 7. Caught as with birdlime, a sticky substance smeared on twigs to catch birds.

Art more engaged!^o Help, angels! Make assay.^o entangled / some attempt
 Bow, stubborn knees, and heart with strings of steel, 70
 Be soft as sinews of the new-born babe.
 All may be well. [He kneels.]

[Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET: Now might I do it pat,^o now 'a is a-praying, easily
 And now I'll do't—and so 'a goes to heaven,
 And so am I revenged. That would be scanned.⁸ 75
 A villain kills my father, and for that,
 I, his sole son, do this same villain send
 To heaven.
 Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.
 'A took my father grossly, full of bread,⁹ 80
 With all his crimes broad blown,^o as flush^o as May; full-blown / vigorous
 And how his audit^o stands who knows save heaven? spiritual account
 But in our circumstance and course of thought
 'Tis heavy with him;¹ and am I then revenged
 To take him^o in the purging of his soul, (Claudius) 85
 When he is fit and seasoned^o for his passage? ready; prepared
 No.
 Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent.^o design; occasion
 When he is drunk, asleep, or in his rage,
 Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed, 90
 At game a-swearing, or about some act
 That has no relish^o of salvation in't— flavor; trace
 Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
 And that his soul may be as damned and black
 As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays.^o waits 95
 This physic^o but prolongs thy sickly days. [Exit.] medicine
 KING: [Rising.] My words fly up, my thoughts remain below.
 Words without thoughts never to heaven go. [Exit.]

Scene 4

The Queen's chamber. Enter QUEEN and POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: 'A will come straight.^o Look you lay home to him.² immediately
 Tell him his pranks have been too broad^o to bear with, outrageous
 And that your grace hath screen'd and stood between Much heat and him. I'll silence me even here.
 Pray you be round^o with him. blunt 5
 HAMLET: [Within.] Mother, mother, mother!
 QUEEN: I'll warrant you. Fear^o me not. Doubt

8. That deserves careful evaluation. 9. In a state of sin and without fasting.

1. Hamlet suggests that from "our"—human, earthly—perspective, as opposed to that of "heaven" (line 82), his father's spiritual account seems to be heavily weighted against him.

2. Be sure that you are sharp with him.

Withdraw, I hear him coming.

[POLONIUS goes behind the arras. Enter HAMLET.]

HAMLET: Now, mother, what's the matter?

10 QUEEN: Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended.

HAMLET: Mother, you have my father much offended.

QUEEN: Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.

HAMLET: Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue.

QUEEN: Why, how now,^o Hamlet?

what's this

HAMLET: What's the matter now?

QUEEN: Have you forgot me?³

15 HAMLET: No, by the rood,^o not so.

You are the queen, your husband's brother's wife,

And would it were not so, you are my mother.

QUEEN: Nay, then I'll set those to you that can speak.⁴

HAMLET: Come, come, and sit you down. You shall not budge.

20 You go not till I set you up a glass^o

Where you may see the inmost part of you.

QUEEN: What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?

Help, ho!

POLONIUS: [Behind.] What, ho! help!

25 HAMLET: [Draws.] How now, a rat?

Dead for a ducat, dead!⁵

[Kills POLONIUS with a pass through the arras.]

POLONIUS: [Behind.] O, I am slain!

QUEEN: O me, what hast thou done?

HAMLET: Nay, I know not.

Is it the king?

30 QUEEN: O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!

HAMLET: A bloody deed!—almost as bad, good mother,

As kill a king and marry with his brother.

QUEEN: As kill a king?

HAMLET: Ay, lady, it was my word.

[Parting the arras.]

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!

35 I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune.

Thou find'st to be too busy^o is some danger.—

QUEEN: What have I done that thou dar'st wag thy tongue

In noise so rude against me?

3. Forgotten the respect you owe to me as your mother. 4. That is, those who can deal with someone as impossibly rude as you. 5. I bet a ducat I have killed it. 6. Plated it with brass.

HAMLET:	Such an act
	That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,
	Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose	45
	From the fair forehead of an innocent love.
	And sets a blister° there, makes marriage-vows	brand
	As false as dicers' oaths. O, such a deed
	As from the body of contraction° plucks	marriage contract
	The very soul, and sweet religion makes	50
	A rhapsody° of words. Heaven's face does glow°	meaningless jumble / blush
	O'er this solidity and compound mass°	solid earth
	With heated visage, as against the doom°—	Judgement Day
	Is thought-sick at the act.
QUEEN:	Ay me, what act
	That roars so loud and thunders in the index?°	table of contents 55
HAMLET:	Look here upon this picture and on this,
	The counterfeit presentment° of two brothers.	painted portrayal
	See what a grace was seated on this brow:
	Hyperion's ⁷ curls, the front° of Jove himself,	forehead
	An eye like Mars, to threaten and command,	60
	A station° like the herald Mercury	bearing
	New lighted° on a heaven-kissing hill—	Newly alighted
	A combination and a form indeed
	Where every god did seem to set his seal,°	mark of approval
	To give the world assurance of a man.	65
	This was your husband. Look you now what follows.
	Here is your husband, like a mildewed ear°	(of grain)
	Blasting° his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?	Infecting
	Could you on this fair mountain leave° to feed,	cease
	And batten° on this moor? Ha! have you eyes?	feed greedily 70
	You cannot call it love, for at your age
	The heyday in the blood ⁸ is tame, it's humble,
	And waits upon the judgment, and what judgment
	Would step from this to this? Sense° sure you have	Sensation
	Else could you not have motion, but sure that sense	75
	Is apoplexed° for madness would not err,	paralyzed
	Nor sense° to ecstasy° was ne'er so thrall'd	reason / madness
	But it reserved some quantity° of choice	power
	To serve in such a difference. ⁹ What devil was't
	That thus hath cozened° you at hoodman-blind? ¹	cheated 80
	Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
	Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans ² all,
	Or but a sickly part of one true sense

7. These lines refer to various figures from classical myth: Hyperion, titan of heavenly light; Jove (or Jupiter), the god of sky and thunder and king of the gods; Mars, god of war; and Mercury, messenger or "herald" of the gods. 8. The excitement of sexual passion. 9. To make such a distinction.

1. Blindman's buff, traditional game, a variant of tag, in which the seeker is blindfolded. 2. Without (French). Compare Psalm 115. 5–6 on idolators: "Eyes have they, but they see not: They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not."

- Could not so mope.³ O shame! where is thy blush?
 85 Rebellious hell,
 If thou canst mutine^o in a matron's bones, mutiny
 To flaming youth let virtue be as wax
 And melt in her^o own fire. Proclaim no shame (youth's)
 When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,^o order to attack
 90 Since frost itself as actively doth burn,
 And reason panders^o will. pimps for
- QUEEN: O Hamlet, speak no more!
 Thou turn'st my eyes into my very soul;
 And there I see such black and grainèd^o spots engrained
 As will not leave^o their tinct.^o lose / color; tincture
- HAMLET: Nay, but to live
 95 In the rank sweat of an enseamèd^o bed, greasy
 Stewed in curruption, honeying and making love
 Over the nasty sty—
- QUEEN: O, speak to me no more!
 These words like daggers enter in my ears;
 No more, sweet Hamlet.
- HAMLET: A murderer and a villain,
 100 A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe
 Of your precedent^o lord, a vice⁴ of kings, previous
 A cutpurse^o of the empire and the rule, pickpocket
 That from a shelf the precious diadem stole
 And put it in his pocket—
- 105 QUEEN: No more.
- [Enter GHOST.]
- HAMLET: A king of shreds and patches—⁵
 Save me and hover o'er me with your wings,
 You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?
- QUEEN: Alas, he's mad.
- 110 HAMLET: Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
 That lapsed in time and passion⁶ lets go by
 Th' important^o acting of your dread command? urgent
 O, say!
- GHOST: Do not forget. This visitation
 115 Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.
 But look, amazement on thy mother sits.
 O, step between her and her fighting soul!
 Conceit^o in weakest bodies strongest works. Imagination
 Speak to her, Hamlet.
- HAMLET: How is it with you, lady?
- 120 QUEEN: Alas, how is't with you,
 That you do bend your eye on vacancy,

3. Could not be so obtuse or stupid. 4. The "Vice" in morality plays was a clown or buffoon who personified evil. 5. Motley, the costume of a jester. 6. That allowed time to pass and the passion (for revenge) to fade.

- And with th' incorporal^o air do hold discourse? bodiless
 Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep,
 And as the sleeping soldiers in th' alarm,
 Your bedded^o hairs like life in excrements⁷ (formerly) flat 125
 Start up and stand an end. O gentle son,
 Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
 Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?
 HAMLET: On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares.
 His form^o and cause conjoined,^o preaching to stones, appearance / collaborating 130
 Would make them capable.—Do not look upon me,
 Lest with this piteous action you convert
 My stern effects.^o Then what I have to do intended acts
 Will want true color—tears perchance for blood.⁸
 QUEEN: To whom do you speak this? 135
 HAMLET: Do you see nothing there?
 QUEEN: Nothing at all, yet all that is I see.
 HAMLET: Nor did you nothing hear?
 QUEEN: No, nothing but ourselves.
 HAMLET: Why, look you there. Look how it steals away. 140
 My father, in his habit^o as^o he lived! dress and bearing / as if
 Look where he goes even now out at the portal.
 [Exit GHOST.]
 QUEEN: This is the very coinage of your brain.
 This bodiless creation ecstasy
 Is very cunning^o in. skilled
 HAMLET: Ecstasy? 145
 My pulse as yours doth temperately keep time,
 And makes as healthful music. It is not madness
 That I have uttered. Bring me to the test,
 And I the matter will re-word,^o which madness repeat exactly
 Would gambol^o from. Mother, for love of grace, skitter away 150
 Lay not that flattering unction^o to your soul, ointment
 That not your trespass but my madness speaks.
 It will but skin^o and film the ulcerous place cover
 Whiles rank corruption, mining^o all within, undermining Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven, 155
 Repent what's past, avoid what is to come.
 And do not spread the compost on the weeds,
 To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue,^o virtuous exhortation
 For in the fatness of these pursy^o times bloated
 Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg, 160
 Yea, curb^o and woo for leave^o to do him good. bow / permission
 QUEEN: O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.
 HAMLET: O, throw away the worser part of it,
 And live the purer with the other half.

7. In insensate outgrowths (a term used of nails and hair). 8. That is, he might shed (colorless) tears instead of blood.

165 Good night—but go not to my uncle's bed.
 Assume a° virtue, if you have it not. Put on
 That monster custom° who all sense doth eat habit
 Of habits devil,° is angel yet in this, devilish
 That to the use° of actions fair and good habitual practice
 170 He likewise gives a frock or livery
 That aptly° is put on. Refrain tonight,
 And that shall lend a kind of easiness easily
 To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
 For use almost can change the stamp of nature,
 175 And either curb the devil, or throw him out
 With wondrous potency. Once more, good night,
 And when you are desirous to be blest,
 I'll blessing beg of you. For this same lord
 I do repent; but heaven hath pleased it so,
 180 To punish me with this, and this with me,
 That I must be their scourge and minister.
 I will bestow° him and will answer well° dispose of / take responsibility for
 The death I gave him. So, again, good night.
 I must be cruel only to be kind.
 185 Thus bad begins and worse remains behind.° to follow
 One word more, good lady.

QUEEN: What shall I do?

HAMLET: Not this, by no means, that I bid you do:
 Let the bloat° king tempt you again to bed, bloated
 Pinch wanton° on your cheek, call you his mouse, lewdly
 190 And let him, for a pair of reechy° kisses, filthy
 Or paddling in° your neck with his damned fingers, fondling
 Make you to ravel° all this matter out, reveal
 That I essentially am not in madness,
 But mad in craft. 'Twere good you let him know, 195 For who that's but° a queen, fair, sober, wise, only
 Would from a paddock,° from a bat, a gib,° toad / tom cat
 Such dear concernings° hide? Who would so do? vital affairs
 No, in despite of sense and secrecy,
 Unpeg the basket on the house's top,
 200 Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,
 To try conclusions,° in the basket creep test results
 And break your own neck down.⁹

QUEEN: Be thou assured, if words be made of breath
 And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
 205 What thou hast said to me.

HAMLET: I must to England; you know that?

QUEEN: Alack,
 I had forgot. 'Tis so concluded on.

9. Apparently a reference to a now-lost fable in which an ape opens a cage of birds on a rooftop. Seeing the birds fly away and thinking that if he were in the basket he, too, could fly, the ape tries the experiment and breaks his neck.

HAMLET: There's letters sealed, and my two school-fellows,
 Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,
 They bear the mandate; they must sweep^o my way prepare 210
 And marshal me to knavery. Let it work,^o proceed
 For 'tis the sport to have the enginer
 Hoist with his own petard;¹ and't shall go hard
 But I will delve one yard below their mines
 And blow them at the moon. O, 'tis most sweet 215
 When in one line two crafts directly meet.
 This man shall set me packing.
 I'll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
 Mother, good night. Indeed, this counsellor
 Is now most still, most secret, and most grave, 220
 Who was in life a foolish prating knave.
 Come sir, to draw toward an end with you.
 Good night, mother.

[Exit the QUEEN. Then exit HAMLET tugging POLONIUS.]

ACT IV

Scene 1

A room in the castle. Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: There's matter in these sighs, these profound heaves,
 You must translate;^o 'tis fit we understand them. explain
 Where is your son?

QUEEN: Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen tonight! 5

KING: What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

QUEEN: Mad as the sea and wind when both contend
 Which is the mightier. In his lawless fit,
 Behind the arras hearing something stir,
 Whips out his rapier, cries "A rat, a rat!" 10
 And in this brainish apprehension^o kills brain-sick notion
 The unseen good old man.

KING: O heavy deed!
 It had been so with us^o had we been there. me (royal "we")
 His liberty is full of threats to all—
 To you yourself, to us, to every one. 15

1. The "enginer," or creator of military "engines" or devices, is here described as being blown up ("hoist") by a bomb of his own construction ("his own petard"). The military imagery continues in the succeeding lines where Hamlet describes himself as digging ("delving") a countermine or tunnel beneath the one Claudius is digging to defeat Hamlet. In line 216, the two tunnels and devious plots ("crafts") unexpectedly meet.

Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?°
 It will be laid to° us, whose providence°
 Should have kept short,° restrained, and out of haunt,²
 This mad young man. But so much was our love,
 20 We would not understand what was most fit;
 But, like the owner° of a foul disease,
 To keep it from divulging,° let it feed
 Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?
 QUEEN: To draw apart the body he hath killed,
 25 O'er whom his very madness, like some ore
 Among a mineral° of metals base,
 Shows itself pure: 'a weeps for what is done.
 KING: O Gertrude, come away!
 The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch
 30 But we will ship him hence, and this vile deed
 We must with all our majesty and skill
 Both countenance° and excuse. Ho, Guildenstern!
 [Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
 Friends both, go join you with some further aid.
 Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,
 35 And from his mother's closet hath he dragged him.
 Go seek him out; speak fair, and bring the body
 Into the chapel. I pray you haste in this.
 [Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
 Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends
 And let them know both what we mean to do
 40 And what's untimely done;
 Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter,°
 As level° as the cannon to his blank,°
 Transports his poisoned shot—may miss our name,
 And hit the woundless° air. O, come away!
 45 My soul is full of discord and dismay. [Exeunt.]

Scene 2

A passageway. Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Safely stowed.
 ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN: [Within.] Hamlet! Lord
 Hamlet!
 HAMLET: But soft, what noise? Who calls on Hamlet?
 O, here they come.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and OTHERS.]

5 ROSENCRANTZ: What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?

2. Public gatherings.

HAMLET: Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin.

ROSENCRANTZ: Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence
And bear it to the chapel.

HAMLET: Do not believe it.

ROSENCRANTZ: Believe what?

HAMLET: That I can keep your counsel and not mine own.³

Besides, to be demanded of^o a sponge—what replication^o questioned by / reply should be made by the son of a king?

ROSENCRANTZ: Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

HAMLET: Ay, sir, that soaks up the king's countenance,^o his favor 15 rewards, his authorities. But such officers do the king best service in the end. He keeps them like an apple in the corner of his jaw, first mouthed to be last swallowed.
When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you and, sponge, you shall be dry again. 20

ROSENCRANTZ: I understand you not, my lord.

HAMLET: I am glad of it. A knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you must tell us where the body is,
and go with us to the king. 25

HAMLET: The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body.⁴

The king is a thing—

GUILDENSTERN: A thing, my lord!

HAMLET: Of nothing. Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all 30
after.⁵ [Exeunt.]

Scene 3

A room in the castle. Enter KING.

KING: I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!

Yet must not we put the strong law on him.

He's loved of^o the distracted^o multitude, by / confused; unreasonable

Who like not in their judgment but their eyes,⁶ 5

And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge^o is weighed, punishment

But never the offence. To bear^o all smooth and even, manage

This sudden sending him away must seem

Deliberate pause.^o Diseases desperate grown Careful planning

By desperate appliance^o are relieved, remedy 10

Or not at all.

[Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and all the rest.]

3. Hamlet plays on two senses of "counsel": that I can follow your advice and not keep my secret.

4. A riddle. Hamlet may mean that Polonius is gone to the afterlife with King Hamlet but King Claudius is still alive; or he may refer to the legal theory of the "king's two bodies" (one the king's literal, physical, mortal body; the other the figurative, immortal body of the state). 5. Apparently a reference to a children's game like hide-and-seek. 6. Who choose not by reason but by external appearance.

How now! what hath befall'n?

ROSENCRANTZ: Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord,
We cannot get from him.

KING: But where is he?

ROSENCRANTZ: Without,^o my lord; guarded, to know^o your pleasure.

Outside / await

KING: Bring him before us.

15 ROSENCRANTZ: Ho! bring in the lord.

[They enter with HAMLET.]

KING: Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?

HAMLET: At supper.

KING: At supper? Where?

HAMLET: Not where he eats, but where 'a is eaten. A certain 20 convocation of politic^o worms are e'en^o at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet. We fat all creatures else^o to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service^o—two dishes, but to one table. That's the end.

25 KING: Alas, alas!

HAMLET: A man may fish with the worm that hath eat of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.

KING: What dost thou mean by this?

HAMLET: Nothing but to show you how a king may go a 30 progress^o through the guts of a beggar.

KING: Where is Polonius?

HAMLET: In heaven. Send thither to see. If your messenger find him not there, seek him i' th' other place yourself.
But if, indeed, you find him not within this month, you

35 shall nose^o him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

HAMLET: For England?

KING: Ay, Hamlet.

HAMLET: Good.

45 KING: So it is, if thou knew'st our purposes.

HAMLET: I see a cherub⁷ that sees them. But come, for England!

Farewell, dear mother.

KING: Thy loving father, Hamlet.

7. The keen-sighted second order of angels, cherubim symbolized heavenly knowledge.

HAMLET: My mother. Father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh.⁸ So, my mother. Come, for England. [Exit.] 50

KING: Follow him at foot;^o tempt him with speed aboard. his heel
 Delay it not; I'll have him hence tonight.
 Away! for everything is sealed and done
 That else leans^o on th' affair. Pray you make haste. bears
 [Exeunt all but the KING.]

And, England,^o if my love thou hold'st at aught^o— King of England / any value 55
 As my great power thereof may give thee sense,
 Since yet thy cicatrice^o looks raw and red scar
 After the Danish sword, and thy free awe
 Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set^o set aside
 Our sovereign process,^o which imports at full mandate 60
 By letters congruing to^o that effect according with
 The present^o death of Hamlet. Do it, England,
 For like the hectic^o in my blood he rages, immediate
 And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done, fever
 How'er my haps,^o my joys were ne'er begun. [Exit.] fortunes 65

Scene 4

Near Elsinore. Enter FORTINBRAS with his army.

FORTINBRAS: Go, captain, from me greet the Danish king.
 Tell him that by his license^o Fortinbras permission
 Craves the conveyance of^o a promised march escort for Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.
 If that his majesty would aught with us, 5
 We shall express our duty in his eye,^o presence
 And let him know so.

CAPTAIN: I will do't, my lord.

FORTINBRAS: Go softly^o on. [Exeunt all but the CAPTAIN.] slowly; circumspectly

[Enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and OTHERS.]

HAMLET: Good sir, whose powers^o are these? forces; troops

CAPTAIN: They are of Norway, sir. 10

HAMLET: How purposed, sir, I pray you?

CAPTAIN: Against some part of Poland.

HAMLET: Who commands them, sir?

CAPTAIN: The nephew to old Norway, Fortinbras.

HAMLET: Goes it against the main^o of Poland, sir, heart 15
 Or for some frontier?

CAPTAIN: Truly to speak, and with no addition,^o exaggeration
 We go to gain a little patch of ground

8. As stated in Genesis 2.23–24 and the marriage rite of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer.

- That hath in it no profit but the name.
- 20 To pay five ducats, five, I would not farm° it; lease
 Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole
 A ranker rate° should it be sold in fee.° higher return / outright
- HAMLET: Why, then the Polack never will defend it.
 CAPTAIN: Yes, it is already garrisoned.
- 25 HAMLET: Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats
 Will not debate the question of this straw.° trifle
 This is th' imposthume° of much wealth and peace, abscess
 That inward breaks, and shows no cause° without symptom
 Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.
- CAPTAIN: God b'wi'ye, sir. [Exit.]
- 30 ROSENCRANTZ: Will't please you go, my lord?
 HAMLET: I'll be with you straight. Go a little before.
[Exeunt all but HAMLET.]
- How all occasions do inform against° me, accuse
 And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
 If his chief good and market° of his time occupation; profit
 35 Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more.
 Sure he that made us with such large discourse,° reasoning power
 Looking before and after, gave us not
 That capability° and godlike reason intelligence
 To fust° in us unused. Now, whether it be grow moldy
 40 Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
 Of thinking too precisely on th' event—
 A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
 And ever three parts coward—I do not know
 Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"
- 45 Sith° I have cause, and will, and strength, and means, Since
 To do't. Examples gross as earth exhort me.
 Witness this army of such mass and charge,° cost
 Led by a delicate and tender° prince, young
 Whose spirit, with divine ambition puffed,
 50 Makes mouths at° the invisible event,° Scorns / unforeseeable outcome
 Exposing what is mortal and unsure
 To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,
 Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
 Is not to stir without great argument,
 55 But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
 When honor's at the stake. How stand I then,
 That have a father killed, a mother stained,
 Excitements° of my reason and my blood, Urgings
 And let all sleep, while to my shame I see 60 The imminent death of twenty thousand men
 That for a fantasy and trick° of fame fragile trifle
 Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
 Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,

Which is not tomb enough and continent
 To hide the slain?⁹ O, from this time forth, 65
 My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth! [Exit.]

Scene 5

A room in the castle. Enter QUEEN, HORATIO and a GENTLEMAN.

QUEEN: I will not speak with her.

GENTLEMAN: She is importunate, indeed distract.^o deranged
 Her mood will needs to be pitied.

QUEEN: What would she have?

GENTLEMAN: She speaks much of her father, says she hears 5
 There's tricks i' th' world, and hems, and beats her heart,
 Spurns enviously at straws,¹ speaks things in doubt^o obscurely
 That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,
 Yet the unshapèd use^o of it doth move incoherent manner
 The hearers to collection;^o they yawn^o at it, inference / gape
 And botch^o the words up fit to^o their own thoughts, patch / to match 10
 Which,^o as her winks and nods and gestures yield them,
 Indeed would make one think there might be thought,
 Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.² (words)

HORATIO: 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew
 Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding minds. 15

QUEEN: Let her come in. [Exit GENTLEMAN.]

[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
 Each toy^o seems prologue to some great amiss.^o triviality / calamity
 So full of artless jealousy^o is guilt, suspicion
 It spills itself in fearing to be spilt. 20

[Enter OPHELIA distracted.]

OPHELIA: Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

QUEEN: How now,^o Ophelia! What's this

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

How should I your true love know
 From another one?
 By his cockle hat³ and staff, 25
 And his sandal shoon.^o shoes

QUEEN: Alas, sweet lady, what imports^o this song? means

9. The plot of ground involved is so small that it cannot contain the number of men fighting or the corpses of those who die fighting. 1. Takes offense at trifles. 2. Though they reveal nothing for certain, her words provoke disturbing inferences. 3. A hat decorated with a cockle shell indicated that its wearer had made a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James at Compostela in Spain. A pilgrim often carried a staff.

OPHELIA: Say you? Nay, pray you mark.^o listen; pay attention

[Sings.]

30 He is dead and gone, lady,
He is dead and gone;
At his head a grass-green turf,
At his heels a stone.

O, ho!

QUEEN: Nay, but Ophelia—

OPHELIA: Pray you mark.

[Sings.]

White his shroud as the mountain snow—

[Enter KING.]

35 QUEEN: Alas, look here, my lord.

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

Larded^o all with sweet flowers;
Which bewept to the grave did not go
With true-love showers.^o

Garnished

tears

KING: How do you, pretty lady?

40 OPHELIA: Well, God dild^o you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.⁴ Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!

yield (reward)

KING: Conceit^o upon her father.

Brooding imagination

OPHELIA: Pray let's have no words of this, but when they 45 ask you what it means, say you this:

[Sings.]

Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime,^o
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.

early

50 Then up he rose, and donn'd his clo'es,
And dupp'd^o the chamber-door,
Let in the maid, that out a maid
Never departed more.

KING: Pretty Ophelia!

55 OPHELIA: Indeed, without an oath, I'll make an end on't.^o

of it

[Sings.]

4. Reference to a folktale about a young woman transformed into an owl when she fails to offer generosity to Jesus, who had asked for bread in her mother's shop.

By Gis^o and by Saint Charity,
Alack, and fie for shame! Jesus

Young men will do't, if they come to't;
By Cock,⁵ they are to blame.
Quoth she "before you tumbled me,
You promised me to wed." 60

He answers:

"So would I'a done, by yonder sun,
An^o thou hadst not come to my bed." If

KING: How long hath she been thus? 65

OPHELIA: I hope all will be well. We must be patient, but I cannot choose but weep to think they would lay him i' th' cold ground. My brother shall know of it, and so I thank you for your good counsel. Come, my coach! Good night, ladies, good night. Sweet ladies, good night, good night. [Exit.] 70

KING: Follow her close; give her good watch, I pray you.
[Exeunt HORATIO and GENTLEMAN.]

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death, and now behold!
O Gertrude, Gertrude!

When sorrows come, they come not single spies,^o scouts 75

But in battalions: first, her father slain;

Next, your son gone, and he most violent author

Of his own just remove; the people muddled,^o confused; disturbed

Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers

For good Polonius' death; and we have done but greenly^o naively 80

In hugger-mugger^o to inter him; poor Ophelia haste; secrecy

Divided from herself and her fair judgment,

Without the which we are pictures, or mere beasts;

Last, and as much containing^o as all these, and as important

Her brother is in secret come from France, 85

Feeds on his wonder, keeps himself in clouds,^o his intentions obscure

And wants^o not buzzers^o to infect his ear lacks / scandalmongers

With pestilent speeches of his father's death,

Wherein necessity, of matter beggared,^o short on facts

Will nothing stick^o our person to arraign^o Will not hesitate / accuse 90

In ear and ear. O my dear Gertrude, this,

Like to a murd'ring piece,⁶ in many places

Gives me superfluous^o death. redundant

[A noise within.]

QUEEN: Alack, what noise is this?

KING: Attend! 95

Where are my Switzers?^o Let them guard the door. Swiss guards

What is the matter?

5. Corruption of "God," with a sexual pun. 6. Weapon designed to scatter its shot.

MESSENGER: Save yourself, my lord.

The ocean, overpeering of his list,^o rising above its limits

Eats not the flats with more impiteous^o haste pitiless

100 Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,^o insurrection; tidal wave

O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,
And as^o the world were now but^o to begin, as = as if / only now

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,

The ratifiers and props of every word,⁷

105 They cry "Choose we, Laertes shall be king."

Caps, hands, and tongues, applaud it to the clouds,

"Laertes shall be king, Laertes king."

QUEEN: How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!⁸

[A noise within.]

O, this is counter,^o you false Danish dogs! backward; wrong

110 KING: The doors are broke.

[Enter LAERTES, with OTHERS.]

LAERTES: Where is this king?—Sirs, stand you all without.

ALL: No, let's come in.

LAERTES: I pray you give me leave.

ALL: We will, we will.

LAERTES: I thank you. Keep^o the door. [Exeunt his followers.] Guard

O thou vile king,

115 Give me my father!

QUEEN: Calmly, good Laertes.

LAERTES: That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me
bastard,

Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot

Even here between the chaste unsmirch'd brow

Of my true mother.

KING: What is the cause, Laertes,

120 That thy rebellion looks so giant-like?

Let him go, Gertrude. Do not fear^o our person. fear for

There's such divinity doth hedge a king

That treason can but peep to^o what it would,^o at / would do

Acts little of his will. Tell me, Laertes.

125 Why thou art thus incensed. Let him go, Gertrude.

Speak, man.

LAERTES: Where is my father?

KING: Dead.

QUEEN: But not by him.^o (the king)

KING: Let him demand his fill.

LAERTES: How came he dead? I'll not be juggled^o with. fooled

To hell allegiance, vows to the blackest devil,

130 Conscience and grace to the profoundest pit!

7. Agreement or contract (sworn "word"); language itself. 8. As if following the wrong scent like hunting dogs.

I dare damnation. To this point° I stand, resolve
 That both the worlds I give to negligence,⁹
 Let come what comes, only I'll be revenged
 Most thoroughly° for my father. thoroughly

KING: Who shall stay° you? prevent 135

LAERTES: My will, not all the world's.
 And for my means, I'll husband° them so well manage
 They shall go far with little.

KING: Good Laertes,
 If you desire to know the certainty° truth (about the death)
 Of your dear father, is't writ in your revenge
 That, swoopstake,¹ you will draw° both friend and foe, take from 140
 Winner and loser?

LAERTES: None but his enemies.

KING: Will you know them, then?

LAERTES: To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms,
 And like the kind life-rend'ring pelican,
 Repast them with my blood.² 145

KING: Why, now you speak
 Like a good child and a true gentleman.
 That I am guiltless of your father's death,
 And am most sensibly° in grief for it, sympathetically
 It shall as level° to your judgment 'pear plain
 As day does to your eye. 150

[A noise within: "Let her come in."]

LAERTES: How now? What noise is that?

[Enter OPHELIA.]

O, heat dry up my brains! tears seven times salt
 Burn out the sense and virtue° of mine eye! natural power
 By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight
 Till our scale turn the beam.³ O rose of May, 155
 Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!
 O heavens, is't possible a young maid's wits
 Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
 Nature is fin° in love, and where 'tis fine refined
 It sends some precious instances° of itself tokens 160
 After the thing it loves.⁴

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

They bore him barefac'd on the bier;
 Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny;
 And in his grave rain'd many a tear—

9. That both this world and the next I disregard. 1. Indiscriminately. (The winner of a sweepstakes gained the stakes of all other players.) 2. The pelican was believed to feed ("repast") her young with her own blood. 3. Until vengeance outweighs the injury, tilting the "scale" of justice. 4. Laertes suggests that Ophelia, because of her love for her dead father, gave up her sanity as a token of grief.

165 Fare you well, my dove!

LAERTES: Hadst thou thy wits, and didst persuade^o revenge,
It could not move thus.

argue for

OPHELIA: You must sing "A-down, a-down, and you call him a-down-a." O, how the wheel⁵ becomes it! It is the false 170 steward, that stole his master's daughter.

LAERTES: This nothing's more than matter.⁶

OPHELIA: There's a rosemary, that's for remembrance. Pray you, love, remember. And there is pansies, that's for thoughts.

175 LAERTES: A document^o in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.

An object lesson

OPHELIA: There's fennel for you, and columbines. There's rue for you, and here's some for me. We may call it herb of grace a Sundays. O, you must wear your rue with a dif-180 ference.^o There's a daisy. I would give you some violets,⁷ but they withered all when my father died. They say 'a made a good end.

for a different reason (?)

[Sings.]

For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy.

LAERTES: Thought and affliction, passion, hell itself,

185 She turns to favor^o and to prettiness.

beauty

OPHELIA:

[Sings.]

And will 'a not come again?

And will 'a not come again?

No, no, he is dead,

Go to thy death-bed,

190 He never will come again.

His beard was as white as snow,

All flaxen^o was his poll;^o

white / head

He is gone, he is gone,

And we cast away moan:

195 God-a-mercy on his soul!

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God b'wi'you.

[Exit.]

LAERTES: Do you see this, O God?

KING: Laertes, I must commune with your grief,

Or you deny me right. Go but apart,

200 Make choice of whom^o your wisest friends you will,

whichever of

5. Refrain of a song, in this case "A-down, a-down, and you call him a-down-a" but also suggesting the Wheel of Fortune or a spinning wheel to whose rhythm such songs were sung. 6. This nonsense signifies more than coherent speech ("matter"). 7. Here (as in lines 172–74), Ophelia apparently distributes flowers to the other characters, referring to the well-known "language of flowers." According to it, fennel symbolizes or is associated with flattery; columbines with ingratitude or marital infidelity; rue with repentance, as is the "herb of grace" (wormwood); daisies with dissembling seduction (perhaps); and violets with faithfulness.

And they shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me.
 If by direct or by collateral^o hand indirect
 They find us touched,^o we will our kingdom give, involved in guilt
 Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours,
 To you in satisfaction;^o but if not, recompense 205
 Be you content to lend your patience to us,
 And we shall jointly labor with your soul
 To give it due content.

LAERTES: Let this be so.
 His means of death, his obscure funeral—
 No trophy,^o sword, nor hatchment,^o o'er his bones, memorial / coat of arms 210
 No noble rite nor formal ostentation^o— (funereal) pomp
 Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,
 That I must call't in question.^o demand an explanation
 KING: So you shall;
 And where th' offence is, let the great axe fall.
 I pray you go with me. [Exeunt.] 215

Scene 6

Another room in the castle. Enter HORATIO and a GENTLEMAN.

HORATIO: What are they that would speak with me?
 GENTLEMAN: Sea-faring men, sir. They say they have letters for you.
 HORATIO: Let them come in. [Exit GENTLEMAN.]
 I do not know from what part of the world 5
 I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.
 [Enter SAILORS.]

SAILOR: God bless you, sir.
 HORATIO: Let him bless thee too.
 SAILOR: 'A shall, sir, an't^o please him. There's a letter for you, if it
 sir—it came from th' ambassador that was bound for Eng- 10 land—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is.
 HORATIO: [Reads.] "Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked^o this, give these fellows some means^o to the king. read / access
 They have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment^o gave us chase. equipment 15 Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I boarded them. On the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy, but they knew what they did;⁸ I am to do a good turn for 20 them. Let the king have the letters I have sent, and repair thou^o to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly come

8. They have been merciful, but with the expectation of a return. Hamlet recalls the thieves crucified next to Christ and Christ's plea for forgiveness for those who "know not what they do" (Luke 23.34–43).

- death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb; yet are they much too light for the bore of the matter.⁹ These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England. Of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell. He that thou knowest thine, Hamlet.”
- 25 Come, I will give you way^o for these your letters, means of delivery
 30 And do't the speedier that you may direct me
 To him from whom you brought them. [Exeunt.]

Scene 7

Another room in the castle. Enter KING and LAERTES.

- KING: Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,^o innocence affirm
 And you must put me in your heart for friend,
 Sith^o you have heard, and with a knowing ear, Since
 That he which hath your noble father slain
 Pursued my life.
- 5 LAERTES: It well appears. But tell me
 Why you proceeded not against these feats,^o acts
 So criminal and so capital^o in nature, punishable by death
 As by your safety, greatness, wisdom, all things else,
 You mainly^o were stirred up. greatly
- KING: O, for two special reasons,
 10 Which may to you, perhaps, seem much unsinewed,^o very weak
 But yet to me th' are strong. The queen his mother
 Lives almost by his looks, and for myself—
 My virtue or my plague, be it either which—
 She is so conjunctive^o to my life and soul closely joined 15 That, as the star moves not but in his sphere,¹
 I could not but by her. The other motive,
 Why to a public count^o I might not go, accounting; reckoning
 Is the great love the general gender^o bear him, common people
 Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
 20 Work like the spring that turneth wood to stone,²
 Convert his gyves³ to graces; so that my arrows,
 Too slightly timbered^o for so loud a wind, shafted
 Would have reverted to my bow again,
 But not where I had aimed them.
- 25 LAERTES: And so have I a noble father lost,
 A sister driven into desp'rate terms,
 Whose worth, if praises may go back again,⁴

9. Metaphor from gunnery, referring to shot too small for the weapons to be fired.

1. Reference to the Ptolemaic cosmology, in which planets and stars were believed to revolve in crystalline spheres concentrically about the earth. (Two planets were said to be “in conjunction” when they appeared close, as if traveling in the same sphere or “conjunct.”) 2. Certain springs contain so much lime that they can petrify absorbent objects (like a piece of wood). 3. Literally, fetters; figuratively (as here), faults, shortcomings. 4. That is, “back again” in time, to what once was.

Stood challenger on mount of all the age
 For her perfections.⁵ But my revenge will come.
 KING: Break not your sleeps for that. You must not think 30
 That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
 That we can let our beard be shook with danger,⁶
 And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more.
 I loved your father, and we love our self,
 And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine— 35
 [Enter a MESSENGER with letters.]

How now? What news?
 MESSENGER: Letters, my lord, from Hamlet.
 These to your majesty; this to the queen.
 KING: From Hamlet! Who brought them?
 MESSENGER: Sailors, my lord, they say. I saw them not.
 They were given me by Claudio; he received them 40
 Of him that brought them.

KING: Laertes, you shall hear them.—
 Leave us. [Exit MESSENGER.]
 [Reads.] “High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked^o on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to destitute see your kingly eyes; when I shall, first asking your par- 45 don^o thereunto, recount the occasion of my sudden and permission more strange return.
 Hamlet.”

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?
 Or is it some abuse,^o and no such thing? deception 50
 LAERTES: Know you the hand?
 KING: ’Tis Hamlet’s character.^o “Naked”! handwriting
 And in a postscript here, he says “alone.”
 Can you devise^o me? explain it to; direct
 LAERTES: I am lost in it, my lord. But let him come. 55
 It warms the very sickness in my heart
 That I shall live and tell him to his teeth
 “Thus didest thou.”⁷

KING: If it be so, Laertes—
 As how should it be so, how otherwise?⁸
 Will you be ruled by me? 60

LAERTES: Ay, my lord,
 So^o you will not o’errule me to a peace. Provided that
 KING: To thine own peace. If he be now returned,
 As checking at^o his voyage, and that he means turning aside from
 No more to undertake it, I will work him
 To an exploit now ripe in my device,^o planning 65
 Under the which he shall not choose but fall;
 And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe

5. Conspicuously challenged the world to match her perfections. 6. That I can allow anyone to endanger me with contemptuous behavior. 7. This which I do now to you, you did to my father.

8. How could Hamlet be returning, and yet how else could he have sent this letter?

But even his mother shall uncharge^o the practice^o not accuse / connivance
 And call it accident.

LAERTES: My lord, I will be ruled;

70 The rather if you could devise it so
 That I might be the organ.^o instrument; agent

KING: It falls right.

You have been talked of since your travel much,
 And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
 Wherein they say you shine. Your sum of parts^o abilities
 75 Did not together pluck such envy from him
 As did that one, and that, in my regard,
 Of the unworthiest siege.^o lowest rank

LAERTES: What part is that, my lord?

KING: A very riband in the cap of youth,
 Yet needful too, for youth no less becomes 80 The light and careless livery that it wears
 Than settled age his sables and his weeds,
 Importing^o health and graveness. Two months since Suggesting
 Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
 I have seen myself, and served against, the French,
 85 And they can^o well on horseback, but this gallant perform
 Had witchcraft in't. He grew unto his seat,
 And to such wondrous doing brought his horse,
 As had he been incorpsed and demi-natured⁹
 With the brave beast. So far he topped^o my thought^o surpassed / expectation 90 That I, in forgery^o of shapes and tricks,
 Come short of what he did. my imaginings

LAERTES: A Norman was't?

KING: A Norman.

LAERTES: Upon my life, Lamord.

KING: The very same.

LAERTES: I know him well. He is the brooch^o indeed ornament
 95 And gem of all the nation.

KING: He made confession^o of you, testimonial
 And gave you such a masterly report
 For art and exercise in your defence,
 And for your rapier most especial,
 100 That he cried out 'twould be a sight indeed
 If one could match you. The scrimers^o of their nation fencers
 He swore had neither motion, guard, nor eye,
 If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his
 Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
 105 That he could nothing do but wish and beg
 Your sudden^o coming o'er, to play with you. immediate
 Now out of this—

9. As if he had been in the same body and had half the nature of. The image recalls the centaur of classical myth.

LAERTES: What out of this, my lord?

KING: Laertes, was your father dear to you?

Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
A face without a heart?

110

LAERTES: Why ask you this?

KING: Not that I think you did not love your father,

But that I know love is begun by time,^o circumstance

And that I see in passages of proof,^o

tests of experience

Time qualifies^o the spark and fire of it.

moderates

There lives within the very flame of love

115

A kind of wick or snuff that will abate it,

And nothing is at a like^o goodness still,^o

an equal / always

For goodness, growing to a plurisy,¹

Dies in his own too much.^o That we would do, excess

We should do when we would; for this “would” changes,

120

And hath abatements and delays as many

As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents,

And then this “should” is like a spendthrift’s sigh

That hurts by easing.² But to the quick^o of th’ ulcer—center

Hamlet comes back; what would you undertake

125

To show yourself in deed your father’s son

More than in words?

LAERTES: To cut his throat i’ th’ church.

KING: No place indeed should murder sanctuarize;³

Revenge should have no bounds. But, good Laertes,

Will you do this? Keep close within your chamber.

130

Hamlet returned shall know you are come home.

We’ll put on those shall⁴ praise your excellence,

And set a double varnish on the fame

The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine^o together, short

And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,^o

unwary 135

Most generous, and free from all contriving,

Will not peruse^o the foils, so that with ease, examine

Or with a little shuffling, you may choose

A sword unbated,⁵ and in a pass of practice

Requite him for your father.

LAERTES: I will do’t,

140

And for that purpose I’ll anoint my sword.

I bought an unction^o of a mountebank^o ointment / quack

So mortal that but dip a knife in it,

Where it draws blood no cataplasm^o so rare,

poultice

Collected from all simples^o that have virtue^o

herbs / potency 145

Under the moon, can save the thing from death

That is but scratched withal.^o I’ll touch my point with it

1. Chest inflammation, metaphorically like a fire in the heart. 2. A sigh was believed to draw a drop of blood from the heart and thus to “hurt” by “easing” sadness. 3. Provide sanctuary for a murderer. 4. I shall incite some people to. 5. Not blunted, as an actual practice foil would be.

With this contagion, that if I gall^o him slightly, prick
It may be death.

KING: Let's further think of this,

150 Weigh what convenience both of time and means
May fit us to our shape.^o If this should fail, purpose; plot; roles
And that our drift look^o through our bad performance, our intention be seen
'Twere better not assayed. Therefore this project
Should have a back or second that might hold 155 If this did blast in proof.⁶ Soft, let me see.
We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings^o— skills
I ha't.
When in your motion^o you are hot and dry— exercise
As make your bouts more violent to that end—
160 And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepared him
A chalice for the nonce,^o whereon but sipping, occasion
If he by chance escape your venom'd stuck,^o thrust
Our purpose may hold there.—But stay, what noise?

[Enter QUEEN.]

QUEEN: One woe doth tread upon another's heel, 165 So fast they follow. Your sister's drowned, Laertes.

LAERTES: Drowned? O, where?

QUEEN: There is a willow grows aslant the brook
That shows his hoar leaves⁷ in the glassy stream.
Therewith fantastic garlands did she make 170 Of crowsflowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples⁸
That liberal shepherds give a grosser name,
But our cold^o maids do dead men's fingers call them. chaste
There on the pendent boughs her coronet weeds
Clamb'ring to hang, an envious sliver^o broke, a malicious twig
175 When down her weedy trophies and herself
Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
And mermaid-like awhile they bore her up,
Which time she chanted snatches of old tunes,
As one incapable^o of her own distress, unaware 180 Or like a creature native and indued^o habituated
Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay^o song
To muddy death.

LAERTES: Alas, then she is drowned?

185 QUEEN: Drowned, drowned.

LAERTES: Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,
And therefore I forbid my tears; but yet

6. Fail when tried; literally, explode when put to the test (like a cannon). 7. Willow leaves are gray-white ("hoary") on the underside (reflected from below by the "glassy," mirror-like water). The willow was an emblem of mourning and of forsaken love. 8. Purple orchises, a type of orchid known by the coarser ("grosser") name of "dog's cullions" (testicles) or "goat's cullions." Crowsflowers: wildflowers.
